wanted to find for her unless they believed that in so doing she failed to exercise such care as might be ordinarily expected of a person of usual prudence situated as she was, and but for this would not have been injured. The question then arises, is this the law of the case?

It is a matter of common knowledge that as a rapidly rolling passenger train stops at a station there is a forward movement of persons even sitting in the car. This movement is much more pronounced when one is standing up, and there is greater danger of an old person falling than in the case of one younger, or who is on the lookout from experience for the forward surge of the body, just as the train abruptly stops. The railroad company is not responsible for this. No amount of care can avoid it. It is not due to any jolt or jar of the train, but simply to the fact that the body of the person standing up continues to move forward when the feet resting on the floor of the car have stopped. It is safest for passengers on railway trains to keep their seats until the train stops. If they leave their seats when the train is approaching the station they take the risk of those things which are incidental to the stopping of the train in the usual way and with proper care. In Hughlett v. L. & N. R. R. Co., 15 Ky. Law Rep., 178, the court said: "All who board trains as passengers know that the announcement is usually made as the trains approach to a depot before it actually reaches it, to enable passengers to prepare for leaving."

A passenger is not required to keep his seat during his whole journey. He may move from one part of the car to another. When the train approaches his station, and it is announced, he may prepare to leave the train. Whether he is wanting in reasonable care in leaving his seat then and standing in the aisle is a question for the jury, if while so standing he is injured by some jerk or bump of the train not incidental to its proper management. (New Jersey R. R. Co. v. Pollard, 22 Wal., 341; Treat v. Boston, &c., R. R. Co., 131 Mass., 371; 5 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 682; 6 Cyc., 650, and cases cited.) A passenger who rides in a place more dangerous than that intended for passengers, and is there hurt by the usual and proper operation of the train, when he would not have been hurt had he remained in his seat, can not be said to have been injured by the negligence of the carrier. In the case at bar, if the evidence for the defendant is true, there was no negligence on its part, and the proximate cause of the accident was the old lady's placing herself at the car door before the train stopped. In lieu of instruction 7 the court should have instructed the jury that if they believe from the evidence that before the train stopped at the station the plaintiff left her seat and stood up at the door of the car, and while standing there was caused to fall by the stopping of the train in the usual manner, with no more jerk than was incidental to the stopping of the train in the exercise of proper care as defined in instruction 3, they should find for the defendant. The court gave no distinct instruction on contributory negligence, and, in addition to the instruction indicated, the jury should have been instructed in effect that, although the defendant was negligent as above defined, still it was incumbent on the plaintiff to exercise such care for her own safety as might be ordinarily expected of a person of usual prudence of her age and condition, situated as she was, and if she failed to exercise such care, and but for this would not have been injured, she could not recover.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded for a new trial.

GEORGETOWN WATER CO. v. FIDELITY TRUST AND SAFETY VAULT CO.'S TRUSTEE, &c.

MONTGOMERY, &c. v. SAME.

(Filed January 15, 1904.)

1. Sale of mortgaged property—Appeals—Where upon an appeal from an order confirming a sale of mortgaged property the court held that the sale should be confirmed unless the mortgagee could show that the surety was endangered, the sale was binding where there was no such fact established, and the purchasers were liable on the sale bond.

2. Same—Receiver—Where there was a sale of mortgaged property ordered and a receiver appointed to take charge of it the court could not require the receiver to control and operate the property without compensation, and the holder of such property is entitled to the rents and profits while it is in possession.

3. Same—Corporations—Holders of bonds—The holders of bonds of a corporation, which were issued upon being secured by a mortgage, should share in the proceeds upon a sale of the property in accordance with the number of bonds held, and although such bonds were taken in the due course of business, having been issued by a corporation organized under the laws of this State, they are subject to prior equities in the hands of an assignee.

4. Same—Assignment—The assignment of a bond of a corporation which had been issued upon the faith of a mortgage, the person making the assignment having no title to the bond, such assignment will be treated in an action to enforce the lien as an assignment of the proceeds belonging to him, as will be sufficient to satisfy the debt.

5. Same—Where the property of a mortgaged corporation was kept in repair, worn out parts being replaced, improvements made and all net earnings put into improvements, causing it to bring when sold much in advance of what it was worth when acquired, the rule is that such chattels attached to the realty by purchasers at sale are not subject to lien when they are not intended as a permanent acquisition to the freehold, and may be removed without substantial impairment of the property.

Appeals from Scott Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

The Georgetown Water Co. was incorporated June 21, 1889; the incorporators were R. A. Mitchell, John Nichols and E. H. Patterson; the stock of the company was fixed at $100,000, and was issued to the incorporators, they transferring to the corporation a contract made by them with the city of Georgetown in payment of the stock. They put into the company each $4,000. They bought ground, erected a plant, and laid mains. They also bought electrical machinery for an incandescent light system. They borrowed from a bank at Pineville $10,000. They owed the Central Thompson-Houston Co., of Cincinnati, for machinery, about $8,000. In January, 1890, they organized the Georgetown Electric Light Co., but no business appears to have been done in the name of this company, everything being transacted in the name of the Georgetown Water Co. On April 15, 1890, the water company executed a mortgage to the Fidelity Trust and Safety Vault Co., as trustee, for the bondholders to secure seventy bonds of $500 each, with interest at 6 per cent., having coupons attached, due in twenty years. The mortgage was upon all the property of the company, real and personal, including privileges and franchises then owned or thereafter to be acquired by it, "the said property (as recited in the mortgage) consisting in part of the waterworks plant, pipes and mains of said first party in the county of Scott and town of Georgetown, and its electric plant erected, and to be erected, with all appliances, machinery, etc., together with all other property of every kind as hereinbefore stated."

The mortgage also provided that when any of the machinery became worn out the first party should have the right to replace it with new machinery of equal or better quality, and might then dispose of the old machinery, the clause concluding with these words: "And the lien of this mortgage shall attach to such new machinery or other property that may be acquired and added by said party of the first part." In July, 1890, they bought out the Georgetown Gas Co. and consolidated the three companies in the name of the Georgetown Water Co. In payment of the machinery bought of the Central Thompson-Houston Co. they delivered to it, according to contract, ten of the mortgage bonds referred to, leaving a balance due it of about $3,000. They ran the electric plant in the summer, the gas plant in the winter, and it would seem from the evidence that the profit from the operation of the plants, including the waterworks, was small. On February 2, 1891, the Central Thompson-Houston Co. filed an ordinary action in the Montgomery Common Pleas Court against the Georgetown Water Co. to recover the balance of its debt. The case was tried at the September term, 1891, of the court, and the plaintiff recovered judgment for the amount sued for. On November 6, 1891, the Georgetown Water Co. borrowed from the Fidelity Trust and Safety Vault Co. $10,000, executing therefor its note, due in six months, with Nichols, Mitchell and Patterson as sureties, and also securing the note by pledging with the company fifty-four of the mortgage bonds referred to. This $10,000 was used to pay the debt to the Pineville bank, above referred to. They had still in their hands six of the seventy mortgage bonds, having delivered ten to the Central Thompson-Houston Co. and fifty-four to the Fidelity Trust and Safety Vault Co. Of these six bonds Mitchell took two and Nichols four. Nichols turned over the four he had to John L. Caswell, who was his security, and to whom he assigned all his interest in the company. On March 8, 1892, the Central Thompson-Houston Co., having had execution issued on its judgment and returned no property found, filed an equity action in the Montgomery Common Pleas Court, seeking to subject the property of the water company to its debt, and to have it placed in the hands of a receiver. In that case a judgment was entered, directing a sale of the property of the water company, subject to the mortgage above referred to. The sale was had, and appellants, H. P. Montgomery and others, were the purchasers, at the price of $3,525. The sale was reported to the court, and confirmed. A writ of possession was issued in favor of the purchasers, and they were placed in possession of the property. After all this, the water company prosecuted an appeal to this court from the judgment in the ordinary action in favor of the Central Thompson-Houston Co., and also from the judgment in their favor in the equity action. The judgment in the ordinary action was reversed for an error in the instructions. (Georgetown Water Co. v. Central Thompson-Houston Co., 17 Ky. Law Rep., 1270.) The case was returned to the circuit court, where it was tried again, the plaintiff recovering as before, and this judgment on a second appeal was affirmed by this court. (Georgetown Water Co. v. Central Thompson-Houston Co., 20 Ky. Law Rep., 1899.) On the original hearing of the equity case the judgment of sale and the confirmation of the sale were both reversed; but on petition for rehearing, the court's attention being called to the condition of the pleadings, the opinion was modified, and it was held that the sale must stand except as to the trust company, and that as to it it should be permitted to stand unless the trust company showed that its security had been endangered. The court said: "Evidently the plant brought what it was worth; the purchasers are not complaining; the water company can not do so; and, in our opinion, the trust company has not shown that its interests are at all prejudiced by the order confirming the sale. The order of confirmation, therefore, will not be disturbed here, and the former opinion is modified to that extent. While this modification is made in the original opinion, the judgment must stand reversed as to the Fidelity Trust Co., so that the rights of the bondholders it represents may not be affected or prejudiced by the sale to the appellees, and any lien it may have in its own right, or for those it represents, on the property of the water company, its rights and franchises, will be retained as if no such judgment had been rendered. On the return of the case the judgment, in so far as it affects the Fidelity Trust Co., will be set aside, with the right of the trust company to show, if it can, by appropriate pleadings and proof, that its security had been endangered by reason of the sale to appellees, and, if so, the sale will be set aside, and not otherwise." (Georgetown Water Co. v. Central Thompson-Houston Co., 17 Ky. Law Rep., 1270.)

No steps appear to have been taken by the trust company in the circuit court to show that its security was endangered, but at the next term of this court a motion was made that the court withdraw the modified opinion. The motion was overruled. (Georgetown Water Co. v. Central Thompson-Houston Co., 18 Ky. Law Rep., 711.) A year or more after this, on January 19, 1898, the Fidelity Trust and Safety Vault Co., as trustee for the bondholders, instituted an equity action in the Scott Circuit Court, making all parties in interest defendants, and seeking the foreclosure of the mortgage. Montgomery and his associates who had organized themselves into the Georgetown Water Supply Co. were in possession of the property, and has been since they were put in possession of it under their purchase. The town of Georgetown had nearly doubled in size since the year 1889. The incandescent light system, which was originally put in, was suitable only for lighting residences and the like. To light the streets of the town they had put in an arc light system in addition to the incandescent system. There were only about fifty poles up when they took charge. They bought and put up something over three hundred more. They extended the lines until now they have about fifteen miles of electric light line. They also put in additional water mains as demanded by the exigencies of the public necessities, in order to preserve the franchises of the company. The machinery of the arc system was separate from the machinery of the incandescent light system, and could be moved without injury to the freehold. They put it in upon the idea that they would have the right to remove it when they were required to give up the property. After this suit was brought the court allowed them to remove all the machinery from the lot where it stood to the lot of the street railway company upon their giving bond that they would return it to the original lot when required by the court. After they removed the machinery to the premises of the street railway company they added other machinery, costing them $4,800. When the court required the machinery which had been removed to be returned to the lot of the Georgetown Water Co., he allowed them to retain the additions which they had purchased and had on the lot of the street railway company, amounting to $4,800; but refused to allow them to remove the arc light system or the other additions which they had made to the plant before its removal from the original lot, and ordered the whole property sold, giving them no compensation for their betterments, which had cost them something over $12,000. He also held that they were responsible to the bondholders for the rent of the property while in their possession, from the time that a motion to put the property in the hands of a receiver had been made and overruled in that action at a preceding term.

After the note for $10,000 to the Fidelity Trust and Safety Vault Co. fell due Mitchell, as surety, was forced to pay it; the notes and bonds pledged to secure it were then turned over to him. He turned over the bonds to E. S. Jameson, his brother-in-law, who was his surety, who held them for a while and finally sent them to Mitchell, who pledged them to various parties to secure loans made in the main to his mother, Ann E. Mitchell. R. A. Mitchell sent one of the bonds to E. H. Patterson, in Philadelphia, to exhibit it to some persons there to whom they were trying to make a sale of the property. Patterson kept this bond and hypothecated to it to D. B. Logan to secure a debt of his own. The money which Patterson put into the concern belonged to his wife, and he transferred to her his interest in the corporation. The court, on final hearing, held that the mortgage included property acquired after it was executed and not owned by the Georgetown Water Co. when the mortgage was given; that H. P. Montgomery and his associates having purchased subject to the mortgage, simply stood in the shoes of the Georgetown Water Co., and could not question the lien of the mortgagee on the after-acquired property; that $27,000 had been put into the plant, made up of $12,000 contributed by Nichols, Patterson and Mitchell, $10,000 borrowed from the trust company, and $5,000 of the account of the Central Thompson-Houston Co. for the machinery furnished which had been paid in the ten bonds of $500 each accepted by that company at par; that Nichols transferred to Cassell and that Patterson transferred to Logan the bonds referred to in due course of trade, and that Cassell and Logan took them free of prior equities. He adjudged the property to be sold and after the payment of certain prior debts not here in dispute, five twenty-sevenths of the proceeds should be paid to the Georgetown Water Supply Co., the assignee of the Central Thompson-Houston Co., as the part of the proceeds coming on the five bonds held by it; that twenty-two twenty-sevenths of the proceeds should constitute a fund for the payment of the other bonds; that Cassell and Logan should be paid the part of the proceeds represented by their bonds; that out of the proceeds of the fifty-four bonds held by the trust company as collateral Mitchell should be paid the $10,000 he had paid the trust company, with its interest; and that the remainder of the proceeds of these bonds belonged equally to Mitchell, Patterson and Nichols, or their assigns. The water supply company offered to surrender the property to the court when the judgment was entered; the court refused to permit this, and ordered it to retain possession of the plant and operate it upon the same terms as if the company had been appointed a receiver until delivered to the purchasers, except the company should receive no compensation for its services as receiver and kept a full and accurate account of the receipts and expenditures in the operation of the plant, and report them to the court at the next term. From this judgment all the parties have appealed. The property was sold under the judgment and brought $30,000. The sale was confirmed. The court also ordered Montgomery and his associates to pay their bond executed upon their purchase of the property subject to the mortgage above referred to, this bond having never been collected.

It was held by this court in the modified opinion that the order of confirmation of the sale to Montgomery and his associates would not be disturbed here, and that on the return of the case it might be set aside if the trust company showed, by appropriate pleadings and proof, that its security had been endangered, but that otherwise the sale should stand. The sale was, therefore, left in effect by this court. The trust company did not show by pleading or proof that its security had been endangered; and no order was made setting aside the sale. The court, therefore, properly ordered the purchasers, Montgomery and his associates, to pay their sale bond. Their sale standing, and they being required to pay the purchase money, they held the property as purchasers, and are not liable to the Georgetown Water Co. or the bondholders, or the trustee for them, for the rents on the property. The mortgagee is only entitled to the rents from the time that he has a receiver appointed to save them for him. When the motion was made for a receiver and was overruled, the remedy of the mortgagee was to appeal. He could not acquiesce in the decision of the court refusing to appoint a receiver and then hold the defendant accountable for the rents. If the Georgetown Water Co. had remained in possession it would have been entitled to the rents up to the confirmation of the sale, and Montgomery and his associates succeeding to all the rights of the water company are entitled to the rents of the property while in their possession. This is what they obtained by their purchase. The court had no authority to order them to operate the plant as receiver without compensation. The court might have appointed a receiver for the property if he had seen fit to do so, but he could not require the defendant to act as receiver, and assume the responsibilities of the position over its objection.

The Georgetown Water Co. was incorporated by articles filed in the county court under the General Statutes. It had no power by law to issue coupon bonds which should pass by delivery. The paper issued by it was not placed on the footing of a bill of exchange as provided by the statute. Although the bonds had coupons attached to them and were payable to bearer, they were in legal effect only promissory notes, and each assignee took them subject to prior equities. (Richie v. Cralle, 108 Ky., 483; Fidelity Trust and Safety Vault Co. v. Carr, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 156, and cases cited.) None of the bondholders, therefore, are protected by the fact that they took the bonds in the due course of business and without notice. We find no evidence in the record that the corporation ever disposed of the four bonds which Nichols took possession of and delivered to Cassell or the two which Mitchell took possession of and disposed of as his own. These bonds were the property of the corporation, and not having been disposed of by it, remain its property, and can not be enforced in this action as a lien on its plant. The ten bonds delivered to the Central Thompson-Houston Co. and the fifty-four bonds delivered to the trust company as collateral to the note of $10,000 are the only bonds which constitute a lien on the property. After the prior claims, as adjudged by the circuit court, are paid, ten sixty-fourths of the fund remaining should be applied to pay the ten bonds sold to the Central Thompson-Houston Co., and fifty-four sixty-fourths of it to pay the fifty-four bonds pledged to the trust company to secure its note. The trust company had the right to look to the entire proceeds of these bonds for the payment of its debt, and when Mitchell paid the debt as surety he succeeded to all the rights of the trust company, and had the right to look to the entire proceeds of the fifty-four bonds for the repayment of his money and interest. The remainder of the proceeds of these fifty-four bonds, after the payment of Mitchell's debt with interest, is, as between it and Mitchell, the property of the water company; for Mitchell has no claim on them except the lien for the repayment of his money, with interest. If the ten bonds held by the Central Thompson-Houston Co. are not paid in full by ten sixty-fourths of the net proceeds of the sale above directed to be paid upon them, the remainder of the principal and interest of these bonds should be paid in full out of the funds set apart to the water company after the payment of Mitchell's debt out of the proceeds of the fifty-four bonds as above indicated, for the water company is the obligor in the bonds held by the Central Thompson-Houston Co., and must discharge its obligation out of the funds coming to it before it can be allowed to withdraw any part of the proceeds of the sale. The substance of the situation as between the Central Thompson-Houston Co. and the water company is that the former company holds the promise of the latter to pay it $5,000, secured by a lien on the property in contest, and as between the two the water company's right to the proceeds of the sale is subordinate to the lien of the Central Thompson-Houston Co.

When all the bonds are thus paid off, so far as they are a valid lien on the property, the remainder of the funds, if nothing else appeared, would be the property of the water company; and the question arises whether this fund thus remaining should all be adjudged to the water company, or whether Montgomery and his associates should be adjudged compensation out of it to the extent of its enhancement by reason of the betterments placed by Montgomery and his associates on the property. The proof leaves no doubt that Montgomery and his associates not only kept the plant in repair, replacing what was worn out, but put in the arc light system, extended the mains and lines, advancing a large sum of money for this purpose, and putting all the net earnings of the company into it, thus causing it to bring, when finally sold, $30,000, when it was at the time they got it, under the evidence, worth very much less. The rule is as between vendor and vendee or mortgagor and mortgagee that chattels attached to the realty by the vendee or mortgagor are not subject to the lien when they are not intended as a permanent accession to the freehold, and may be removed without substantial impairment of the property. In Clore v. Lambert, 78 Ky., 224, a steam engine and planing mill attached to a building by bolts and screws by the vendee were allowed to be removed after a suit was brought to enforce the vendor's lien. Under the rule thus declared the arc light system and other machinery bought by Montgomery and his associates, which might be removed from the building without injury to it, might, as between vendor and vendee, have been detached and taken away. But it is insisted that the mortgage in this case provides that it should cover after-acquired property placed on the land by the water company, and that as Montgomery and his associates bought subject to the mortgage, they stand in the shoes of the water company, and can not be heard to say that after-acquired property which they bought and placed on the land is not covered by the mortgage. Where negotiable bonds have been issued secured by a mortgage of a railway company on property then on hand or thereafter to be acquired, the mortgage is upheld in favor of the bondholders as to after-acquired property; otherwise long-time bonds could not be issued and money raised upon them. (Westinghouse Electric, & Co. v. Citizens St. R. R. Co., 24 Ky. Law Rep., 334; Porter v. Steel Co., 123 U. S., 283; Jones on Mortgages, section 436.) But where no bondholder is interested and the controversy is between the bona fide occupants of the property and the mortgagor after the mortgage debt has been satisfied, a different question is presented. As between them the occupants should have been allowed to remove from the premises all such fixtures as were removable as between vendor and vendee. To illustrate: If it had turned out in this action that none of the bonds were enforceable against the water company, and that there was no lien on the property under the mortgage, it would hardly be maintained as between Montgomery and his associates on the one hand and the water company on the other, that they would not have the right to remove from the property such fixtures as are removable between vendor and vendee; for the stipulation in the mortgage as to after-acquired property is for the protection of the mortgagee, and affords no reason for putting into the treasury of the water company the property of the purchaser who bought subject to the mortgage and placed the chattels on the property on the idea that they might remove them when they were required to surrender possession. If none of the bonds had been sold by the water company the relation of mortgagor and mortgagee would, in effect, exist between the water company and the parties who bought subject to the mortgage and held possession under their purchase. The water company would then be entitled to the benefit of the mortgage to the extent of the amount named therein; but this would not enable it to say that the stipulation of the mortgage as to after-acquired property placed on the land by it, made for the benefit of the bondholders, should inure to its benefit as against the purchasers who took subject to the mortgage, and give it a lien on their after-acquired property, which it would not otherwise have. If the water company had paid the note to the trust company, and had taken up the five bonds held by the Central Thompson-Houston Co., and had then filed this suit itself to have the mortgage foreclosed, and the amount of the mortgage debt paid to it, it could hardly maintain that it was entitled to have a foreclosure on anything more than its property, or that Montgomery and his associates could not remove anything in that event from the premises which would be removable between mortgagor and mortgagee. Yet this is in substance the case we have as to the surplus left after the payment of the bonds, as the bonds were not negotiable, and are not enforceable against the water company further than as indicated. (2 Jones on Mortgages, section 1491.)

We, therefore, conclude that out of the surplus left after the payment of the bonds which would otherwise be adjudged to the water company, compensation should be made to Montgomery and his associates to the extent that the price which the property brought at the sale was enhanced by the betterments placed thereon by Montgomery and his associates which were removable by them under the rule laid down in Clore v. Lambert. This will include not only the machinery in the power house, but the additional water mains put in by them, and the additional electric lines put up by them, for these could be disconnected from the old mains and lines without any impairment of their value. Nothing will be allowed for repairs on the old plant, or the old mains or lines, or for anything which was put in to supply the place of what was originally mortgaged, but worn out. The amount of compensation to be allowed them is not the cost of the property which they added, but the extent to which these additions enhanced the price which the property brought at the sale as near as it can be ascertained by proof of what the whole property consisted of and its value and proof of the value of the additions above referred to, and such other evidence as may be had. On the return of the case to the circuit court it will be referred to a commissioner to report in detail what additions were made by Montgomery and his associates for which they should be allowed, as above explained, giving the value of each, the value of the other property covered by the mortgage and to ascertain as nearly as can be done how much of the $30,000, for which the property sold, represents the additions made by Montgomery and his associates, for which they should be compensated, as above explained.

After Montgomery and his associates are paid the rest of the fund will be adjudged to Mitchell, Patterson and Cassell, or their assigns, Mitchell being first paid $206.95, as adjudged by the circuit court. The assignment of the bond to D. B. Logan should be treated as an assignment to Logan of $250, with interest from April 1, 1897, out of Patterson's share of the proceeds. The assignments of the other bonds by R. A. Mitchell, or his assignees, should be treated as assignments of the proceeds of the bonds as herein adjudged, which should be paid accordingly. Patterson took no title to the bond which Mitchell sent to him simply to show to others, and Patterson's assignment of this bond to Logan should be treated simply as a transfer by Patterson to Logan of enough of his share in the surplus to pay Logan's debt of $250. The court properly held that this surplus should be equally divided between Patterson, Mitchell and Nichols, or their assigns.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded for further proceedings consistent herewith.

BOOTH & CO. v. BETHEL.

(Filed February 16, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Judgments—Where upon a return of a case to the lower court it is tried in strict conformity to the rule laid down by this court, the judgment will not be disturbed.

H. D. Gregory and W. W. Symmes for appellants.

Myers & Howard for appellee.

Appeal from Kenton Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

The facts of this case are fully stated in the opinion rendered on the former appeal. (Bethel v. Booth, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 2024.) It was there held that there was an implied contract that Booth & Co. would pay Bethel the difference between the amount paid for the assets of the store and its actual value on the day the purchase was made, and in addition would compensate Bethel for the loss which he sustained of the good will of the business. On the return of the case to the circuit court it was tried in strict conformity to the rule thus laid down, and the plaintiff having recovered judgment for something over $800, the defendants appeal.

The evidence on the last trial is much the same as when the case was here before. The opinion on the former appeal is the law of the case. There was sufficient evidence to go to the jury as to the authority of the general manager of Booth & Co. to make the contract. It was apparently within the scope of his general authority, and the defendants had received the benefits of the contract. The action does not proceed upon the idea that the contract was a valid one, which could be enforced against them, but that they could not be allowed to retain the benefits of the contract after they repudiated it, and that as Bethel had given up to them his business as well as the personal property they must account for what they had received.

The proof as to the amount of business done and what Bethel was making was sufficient to go to the jury on the value of the good will of the business, and we do not see that the defendants were in any way misled by the rulings of the court. On the contrary, they seem to have presented fully their evidence on the subject.

While the verdict is large, as there have been three trials of the case and the evidence was conflicting, we deem it improper to disturb the verdict. The credibility of the witnesses was for the jury, and their verdict shows that they believed the plaintiff and his witnesses.

Judgment affirmed.

METROPOLITAN LIFE INS. CO. v. MOORE.

(Filed February 16, 1904.)

1. Insurance—Construction of statutes—By the provisions of section 679, Kentucky Statutes, where the application for insurance is not attached to the policy it shall not be received as evidence in a controversy between the insured and the company.

2. Same—Where it was not shown upon the trial in an action to recover upon a policy of insurance that the unsoundness of health of insured occurred between the application and medical examination and delivery of the policy, the provision in the policy that it shall not be binding "unless upon the date of delivery the insured is alive and in sound health," such defense is not available, and the company must rely on the statements in the application, and not upon this clause in the policy.

R. H. Cunningham and F. M. Sackett for appellant.

John C. B. Hall and C. J. Waddill for appellee.

Appeal from Hopkins Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

This appeal brings in review the judgment of the court on a policy for $5,000 on the life of Abram R. Moore for the benefit of the appellee, Annie M. Moore. The policy did not have attached to it a correct copy of the application, as signed by the applicant, and not being so attached section 679, Kentucky Statutes, declares that it shall not be received as evidence in any controversy between the parties to or interested in the policy, and shall not be considered a part of the policy or of the contract between such parties. (Provident Assurance Society v. Beyer, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 2460; Rice v. Rice, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 635; Manhattan Ins. Co. v. Meyers, 22 Ky. Law Rep., 875; Provident Assurance Society v. Puryear, 22 Ky. Law Rep., 980; Supreme Commandery v. Hughes, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 984.)

In view of the statutes, as interpreted by this court, the application can not be considered in determining the rights of the parties to this controversy. There is another defense based upon a condition in the terms on the policy itself, and which is as follows: "No obligation is assumed by this company upon this policy until the first premium had been paid, and the policy duly delivered, nor unless upon the date of delivery the insured is alive and in sound health."

It is pleaded in the answer that the insured was not in sound health when the policy was delivered, and, therefore, it is argued that the policy is void and never created any obligation upon the company. The policy seems to have been delivered on the 6th of November, 1901, and the insured died in June, 1902. It was not pleaded that there had been any material change in the health of the insured between the date of the application and the time the policy was delivered. The information obtained by the application and the medical examination necessarily relates to the family history of the insured, his previous condition of health and the condition of his health at the time of the examination. It will be observed that in the condition quoted it is stated the policy is not binding "unless upon the date of delivery the insured is alive and in sound health."

This clause does not have reference to any unsoundness of health at the time of or previous to the application and medical examination. Although insured had not been in sound health at that time, and there had been no material change since then and the delivery of the policy, the clause would not render it void. When it is not shown, as in this case, that the unsoundness of health did not occur between the application and medical examination and the delivery of the policy, the company must rely in the statements in the application to void a recovery on the policy, not upon the clause in question. As to what is the meaning of the words "sound health," it is unnecessary here to define or to state what unsoundness of health would prevent recovery, nor as to what delay would estop the insurance company from pleading the cause of the policy referred to as a defense to an action on the policy.

There is another reason why the appellant did not show its right to prevent a recovery upon the policy. The annual premium on the policy was $295.15. If its theory be correct, that the insured was not in sound health and the policy was not obligatory upon it, then before it could prevent a recovery on the policy it should have tendered back the premiums it received. If the policy created no obligation on it, then the company assumed no risk for which it was entitled to be paid the $295.15, or any part of it, nor is it entitled to withhold it. It has not earned any part of it. Suppose the company had brought an action to cancel the policy for the reason that the insured was not in sound health when it was delivered. Most certainly would it have been necessary for it to tender back the money it had received to maintain the action. The mere fact that the insured had accepted the policy when not in sound health, and for that reason it was not obligatory upon the company, would not impose a penalty of $295.15 for the benefit of the company. When a party seeks to cancel a contract upon the ground of fraud or otherwise, he must first offer to restore what he received in consideration of the contract. If A. practices fraud upon B. in the exchange of property, and B. seeks to recover the property which he let A. have, he is not entitled to maintain an action unless he tenders back what he received in the trade. This rule is applicable to the case at bar.

The judgment is affirmed.

STEELE v. FARIS.

(Filed February 17, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Evidence—Custom—Partners—Where it was sought to establish that where two bid on a mail contract, it was the custom to enter the bid only in the name of one of them, and it is not clear from the bill of exceptions what the ruling of the court was intended to be on the admission of evidence as to the partnership, such evidence being sometimes excluded and at other times admitted, and it not being a reversible error to have admitted such testimony where there was no objection, and where the instructions fairly submitted such question to the jury the verdict of the jury supporting the existence of a partnership will not be disturbed.

C. R. Brock, J. A. Craft and J. W. Alcorn for appellant.

W. R. Ramsey, Hazelwood & Parker and H. C. Hazelwood for appellee.

Appeal from Laurel Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

The fact to be established in this case was whether A. K. Cook and S. G. Steele had been partners in the bidding for, and operation of, certain mail route contracts. (See statements of petition Faris v. Cook, 110 Ky., 887; 28 Ky. Law Rep., 828.)

Certain evidence was offered by the surety who had signed the contracts, and who was attempting to hold Steele as a partner of the principal, Cook, that it was the custom at the time these contracts were made for partners who bid on such contracts to enter the bid in the name of only one of the firm. It is not quite clear from the bill of exceptions and evidence what the ruling of the court was intended to be on the admission of this evidence, for we find that in a number of instances it was excluded, in two instances it was admitted over objections, in several others it was admitted without objection from appellant. So that if it was error to have admitted it to be proved by the witnesses when the objection was made, it was not reversible error to have admitted it where the objection was not made. If the same fact be proved without objection it can not be reversible error if evidence of the fact has also been admitted over objection, for if the court had excluded the evidence to which the objection was interposed, notwithstanding that the fact would have been established by other evidence not objected to.

We doubt if the matter sought to be proved as a custom and above discussed was relevant as evidence tending to show that Steele and Cook were in fact partners in these transactions. The witnesses who testified as to the supposed custom only knew of two firms who transacted that character of business under that practice. How long they had so conducted it was not shown, nor was it shown that appellant Steele knew of the custom, or that it was general enough for him to have known of it. We are of opinion that the instructions fairly submitted the question to the jury whether in fact Steele and Cook were partners in the transactions, and the evidence, even aside from that complained of, is sufficient to have sustained the verdict of the jury finding the partnership to have existed.

Perceiving no prejudicial error the judgment is affirmed.

PATTERSON v. MAYSVILLE & BIG SANDY R. R. CO., &c.

(Filed February 16, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Master and servant—While the law in this State is well settled that if the act of the servant was committed in the course of his employment and while acting within the scope of his authority as agent of a corporation, the corporation may be held liable, a corporation is not liable for the malicious acts of an employee which were not committed within the scope of his authority.

A. E. Cole & Son and Allan D. Cole for appellant.

W. H. Wadsworth and E. L. Worthington for appellee.

Appeal from Lewis Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

The appellant, William Patterson, brought this suit against the Maysville & Big Sandy R. R. Co., the Chesapeake & Ohio Ry. Co. and C. R. Morarity. The defendant, Morarity, was not brought before the court by service of summons, and the defendant corporations filed a general demurrer to each paragraph of the petition, which was in three paragraphs, which was sustained by the trial court, and plaintiff's petition dismissed, and he has appealed. In the first paragraph of his petition appellant attempts to state a cause of action for assault and battery; in the second, for false imprisonment; and in the third, for malicious prosecution.

At common law these separate grounds of complaint could not be joined in the same action, but in the Code States, where each cause of action is founded upon and grows out of the same facts, it is generally held that they may be all relied upon in the same action, when stated in separate paragraphs. Good pleadings, however, require that the petition should state the facts relied on for recovery in plain, direct and positive language. Neither of these simple and necessary requirements have been complied with in this case, and we have found some difficulty in determining the exact facts attempted to be relied on in this action. Going upon the theory that the alleged cause of action grows out of the same transaction, and considering each paragraph with reference to this fact, the first paragraph appears to allege that the defendant, Morarity, was a conductor in charge of a train operated by the Chesapeake & Ohio Ry. Co., and that while plaintiff was traveling as a passenger upon this train near Ashland he was forcibly seized, handcuffed and carried by the agents and servants of the company to Vanceburg; and that the defendants' agent in charge of the train could have prevented all these injuries upon him. The second paragraph alleges that Morarity, while in the employ of the defendant as a conductor, caused and permitted him to be assaulted and arrested and carried along the streets of the city of Ashland to a certain office and to the county jail, and suffered him to be imprisoned therein; and publicly carried, handcuffed as a prisoner, through the counties of Boyd, Greenup and Lewis to the city of Vanceburg. In the third paragraph it is alleged that Morarity, while in the employment of the defendant, made an affidavit before the county judge of Boyd county, charging him with the crime of rape on the person of Jennie Bell Murray, whereupon the county judge issued a warrant for his arrest; and that by authority of this warrant he was arrested by the sheriff of Lewis county and confined in the Lewis county jail; that the grand jury of Lewis county refused to indict him for the offense, and he was subsequently discharged. These paragraphs, taken together, appear to allege that the plaintiff was arrested at Ashland, Ky., under a warrant sworn out by R. C. Morarity while he was conductor in the employ of the Chesapeake & Ohio Ry. Co., charging him with the crime of rape, committed in Lewis county; that he was arrested under the warrant and taken on the train of appellee from Ashland to Vanceburg, and confined in jail until after the investigation by the grand jury, who failed to indict him.

Neither of these paragraphs charge that the prosecution or proceedings against appellant were instigated, instituted or continued by the direction or procurement of defendants. The only connection between appellees and the alleged injuries to appellant, attempted to be set out by the petition, is that one of their conductors set the prosecution on foot by swearing out a warrant for his arrest. There has been great diversity of opinion as to whether a corporation was liable for damages for the unauthorized malicious acts of its agents, committed in the course of their employment. But in this State the law is well settled that if the act of the servant was committed in the course of his employment, and while acting within the scope of his authority as agent of the corporation, that they may be so held; but so far as we are advised they have never been held liable for the malicious acts of one of their employes, which was not committed in the scope of their employment or while acting within the line of their duty to the employer. (Lexington Railway Co. v. Cozine, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 1837; Williams v. Southern Railway in Kentucky, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 2214; Lyon v. Pingree, 67 Am. St. Rep., 426; Richmond, &c., Railway Co. v. Jefferson, 32 Am. St. Rep., 100.) It can not for a moment be contended that there was anything in the employment of Morarity, as conductor of one of appellee's trains, which imposed upon him the duty to swear out warrants for the arrest of persons charged with committing rape; nor was it the duty of such conductor, or the employes of the company, after the arrest of such person upon warrant based upon the affidavit of the conductor, to interfere with the arresting officer in taking his person from the point of arrest in Ashland to Vanceburg. We think it necessarily follows that the trial court properly sustained a demurrer to each paragraph of the petition.

Judgment affirmed.

ILLINOIS CENTRAL R. R. CO. v. BROUGHTON.

(Filed February 16, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Railroads—Damages—In an action to recover of appellant for injury sustained by being struck by its train, where appellee was a mere trespasser on the track, having no duty to perform, the employes of the railroad were not bound to anticipate his presence, and not discovering his peril could be guilty of no negligence, and a peremptory instruction should have been given the jury to find for appellant.

H. P. Taylor for appellant.

C. E. Smith, M. L. Heaverin and E. M. Woodward for appellee.

Appeal from Ohio Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

The appellee, at the time of his injury, was in the employ of the Taylor Coal Co., at its mines in Ohio county, Kentucky. His usual business was working under the tipple loading cars, and dressing off the tops of those loaded, so as to prevent the coal from jostling off during the moving of the train, being what is technically called a "trimmer." After the regular working hours it was his duty to clean up the fallen coal around the tipple, and remove sulphur lumps out of the way, and to look up such tools as he and his assistants had been using during the day.

Appellee received the injuries of which he complains at or near 5 o'clock, p. m. The regular work for the outside employes of the company was over at 4 o'clock, p. m.; but appellee and his assistant, Jim Miller, were required to do the extra work of cleaning up sulphur lumps and locking up the tools after the regular day's work was over. This required some twenty or thirty minutes. Appellee testifies that after he and Jim Miller had cleaned up round the tippie he carried about half of the tools over to the toolhouse, and placed them therein; that instead of going back at once for the remainder, he left them where they were, and went up to the company's store, for the purpose of obtaining checks with which to purchase his landlady a lamp and chinney; that after making these purchases he came back with them in his hand, and his dinner bucket on his arm, and thus laden, he undertook to go back to the place where he had left the tools, in order to bring them over to the toolhouse. There were standing upon the switch, which led to the company's tippie, six empty coal cars, which were standing directly between him and the tools on the far side; instead of going around these empty cars he undertook to cross over them by climbing upon one of them, and walking along a projecting plank about eighteen inches wide. While he was thus standing erect upon this plank an engine and nine additional empties were backed in on the switch by the employes of appellant, bumping against those over which appellee was crossing, and throwing him to the ground by the jostle, dragging him some distance, and injuring his leg and heel so severely as to make him permanently a cripple.

Appellee did not know of the immediate proximity of the train, although he had heard it whistle some distance off, but did not hear it whistle at a crossing about two hundred yards from the empties, at which point it was their duty and custom to sound the whistle, upon which appellee and other employes of the mine had come to rely. No bell was sounded, and he did not know of any immediate danger until the train was backed against the empties over which he was crossing.

Upon the trial of the case below the jury awarded a verdict of $1,800 in favor of the appellee, from which judgment this appeal is prosecuted. The first question which arises for decision is whether or not appellant was entitled to a peremptory instruction. According to his own testimony, appellee had no duty to perform which required him to climb upon the empty cars after 4 o'clock; his boarding the empty car, for the purpose of crossing over, was for his own convenience entirely, and not in the discharge of any duty which he owed the mining company; he had no right to use appellant's cars as a passway; having no duty that called him thereon, but using them for his own convenience, he was a mere trespasser, and appellant owed him no duty other than to refrain from injuring him after his perilous position was discovered, of which latter fact there is no evidence in the record. The fact that he had to go back for his tools did not authorize him to cross over appellant's empty cars; its employes were not bound to anticipate his presence where he had neither duty nor right to be, and, owing him no duty, could not be guilty of negligence with regard to him until after his peril was discovered.

This case comes both within the letter and the reasoning of the opinion in the case of the Louisville & Nashville R. R. Co. v. Hocker, 28 Ky. Law Rep., 982. Hocker was in the employ of the Louisville & Nashville R. R. Co. as telegraph operator at its station at Latonia, Ky.; having occasion to go to a water closet placed in the yard for the convenience of the employes, he left his post, walked across the company's tracks, and, instead of going to the closet, went between some cars which were standing on one of the tracks, for his own private purpose. While there an engine was backed against the cars, between which he was standing, seriously injuring him. No whistle was blown, and no bell was rung, to warn him that the engine was about to be backed against the cars. After reviewing the authorities the court said: "The cars between which he was standing were coupled, and there was no reason to expect his presence at that place, and there is no testimony which tends in the slightest degree to show that any servant of the company knew he was there. He knew from long experience that the switch opening from this track to the lead track could be opened, as he testifies, in a second, and was likely to be so opened at any moment. Both ordinary prudence and the rules of the company required that he should look after and be responsible for his own safety. It seems to us from the undisputed facts of this case that as appellee was not in his place of business, or in the discharge of any duty imposed upon him by his employment, the appellant company owed him no duty except to avoid injuring him after it had discovered his perilous position. Even if it be admitted that there was negligence on the part of the employes of the company in running cars upon the switch, the contributory negligence of appellee was so great as to preclude a recovery."

In response to the petition for rehearing, Id. 1274, it was said: "It was gross negligence in appellee to stand between the cars for this purpose, and there being no proof that his danger was perceived by those in charge of the train before the injury, or in time to avoid it, a peremptory instruction should have been given to the jury to find for the defendant. A railway yard is necessarily a dangerous place, and one who goes between standing cars in such a yard for purposes of his own takes the chances of injury." (McDermott, By. &c. v. Ky. Cen. R. R. Co., 14 Ky. Law Rep., 487; Kentucky Cen. R. R. Co. v. Gastineaux, Adm'r, 88 Ky., 132; Brown's Adm'r v. L. & N. R. R. Co., 17 Ky. Law Rep., 145.)

Appellant was injured on the 5th day of February, at or near 5 o'clock, p. m.; it was then dark; he knew that it was about time for the train to come in, and he knew that when it did come in on the switch it was liable to back against the empties over which he was crossing; he heard the train far down the track, but did not know of its immediate proximity; and, as said in the Hooker case, even if it be considered negligence for appellant's employes to back against the empties without warning, appellee's undertaking to cross in the manner in which he did, by walking upon a narrow plank eighteen inches wide, standing perfectly erect, with his hands occupied in holding a lamp and chimney and his dinner bucket, so as to prevent the possibility of his saving himself in case of an accident, was such gross negligence as warranted the granting of appellant's motion for a peremptory instruction. We are of opinion that, upon appellee's own testimony, the court should have awarded the peremptory instruction asked for in favor of appellant.

Judgment reversed for proceedings consistent herewith.

GORMAN v. GLENN.

(Filed February 16, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Presumption that officer performed duty—Where a clerk issued an execution directed to another county it is presumed that the proper affidavit authorizing the issue of such execution was filed, and an allegation in an answer denying that an execution had been issued in the county where judgment had been rendered is insufficient to overthrow the presumption that the clerk properly performed his duty.

Hall & McLean and W. C. Hall for appellant.

Appeal from Kenton Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

D. A. Glenn on January 14, 1897, had an execution issued from the office of the clerk of the Boone Circuit Court in his favor against Eliza Gorman for $67, with interest from September 8, 1877, and $11.90 costs, directed to the sheriff of Kenton county, who levied it on January 8, 1897, on two lots in Covington, Ky., as her property, subject to a mortgage held by the Erlanger Building and Loan Association. She thereupon filed suit in the Boone Quarterly Court, in which the judgment against her had been rendered, enjoining the collection of the execution, but she did not execute the bond to discharge the levy under section 278 of the Civil Code. That case was tried out, and judgment having been given against her dissolving the injunction, she appealed to this court, but her appeal was dismissed for want of jurisdiction. (Gorman v. Glenn, 22 Ky. Law Rep., 839.)

On January 8, 1898, the mortgage held by the building association was released, and on May 6, 1898, Glenn had another execution in his favor issued and levied on the same two lots. On May 26th Eliza Gorman executed to Anna Sullivan a mortgage on the two lots to secure, as recited therein, the payment of $1,400. On December 21, 1900, the injunction suit, having been finally settled, Glenn filed this action against Eliza Gorman and Anna Sullivan, alleging the facts above stated, also that he had a superior lien on the land; that the mortgage from Gorman to Sullivan was executed without consideration, and was given to hinder and delay him in the collection of his debt. He prayed judgment subjecting the property to his claim. Eliza Gorman filed a general demurrer to the petition, and also filed an answer in which she set up again the same matters that had been litigated in the injunction suit. She also denied that the mortgage to Anna Sullivan was without consideration, or made to delay or hinder the plaintiff in the collection of his debt, and alleged that the executions had been issued to the sheriff of Kenton county before there had been any execution issued to the sheriff of Boone county. Anna Sullivan filed an answer, in which she denied that the mortgage to her was without consideration or made to hinder or delay the plaintiff in the collection of his claim, and she alleged that there was no record of the execution liens relied on in Kenton county, no lien of record in the Kenton county clerk's office or circuit clerk's office of either execution at the date the mortgage was given to her, and that she had no notice of the execution levy; but she does not allege that she in fact paid Eliza Gorman any money or parted with any consideration on the faith of the mortgage.

The case being submitted to the court on the pleadings, he entered a judgment directing the land, or so much of it as might be necessary to satisfy the plaintiff's debt and costs, to be sold. The sale was made, and on motion of Anna Sullivan was set aside. She then filed an amended answer, asserting a lien on the property under her mortgage. The court ordered a resale, and at this sale she bought the property for $725, it being appraised at $600. This sale was confirmed without objection. Within two years from the entry of the original judgment Eliza Gorman and Anna Sullivan have sued out from the clerk of this court an appeal therefrom. While ordinarily an execution plaintiff must enforce his execution lien by a sale as provided by the statute, he may file a petition in equity under section 1907a, Kentucky Statutes, to set aside a fraudulent transfer, conveyance or mortgage, and as the chancellor has jurisdiction of the parties, he may grant complete relief while they are before him. The general demurrer to the petition was, therefore, properly overruled. The second execution created a lien on the land without regard to what had been done under the first.

Section 1556, Kentucky Statutes, authorizes the issuing of an execution to a county other than that in which the judgment is rendered, or in which the defendant resides, before an execution has been returned therein no property found, when the plaintiff, his agent or attorney, shall file with the clerk an affidavit stating that the defendant in the judgment has not sufficient property in either of these counties to satisfy the same subject to execution. It must be presumed that the clerk did his duty, and that the proper affidavit was filed before the executions in controversy were issued. The allegation of the answer is insufficient to overthrow the presumption, the allegation being merely that no execution had issued to Boone county. Besides the proper forum for quashing the execution, if this question was desired to be raised, would be the Boone Circuit Court, from whose clerk's office the execution issued.

Anna Sullivan does not state facts sufficient to bring her within subsection 2 of section 2358a, Kentucky Statutes. The execution levy was older in date than her mortgage, and was superior to her unless she was a bona fide purchaser without notice. She does not plead any facts sufficient to show that she was a bona fide purchaser. The statute only protects those who have parted with value without notice of the execution lien where the required memorandum has not been filed in the county clerk's office.

The court ordered only so much of the property sold as was necessary to pay Glenn's debt and costs. This was proper; we must presume that the property was divisible as it consisted of two separate lots. No appeal is taken from the order confirming the second sale, and in fact no exception was filed thereto.

Judgment affirmed.

ILLINOIS CENTRAL R. R. CO. v. GENTRY.

(Filed February 17, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Railroads—Damages—Where appellant, as lessee, agreed by its agent to pay one damages to his land and crops resulting from the construction of a line of road, damages being sustained, where the instructions were proper and the evidence competent and sufficient to authorize the verdict of the jury it will not be disturbed.

Robbins & Thomas, J. M. Dickinson, Pirtle & Trabue and Jacob Corbett, for appellant.

J. M. Nichols & Son for appellee.

Appeal from Ballard Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

The appellant has prosecuted this appeal, asking a reversal of a judgment in favor of appellee for the sum of $600.

The facts as appear of record are in substance as follows: During the year 1902 the applee rented the Halliday farm, which was situated on the river opposite Cairo, Ill. That portion rented by the appellee contained eighty acres, which he planted in corn. During this same year the appellant, as lessee, and in the name of the Chicago, St. Louis & New Orleans R. R. Co., constructed a railroad from the city of Paducah to a point opposite Cairo, Ill., passing through this Halliday farm and the portion rented by appellee. Appellee alleged and proved that on or about the 20th of May in that year, and after his corn was planted and had begun to grow, the agent of the appellant, T. M. Orr, as an inducement to appellee to permit the laborers of the appellant to enter his premises for the construction of the road, promised and agreed to pay him the damages to his interest in the land actually taken for the construction of the road, and also the damages, if any, to the remainder of his corn crop; that upon the faith of this agreement he permitted the laborers to enter his field; that those who constructed the dump did not injure his crop other than that actually destroyed in the construction of the dump. But those who followed and constructed the trestle and bridges, in the latter part of July, left the gates open, tore the fencing down and permitted cattle and hogs in large numbers to enter and destroy his corn crop; that he was able to save only about 500 bushels, when if it had not been destroyed he would have realized about 8,000 bushels.

Appellant claims that Orr did not represent it in the agreement with reference to paying him for his losses, but represented the Chicago, St. Louis & New Orleans R. R. Co., which last-named company was constructing this road, and controverted the damages alleged to have been sustained by appellee.

The evidence was heard on these issues and the jury, under proper instructions, found a verdict for appellee. There was sufficient and competent evidence to authorize the jury to find that the appellant constructed this road in the name of the Chicago, St. Louis & New Orleans R. R. Co.; that T. M. Orr acted as appellant's agent in making the contract with him, and as to the extent of his damages, and we do not feel authorized to disturb their verdict.

Wherefore, the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

JAHN'S ADM'R v. McKNIGHT, &c.

(Filed February 17, 1904.)

Damages—Master and servant—In an action for damages for the death of a boy against appellees, a peremptory instruction to find for appellees was proper where the boy was killed by a delivery wagon whose driver was not a servant of appellees, he conducting a delivery business on his own account and where appellees exercised no control over the driver of the delivery wagon, who was only an independent contractor.

O'Neal & O'Neal for appellant.

Kohn, Baird & Spindle and Stanley E. Sloss for appellees.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Common Pleas Branch, Second Division.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

Albert Jahn, a messenger boy for the Western Union Telegraph Co., fifteen years old, while riding his bicycle on Main street, between Third and Fourth, in Louisville, Ky., was struck and instantly killed by a delivery wagon drawn by a runaway horse that had become frightened at a passing drove of hogs during the absence of his driver, who had gone inside of a store for the purpose of delivering certain packages, leaving the horse unhitched and unattended. The petition alleges that the horse and wagon which caused the death of plaintiff's intestate was in the employ of W. H. McKnight & Co. at the time of the accident, and that the death of the boy was caused by the gross negligence of John Thomas Hooper, the driver, in leaving the horse unhitched and unattended, who it is alleged was a servant of appellee. In the second paragraph of the answer the defendants deny that John Thomas Hooper was in their employ at the time of the runaway, or that either the horse or wagon was their property, or under their dominion or control; and allege that the delivery wagon and horse belonged to Granville Hooper, who carried on an independent hauling and delivery business in the city of Louisville; that for some time prior to the accident Granville Hooper, by contract with them, delivered packages of goods to their customers in the city of Louisville at an agreed price per week; that they had no interest in or control over the manner or means by which this was accomplished; that Hooper had full power and authority to select such means to accomplish this end as he saw fit; and was an independent contractor, and not a servant. At the conclusion of plaintiff's testimony the trial court directed a verdict for the defendant, to which plaintiff excepted, and has appealed. The only question for decision is whether there was any evidence that John Thomas Hooper was defendant's servant at the time of the accident.

Upon the trial Granville Hooper was called as a witness by the plaintiff, and testified that at the time of the accident he carried on a hauling and delivery business in the city of Louisville; that he also ran a stone quarry and delivered stone for building foundations for houses, and operated two wagons and teams in this business; that he also had a contract with defendants to deliver packages to their customers in a one-horse delivery wagon at the price of $18 per week; that if they had more work in this line than the one-horse delivery wagon could perform that he furnished extra teams and received extra pay for it, or they would call in other wagons to do it; that if defendants did not need the services of his wagon and driver at any time he was at liberty to haul for any one else; that usually his delivery wagon would call at the store of defendants some time in the morning from 7 to 9 o'clock to see if they had any packages to deliver; that if there were any he always found them piled up in the front part of the store addressed to the person for whom they were intended; that the wagon and horse were his property; that he hired the driver and paid all necessary expenses for running the wagon; that the defendants under their contract with him had no right to employ or discharge the driver, or to direct how or in what manner his work should be done; that the driver of the wagon was in his service, and not in that of the defendants.

Thompson on Negligence, says:

"Section 631. It is a general rule that one who has contracted with a competent and fit person, exercising an independent employment, to do a piece of work, not in itself unlawful, or of such a nature that it is likely to become a nuisance, or to subject third persons to unusual danger, according to the contractor's methods and without being subject to control except as to the result of his work, and subject to other qualifications hereafter stated, will not be answerable for the wrongs of such contractor, his subcontractors, or his servants, committed in the prosecution of such work.

"Section 632. An independent contractor within the meaning of this rule is one who renders service in the course of an occupation, representing the will of his employer only as to the result of his work, and not as to the means by which it is accomplished. The contractor must answer for his own wrongs and the wrongs committed in the course of the work by his servants.

"Section 633. One who, under a public license, exercises a certain employment on behalf of any member of the public who may hire him, such as a licensed public drayman, does not stand in the relation of servant of one who may hire him to do a particular job, such as he is licensed to do, but he is deemed an independent contractor within the meaning of subdivision 11."

Shearman and Redfield on Negligence, section 164, defines an independent contractor as follows: "Although in a general sense every person who enters into a contract may be called a contractor, yet that word, for want of a better one, has come to be used with special reference to a person who in the pursuit of an independent business undertakes to do a specific piece of work for other persons, using his own means and methods without submitting himself to their control in respect to all its details. The true test of a contractor would seem to be that he renders service in the course of an independent occupation, representing the will of his employer only as to the result of his work and not as the means by which it is accomplished."

In Roberson, &c. v. Webb, 74 Ky., 464, it was decided that in order that the relation of master and servant should exist, the parties sought to be charged as master must have the right to control the person with whose negligence it is sought to charge him. "He is deemed to be the master who has the supreme choice, control and direction of the servant, and whose will the servant represents not merely in the ultimate results of the work, but in all the details."

sachusetts, the court had before it the same question involved upon this appeal. In that case the defendant was engaged in a general teaming business, owned the horse and wagon, driven by K., employed K., paid him his wages. The defendant contracted with another company to do its hauling, and K. reported each morning with the horse and wagon at the office of the company, and was thereafter engaged in carrying out the orders of that company's foreman. K. had exclusive control of the management of the horse and wagon, chose his own route, harnessed and unharnessed the horse, and at night returned it to the defendant's stable. It was held in an action for injuries to a person in the street by being struck by such horse and wagon, while driven by K. in performing the orders of such company, that the evidence was sufficient to authorize a finding that K. was the servant of the defendant, and not of the company. In discussing the case Chief Justice Holmes said: "In cases like the present there is a general consensus of authority that although a driver may be ordered by those who have dealt with his master to go to this place or to that, to take this or that burden, to hurry, or to take his time, nevertheless in respect to the manner of his driving and the control of his horse he remains subject to no orders but those of the man who pays him. Therefore, he can make no one else liable, if he negligently runs a person down in the street."

In this case appellee exercised no control over the driver of this wagon. They did not employ or pay him; had no right to discharge or to direct in any manner how his work should be done, further than that the package should be promptly delivered to the addressee. Under this state of fact the driver of the wagon was not the servant of appellee, and consequently there could be no liability on their part for his negligence. We, therefore, conclude that the instruction of the trial court to find for the defendant was not error.

This conclusion is not in conflict with the opinion in Adams Express Co. v. Scofield, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 1120. In that case the alleged independent contractor was the sole representative of the defendant at Shelbyville, and in complete charge of all its business at that point, and subject to its orders.

Judgment affirmed.

MOONEY, &c. v. KENTUCKY WESTERN RY. CO., &c.

(Filed February 18, 1904—Not to be reported.)

M. C. & G. D. Givens for appellants.

W. E. Bourland, J. M. Dickinson and Pirtle & Trabue for appellees.

Appeal from Webster Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

Substantially the same questions are involved in this case as were in the case of H. M. Curry v. The Kentucky Western Ry. Co., and by the authority of the opinion delivered in that case, ante, 1872, February 3, 1904, the judgment is affirmed.

DOWELL, &c. v. WORKMAN, &c.

(Filed February 18, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Wills—Antenuptial contract—Where the deviser in a will divided his property among his wife and children, designating with particularity the part that each was to receive, the fact that he had entered into an ante-nuptial contract with the wife did not prevent her from taking under the will, that instrument charging her with the amount settled upon her by the marriage contract, and his having clearly shown in the will that the part devised to her was given as a supplement of the amount due her under the antenuptial contract.

Noggle & Graham and Eugene Hubbard for appellants.

B. W. Penick for appellee, Annie Workman.

Appeal from Green Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

This appeal involves the interpretation of the will of A. K. Workman, deceased. The controversy is as to the meaning of items 8 and 12, which read as follows:

"Item 8. To my beloved wife, Annie Workman, I will and bequeath my buggy horse, which I call Celam, which is to be charged to her, for the purpose hereinafter mentioned, at the price of $90; also my buggy and buggy harness, which are to be charged to her at the price of $25; also my Jersey cow, named 'Patsey,' which is to be charged to her at the price of $35; also my white-faced cow, named 'Bally,' which is to be charged to her at the price of $35; also one share in the capital stock of the Greensburg Deposit Bank, which is to be charged to her at the price of $100; also one $20 gold coin, which coin has engraved on the eagle side the words: 'United States of America Twenty Dollars;' on the reverse side of said coin is the head of 'Liberty,' and the date '1861,' which coin is to be charged to her at the price of $20; also one large arm cushion chair, with rollers and adjustable back, being the chair which I purchased of W. E. Ward, which is to be charged to her at the price of $3; also thirty barrels of corn, which is not to be charged to her at all; also eight thousand pounds of good hay, which is not to be charged to her at all; I also will and desire that my beloved wife and her three infant children, Della L. Workman, Mary F. Workman and Ruth Workman, live with my two sons, Demmon K. Workman and William Robert Workman on my home place on Big Russell creek, in Green county, Kentucky, until the 25th day of December, 1906; and it is my desire that my said wife, her three infant children and my said two sons, Demmon K. Workman and William Robert Workman, live together on said farm and enjoy all the rights and privileges incident to said farm and necessary to render their home life on said farm pleasant and comfortable; that my said wife and two sons jointly run and cultivate said farm for their mutual benefit as aforesaid, and that at the end of each year my said wife shall receive one-third of the net proceeds of said farm and my two sons one-third each of said net proceeds; but in the event my said wife does not desire to reside with my said sons on said farm, I still desire her to have one-third of the net rents and profits of said farm. In making this will it is not my intention to change, cancel, modify or annul in any way whatever the antenuptial contract entered into between me and Annie Moss, now Annie Workman, on October 30, 1898, but the same shall remain in full force and effect. It is simply my intention to reward her kindness and devotion to me by supplementing the amount secured to her by said antenuptial contract with the additional amount she will receive under the provisions of this will; but in the event she renounces the provisions of the will, I desire that said contract shall regulate and control the marital rights existing between her and me and my estate.

"Item 12. It is my desire, and I so will and bequeath, that each of my children, to wit, Luella A. Dowell, Effie E. Buckner, Demmon K. Workman, William Robert Workman, Della L. Workman, Mary F. Workman and Ruth Workman, have and receive each one-eighth part of my estate, and that my wife receive the other eighth part of my estate; but that Luella A. Dowell be charged with $940; that Effie E. Buckner be charged with $215; that Demmon K. Workman be charged with $2,068; that William Robert Workman be charged with $2,139; that Della L. Workman be charged with $100; that Mary F. Workman be charged with $100, and that Ruth Workman be charged with $200; and that my said wife be charged with $1,608, these amounts thus charged to my children being the value of the property heretofore devised and the advancements heretofore mentioned in the various items of this will, and the amount charged to my wife being the actual value of her interest in the $2,000, as secured to her by the antenuptial contract entered into by and between my wife and me on the 30th day of October, 1898, which actual value of her interest in said contract being estimated by me at the date of this will at $1,300, and the value of property bequeathed to my said wife in item 3 of this will being $308, the two amounts added together making $1,608; that in order to produce equality in the division of my estate the above amounts shall be treated in the same manner as advancements are treated under section 1407 of Kentucky Statutes, that is, the amount that each of the devisees receives as above stated must be regarded as a part of the one-eighth that such devisee is to receive under this will; and that each devisee is to receive one-eighth of my entire estate, including the property, bank stock, money and advancements heretofore mentioned."

The testator in item 3 said that it was his intention to supplement "the amount secured to her by said antenuptial contract with the additional amounts she will receive under the provisions of this will." By item 12 he bequeathed to his seven children each one-eighth of his estate, and to his wife, Annie Workman, the other eighth part of it. After doing this he designated the amount with which each child is to be charged as an advancement. And in the same connection he provides that his wife is to be charged with $1,608, "actual value of her interest in the $2,000, as secured to her by the antenuptial contract, * * * being estimated by me at the date of this will at $1,300, and the value of the property bequeathed to my said wife in item 3 being $308, the amounts added together making $1,608."

The testator says to produce equality in the division of his estate the amounts which he charges to his children and his wife shall be treated as advancements as under section 1407, Kentucky Statutes. The testator fearing that his will might be misunderstood, further explains his meaning by saying that the amount that each of the devisees receives "must be regarded as part of the one-eighth that such devisee is to receive under this will; and that each devisee is to receive one-eighth of my entire estate, including the property, bank stock, money and advancements heretofore mentioned." It seems to us that we can not employ language which would make the intention of the testator plainer than was done by the language used by him. His evident purpose was to respect the antenuptial contract and to supplement it with one-eighth of his estate, less the amount due on such contract. He did not intend to give his wife one-eighth of his estate regardless of the amount due her under the antenuptial contract. He wanted to give her a child's part, but thought proper in giving her the one-eighth of his estate, the amount which she was to receive under the antenuptial contract should be estimated as part of his estate the same as should be the advancements with which he charged his children. While he gave her one-eighth of his estate, he prescribed the rule by which the amount of his estate should be ascertained and which required the amount due his wife under the antenuptial contract to be estimated as part of it. If he had not so intended there was no occasion for making any reference in item 12 to the amount due her under the antenuptial contract. The explanation which he makes in that item of his will shows what part of his estate was given as a supplement to the amount due under the antenuptial contract. The amount which the widow receives under the will is much greater than that she would have received under the antenuptial contract, and that excess is the supplementary amount referred to in the third item of the will.

The judgment is reversed for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

INDIANA ROAD MACHINE CO. v. LEBANON CARRIAGE AND IMPLEMENT CO.

(Filed February 18, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Contracts—Commissions—In an action to recover commissions for the sale of an article which was sold upon condition that the sale might be countermanded, if done within a given time, and such sale was countermanded and another article sold by another party, the original seller took the risk of not consummating the sale of his article, and he can not recover commissions.

C. S. Hill for appellant.

Appeal from Marion Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

Appellees were agents of appellant for the year 1899 for the sale of certain machinery, including its stone crushers, in the counties of Marion, Washington and Nelson; they learned that Nelson county was contemplating the purchase of two rock crushers and so notified appellant, requesting it by telegram to send expert with model machine to meet one of them at the Bardstown fair grounds the next day, it being stipulated in the contract that appellant would do this if requested. The parties met at the fair ground and the committee made an order for two rock crushers complete at $1,750, but reserved the right to countermand the order at any time within three days. On the same day the agent of the Champion crushers offered the committee two machines for $1,800, and the committee then countermanded the order for appellant's machines. After this appellees made an arrangement for another meeting with the committee, and notified appellant to send the man there again to meet them on a certain day. Before this day arrived, however, appellant's man went to Bardstown the second time, and finding that he could not sell his machines to the county for more than $1,800, finally, rather than be underbid by the Champion Co., sold the crushers to the county for $1,800, appellees not being present or consulted. By the contract of agency appellees were to have for their commission all amounts that machinery sold for over and above the net list prices at the factory. The net price got for the two machines by the agent was not as much as the list price referred to. Appellees then sued appellant for their commission on the sale and recovered judgment for $428.70, which would have been their commissions if the sale had stood at $1,750. The proof on the trial shows that the machines could not have been sold to the county except at the price of $1,800, and that the agent did his best to get more, but failed, simply because of the bid of the Champion Co. Whether the appellees are entitled to recover commission on the sale depends on whether or not their contract created an exclusive agency for the sale of the machinery in the territory named. So far as material to this question the written contract is as follows:

"Indiana Road Machine Co., of Fort Wayne, Ind., of the first part, and Lebanon Carriage and Implement Co., of Lebanon, county of Marion and State of Kentucky, of the second part:

"Witnesseth: Said party of the first part, in consideration of the agreement by the party of the second part, hereinafter mentioned, hereby agrees:

"1st. To authorize said party of the second part to sell under the stipulations and conditions of this contract The Indiana Reversible Road Machine, Indiana Stone Crusher, Indiana Reversible Road Roller, Drag and Wheel Scrapers, and Plows, in and for the following-named territory only: Marion and Washington and Nelson counties in Kentucky, said sale privilege to become exclusive on Indiana Reversible Road Machines only, for 1899, as soon as said party shall have sold one machine therein, from the date of this contract until date of final settlement mentioned below."

In Aultman & Taylor Co. v. Joplin, &c., 8 Ky. Law Rep., 62, it was held as follows: "Under a contract whereby appellant agreed to furnish appellee with machines and to allow them certain commissions on each sale within a certain territory, appellant was not precluded from making sales within that territory, and appellees are not entitled to commissions on sales made by appellant, there being nothing in the contract which conferred on appellees the exclusive right to sell within the designated territory."

The contract before us authorizes the appellees to sell the road machines, the stone crushers, the road rollers, the drag and wheel scrapers, and plows, in the counties named. So far there is nothing in the contract from which an exclusive agency can be inferred. Then these words are added: "Said sale privilege to become exclusive on Indiana Reversible Machines only, for 1899, as soon as said party shall have sold one machine therein, from the date of this contract until date of final settlement mentioned below."

The contract is dated April 29, 1899, and the final settlement was to be made December 1, 1899. The natural meaning of the words quoted is that the sale privilege is to become exclusive on Indiana Reversible Road Machine only, and that this exclusive privilege on the road machine is only to begin as soon as the second party has sold one machine. Otherwise, we do not see what effect would be given the word "only." If the parties had meant to say that the sale privilege should become exclusive on all the machinery, and not on the road machines only, from the time that the second parties sold one road machine, it can not be presumed that they would not have used words indicative that the sale privilege was to be exclusive as to the other machines, but only exclusive on the Indiana Reversible Road Machine from the time the second party sold one road machine. An exclusive agency will not be created by implication where the words of the contract do not naturally import this meaning. Appellees had not sold a road machine.

As the contract does not create an exclusive agency, appellant might lawfully sell the machinery in the territory named. Still if it sold to a customer gotten by appellees, it would be responsible to appellees for their commissions on the sale where appellees would have been entitled to commission had they gone on and completed the sale themselves. But in this case if appellees had made the sale themselves they would have been entitled to no commission for the reason that the price got for the two crushers was less than the net list price therefor, and they were only to have for commissions the excess over and above the list prices. While the result is a hardship on appellees, as they are out the time and money spent by them in the negotiation, still they took the risk of this on the chance of getting the full commission if the sale at $1,750 had gone through. As it is, appellant is about $200 worse off than it would have been if that sale had stood, and it can not in addition be made liable to appellees for commission.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded, with directions to dismiss the petition.

DODSON v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed February 18, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Criminal law—Bill of exceptions—Where the bill of exceptions does not show that the Commonwealth's attorney made any statement in argument to which the defendant objected, or that he excepted to the ruling of the court as to such question, the verdict will not be disturbed, nor can the bill of exceptions when signed by the judge be assailed by affidavits of the parties or of bystanders.

E. E. McKay and Edwards & Ogden for appellant.

N. B. Hays and Loraine Mix for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Criminal Branch.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

The indictment under which the appellant was tried charges him with the murder of Henry Warner, and the jury found him guilty of manslaughter. The principal ground relied upon for reversal is alleged objectionable statements made by the Commonwealth's attorney to the jury in closing the argument in the case.

The bill of exceptions signed by the judge does not show that the Commonwealth's attorney made any statement in argument to which the defendant objected, or that he excepted to the ruling of the court on any question as to the propriety of the argument of the Commonwealth's attorney. The defendant seeks to supplement the bill of exceptions, or to impeach its correctness, by affidavits which were filed on the motion for a new trial. These affidavits purport to give the alleged objectionable remarks of the Commonwealth's attorney. The judge certified to his own rulings and exceptions taken during the progress of the trial, and the validity of the bill of exceptions as thus made can not be assailed by bystanders or the affidavits of the parties interested in the litigation. (Garrott v. Ratliff, 83 Ky., 889; Patterson v. Commonwealth, 86 Ky., 325.)

The judgment is affirmed.

CINCINNATI, NEW ORLEANS & TEXAS PACIFIC RY. CO. V.
VAUGHT.

1. Railroads—Damages—Contributory negligence—In an action for damages where contributory negligence was affirmatively pleaded and there was evidence to support such plea, an instruction based upon such defense should have been given.

2. Same—Instructions—In an action against a railroad company for injuries sustained by being struck by a heavy door of a refrigerator car, which being open struck appellant's platform and was slammed with such violence as to injure appellee, who was looking out of the window of the car, there should have been an instruction to the effect that it was the duty of the company to exercise reasonable care not to inflict injury and if its agents failed to warn appellee that the car which he was in was about to be moved it was guilty of negligence.

O. H. Waddle and John Galvin for appellant.

Denton & Robinson for appellee.

Appeal from Pulaski Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

The appellant, Cincinnati, New Orleans & Texas Pacific R. R. Co., is a corporation operating a railroad through the State of Kentucky, a part of its line being in Pulaski county. The appellee, D. F. Vaught, was at the time of the occurrence which produced this litigation in the employment of the Somerset Ice Co. The appellant had hauled a refrigerator car loaded with ice to the place of business of the Somerset Ice Co., and left it there to be unloaded. Appellee, by order of his employer, had unloaded the ice from the car, and was engaged in cleaning out the straw on the floor and gathering up the ice hooks for the purpose of turning over the car, unloaded and cleaned, to appellant; but just before he left it an engine in the custody and control of appellant's employes backed down, coupled on to the empty car and hauled it away. The door of the car, which was large and heavy, opened out on hinges, and was swinging open when it started. After the car started appellee went to the door, in order to look out, and, as he says, to see where he was being carried, at which time the heavy door, which was swinging outwardly, struck against a platform, which constituted a part of appellant's station, with such violence that it was slammed to, striking him on the head, shoulder and abdomen, knocking him senseless, and severely injuring him.

Appellee's evidence was to the effect that he was not notified of the fact that appellant's servants were about to move the car, and knew nothing of their purpose so to do, until it was started on its journey away from the place where it had been standing; that being a refrigerator car, there was no place from which he could look out except the open door, and that he went to this door to look out and see where he was being carried.

For the appellant John Starkie testified that he was one of the brakemen in charge of the train which moved the car upon which appellee was engaged in working; that before the engine was attached to it he saw appellee, and told him he must get out, as they were going to take it away; that appellee answered "all right," and at once threw out some of his implements; whereupon he, supposing appellee had left the car, gave the signal which started it on its destination.

The jury returned a verdict of five hundred dollars in favor of appellee, of which appellant is now complaining.

The court gave two instructions, one of which, marked "B," is as follows: "It was the duty of the defendant in handling its cars to do so in such manner as not to inflict injury upon any person who had the right to be upon or in any of the said cars of defendant, and if the defendant's agents failed to use due care and diligence to ascertain plaintiff's presence and warn him of danger, they were guilty of negligence."

It is complained by appellant that the effect of this instruction was to make it the insurer of the safety of appellee, and we are inclined to think it justly subject to this criticism. It may be that the court intended the last half of the instruction to qualify the language of the first half, but we doubt if this is accomplished. The first half relates to the handling of the cars, whereas the last half is applicable alone to give him warning of the danger incident to starting the train in motion.

Appellee was not injured by the starting of the car, and was in no danger from that fact. His injury accrued from the fact that appellant's servants were hauling the car away with the door swinging open, so that it struck the platform and was slammed to with such violence as to inflict the injury which appellee received.

We think the court should have instructed the jury that it was the duty of the defendant, in handling the car, to exercise reasonable care and diligence not to inflict injury upon appellee, and if the defendant's agents failed to warn him that the car was about to be moved, they were guilty of negligence.

We think the court also erred in refusing to give any instruction on the subject of the contributory negligence of the appellee. This was affirmatively pleaded by appellant, and there was evidence which, if true, supported it; it was, therefore, entitled to an instruction based upon this theory of its defense.

Instruction No. 2, offered by appellant, modified as follows, should also have been given:

"If the jury believe from the evidence that the plaintiff was notified that the car in which he was working was about to be moved, and he was required to leave it, and assented thereto, and appellant's agents in charge of the train believed, and had reasonable grounds to believe, at the time it started he had left the car, they should find for the defendant."

Negligence and ordinary care should have been defined to the jury substantially as contained in instruction No. 4, tendered by appellant.

Appellee was not bound to jump from the car after it started, as is contended for by appellant, although he might think that could be done with safety; and if the car was being hauled off with him in it, without his knowing where he was being taken, it was but natural for him, and he had the right, to go to the door, which afforded the only means of obtaining the information he desired of the situation, although he might have known there was danger attending his doing so; but he was not entitled to unnecessarily place himself in peril, and the question, whether he did or not do so, under all the circumstances of this case, was a question for the jury. His perturbation of mind would necessarily be increased or diminished by the fact as to whether he was being carried far from home, or merely shifted around in appellant's yards, with the opportunity, after a few minutes, of being allowed to leave the car in safety.

For the reasons indicated the judgment is reversed for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

ADKINS v. WILLIAMS.

Appeals—An appeal will lie to this court from a judgment of $75.00 although the cause of action grew out of a conveyance of real estate, the judgment itself being simply personal.

Roscoe Vanover for appellant.

Appeal from Pike Circuit Court.

Appellees filed this action alleging in their petition that on April 30, 1894, appellant, in consideration of $315 in hand paid, conveyed to appellee Sanders a tract of land in fee simple, with general warranty, fraudulently concealing from her that he had previously conveyed away the minerals, coal, etc., under the land; they alleged that the minerals under the land were of the value $75, and prayed judgment against him for $75 in damages. The defendant answered, denying the fraud and pleading five years' limitation, but admitted the conveyance of the land with warranty, and that he had previously sold the coal and mineral privileges. The court sustained a demurrer to his answer and gave judgment against the defendant for $75. From this judgment he appeals.

By section 950, Kentucky Statutes, no appeal shall be taken to the Court of Appeals from a judgment for the recovery of money or personal property if the value in controversy is less than $300, exclusive of interest and costs. The judgment appealed from is simply a personal judgment for $75. The matter in controversy is, therefore, not within the jurisdiction of this court.

The fact that the cause of action grew out of a conveyance of land does not affect the rule. The judgment is simply for the recovery of money and for an amount less than $300. No question of title to land is involved. The only thing in contest is the matter of damages. The amount of the judgment determines the jurisdiction of this court in such cases. The appeal, is therefore, dismissed.

CORNETT, &c. v. COMMONWEALTH.

Peace bonds—Section 382 of the Criminal Code, providing that a defendant may be required to give surety to keep the peace where it appears that he is about to commit violence endangering human life, or is about to commit an offense amounting to a felony, the sureties in such bond are not liable where he was convicted for selling spirituous, vinous or malt liquors, that offense not being a breach of the bond.

Cook & Jones for appellants.

Appeal from Leslie Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

On March 26, 1903, James H. Cornett being in custody and required by the Leslie Circuit Court to give bond in the sum of $500 to keep the peace and be of good behavior to all the citizens of the Commonwealth for the period of one year from that date, H. H. Hensley and A. B. Asher appeared in open court and entered into a bond to the Commonwealth of Kentucky, conditioned that for the period of twelve months Cornett would keep the peace and be of good behavior to all persons of the Commonwealth, and that during this period he would not be guilty of any offense involving a breach of the peace or of any felony, nor engage in the unlawful sale of spirituous vinous or malt liquors, directly or indirectly, nor aid any one thus offending, nor permit same to be sold on his premises, and if he failed to perform any of these conditions they would pay to the Commonwealth $500. At the June term, 1903, Cornett was indicted for selling spirituous, vinous and malt liquors to Hiram Begley and A. B. Couch in June of that year, contrary to the local prohibitory law in force in the counties of Bell, Harlan, Perry and Leslie, approved February 9, 1884. He was tried on this indictment at the March term, 1903, and convicted. Thereupon this proceeding was instituted on the bond referred to against his sureties. They demurred to the petition; their demurrer was overruled. They then filed answer denying that Cornett had sold any whisky in Leslie county to Begley or Couch. The court sustained a demurrer to their answer and gave judgment against them. From this judgment they appeal.

By section 382 of the Criminal Code if the defendant has threatened to commit an offense against the person or property of another, and there are reasonable grounds to fear the commission of the offense threatened, or if he is about to commit violence endangering human life, or is about to commit an offense amounting to a felony, and there are reasonable grounds for apprehending such violence or felony, the defendant may be required to give surety to keep the peace or for his good behavior. By section 891 a judicial conviction of the defendant for an offense involving a breach of the peace, or for a felony within the time specified in the bond, is a breach of the bond. Under these provisions it has been held that a conviction of the defendant of an offense not amounting to felony, and not involving a breach of the peace, is not a breach of the bond. (Rankin v. Commonwealth, 72 Ky., 553; Commonwealth v. Mahoney, 2 Ky. Law Rep., 814.) The conviction, therefore, for selling spirituous, vinous and malt liquors in violation of the local prohibitory law was not a breach of the bond.

There is nothing in the Code of Practice authorizing the court to put the defendant under bond except the provisions of sections 888-891 above referred to, and these do not refer to offenses not amounting to a breach of the peace or to a felony. We have examined the local prohibitory act above referred to (1 Acts 1888-4, page 214), and the act amendatory thereof (Acts 1887-8, page 874), and find nothing in them authorizing such a bond to be taken. We have been referred to no statute giving the court power to require the execution of a bond of this character. The act of March, 1903, had not taken effect when this proceeding was had. In the absence of some statutory authority the court was without power to take the bond in so far as it provided as to the sale of spirituous, vinous and malt liquors, and the bond was to this extent without consideration and void.

The judgment appealed from is, therefore, reversed and the cause remanded, with directions to dismiss the proceeding.

MARKS & STIX v. HARDY'S ADM'R.

1. Partnerships—Evidence—In a defense to an action by one on the ground that he was not a partner, reports of mercantile agents or the general report in the neighborhood are inadmissible to establish the existence of the partnership, it not being shown that such reports were founded upon any statements made by the alleged partner.

2. Same—Where there was no evidence to show that the father knew his son was carrying on a store in his name, to hold him responsible as a partner would be to place him wholly in the power of designing persons who had it in mind to ruin him.

3. Same—Where one was defending an action on the ground that he was not a partner, evidence of compromise was properly rejected where it did not appear that such party made any offer of compromise or knew that such offer was made.

W. B. Pugh, S. J. Pugh and Robt. D. Wilson for appellants.

W. C. Halbert and T. R. Phister for appellee.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

The appellants, Marks & Stix, are boot and shoe merchants of Cincinnati, Ohio. At the time this action was instituted William Hardy resided in Vanceburg, Lewis county, Kentucky. A. T. Hardy, who is his son, lived at Willard, Carter county, Kentucky, where he carried on a general store under the firm name of William Hardy & Son.

The firm of William Hardy & Son, in June, 1900, purchased of the appellant four hundred and fifty dollars worth of shoes on credit. The bill not having been paid when it fell due, this action was instituted against William Hardy and A. T. Hardy, as composing the firm of William Hardy & Son. A. T. Hardy made no defense; William Hardy filed an answer, putting in issue the fact that he was a member of the firm in question. After the issues were made up William Hardy died, and the action was, by consent, revived in the name of his administrator, Andrew J. Hardy.

About a year after the completion of the issues, the action coming on for trial, appellants offered to file an amended petition, setting up certain matters alleged in the way of estoppel as against William Hardy. The motion to file this amendment, upon objection, was overruled by the court. Upon the trial the jury returned a verdict in favor of appellee, of which the appellants are now complaining.

The uncontradicted facts show that William Hardy was a man about seventy-one years of age, and that he lived in Vanceburg, Lewis county, Kentucky, from fifty to seventy-five miles from Willard, Carter county, Kentucky; that for many years prior to the events constituting the subject-matter of this litigation he had been engaged in the business of buying and selling staves for wine casks, and had built up quite a reputation in this business, and accumulated some money; that his son, A. T. Hardy, was not of age, and that his father sent him over to Willard for the purpose of buying wine cask staves for cash; that after he was settled there he opened up a general merchandise store, under the firm name and style of William Hardy & Son, which was the name of the firm engaged in the business of buying and selling wine cask staves; that he advertised the store under the firm name of William Hardy & Son and all of his bill heads and letters were so marked, but that there was no sign over the store.

The first error complained of is the refusal of the court to permit the amended petition to be filed after the case was called for trial. The issues had been made up for fully a year theretofore. William Hardy had in the meantime died, and the conduct of the defense to the action was in the hands of his administrator. We do not think, under these circumstances, that the court abused the large discretion conferred upon it in the matter of permitting amendments to be filed by refusing the one in question. (Elizabethtown, Lexington & Big Sandy R. R. Co. v. Catlettsburg Water Co., 22 Ky. Law Rep., 1632.)

The second error complained of by appellants is the refusal of the court to permit them to prove by mercantile agents' reports who composed the firm of William Hardy & Son, or the general report in and around Willard, that the partnership was composed of William Hardy and A. T. Hardy. It was not shown that the mercantile agents' reports were based upon any information given by William Hardy, or by any one authorized by him, or that he knew that such reports were being gotten up, or that he knew of the existence of what is called the "general reputation" that he was a member of the firm. The great weight of authority, as well as sound reason, is against the admissibility of this evidence. The Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, volume 22, 2d edition, page 50, thus states the rule as to "general reputation:"

"The existence or nonexistence of a partnership between certain persons cannot be proved by evidence of general reputation or understanding that such persons were or were not partners, and such evidence is inadequate even in aid of other testimony to the same effect. But evidence of general reputation in the community is admissible to show that plaintiff gave credit in reliance upon the supposed partnership, and this evidence has been admitted where it appeared that such common report was known to the partners sought to be charged."

The learned author also lays down the rule that reports from a mercantile agency are inadmissible.

The inadmissibility of general reputation to establish a partnership is sustained by the following cases: Cook v. Slate Co., 38 Am. Rep., 568; Hunt v. Jucks, 1 Am. Dec., 555; Grafton Bank v. Moore, 38 Am. Dec., 478; Smith v. Griffith, Id., 639; Macey v. Combs, 77 Am. Dec., 103; Adams v. Morrison, 113 N. Y. Rep., 152; Brown v. Crandall, 11 Conn., 92; Tanner & Co. v. Hall, & Co., 86 Ala., 805; Stlewell v. Borman, 63 Ark., 30; Bowen v. Rutherford, 14 Am. Rep., 25; Earl v. Hurd, 5 Blackford (Ind.), 248; Bryden v. Taylor, 3 Am. Dec., 554; Goddard v. Pratt, 16 Pick., 412; Sager v. Tripper, 38 Mich., 259; Taylor v. Webster, 39 N. J. Law, 102; Halliday v. McDougall, 20 Wend., 81.

William Hardy was an old man, and lived from fifty to seventy-five miles from Willard. There is no evidence in the record to show that he knew his son was carrying on a general merchandise store under his name, or that he ever heard any of the rumors that he was a member of the firm. To hold one responsible as a partner under such evidence would be to place him wholly in the power of designing persons, who had it in mind to ruin him. As well said by Judge Cowen, in the case of Halliday v. McDougall: "There is scarcely a question upon which common reputation is more fallible. A contract of partnership is, in its nature, incapable of being defined by laymen, and whether an apparent partnership be really so, or a contract of some other character, is often a most embarrassing legal question with the ablest lawyers. General reputation of the ordinary contracts, the legal nature and effect of which are understood by men of business in general, would be much more proper subject of proof by general report. This the law rejects, yet I am not aware that there is a necessity for resort to such proof in the one case more than the other."

In Brown v. Crandall, 11 Conn., 92, the court said: "A person of doubtful credit might cause a report to be circulated that another person was in partnership with him, for the very purpose of maintaining his credit. His creditors might also aid in circulating the report for the purpose of furnishing evidence to enable them to collect their debts."

The court also properly rejected the evidence of the compromise sought to be introduced by appellants. It did not appear that William Hardy made any offer of compromise himself, or authorized any one to do so for him, or that he knew that such an offer was made. Neither his assignee nor the attorney of the assignee was his agent for this purpose.

It is also complained that the court erred in permitting A. H. Parker to testify of declarations of William Hardy as to the existence of the firm of William Hardy & Son at the time the articles of dissolution between himself and his son were signed. It seems when William Hardy finally heard that his son was engaged in the business of general merchandise at Willard in his name that he went with his lawyer, A. H. Parker, to Willard, and then and there severed all business connection with him; in pursuance of which formal articles of dissolution were drawn up and signed by the parties. Appellants introduced A. H. Parker as their witness, to show the contents of this paper (having given notice to the appellee requiring its production at the trial) for the purpose of establishing the fact that the existence of the firm was recognized by William Hardy in the articles of dissolution. This evidence having been introduced by appellants, appellee undertook to show by Parker that, although William Hardy finally signed the articles of dissolution, he, at the time, denied the existence of the firm, and only signed the paper upon the assurance of his counsel that it was right so to do, and would not obligate or bind him as a partner.

The court very properly admitted this evidence. It constituted a part of the transaction, which appellants had themselves undertaken to introduce. The rule is elementary that where a transaction is placed in evidence, all that took place at the same time, and which was a part of it, may also be shown. One can not introduce a part of a conversation or transaction which he deems to his interest and exclude the remainder. What was said by William Hardy at the time the articles of dissolution between his son and himself were drawn up and signed was a part of the transaction itself, and he had the right to introduce his declarations on the subject, in order to show his construction of his position in the matter. Nor was this in violation of the rule against introducing oral testimony to alter or modify a written contract, in the absence of an allegation of fraud or mistake. That rule might apply as between the father and son, but it has no place in the controversy between William Hardy and appellants. In speaking upon this subject, in the case of Strader v. Lambeth, &c., 7 B. Mon., 589, it was said: "Between the parties to the instrument such evidence, it is true, is only admissible when the party offering it first shows that the writing, either by fraud or mistake, was drawn differently from what the parties intended, or was executed under circumstances tending to prove that the contract was usurious. But when the parties themselves do not rely upon the writing as drawn, but admit the contract to be other than that which it exhibits, this rule has no application. Nor are strangers to the instrument concluded by its terms, or estopped to show by parol evidence that the contract of the parties is different from what it purports to be on the face of the writing; and as estoppels where they exist must be mutual, it follows that in a controversy with strangers to the instrument the parties to it are not themselves estopped to explain or contradict it by parol evidence." (Greenleaf on Evidence, 16th edition, volume 1, section 279.)

But the court erred in permitting appellees to prove by various witnesses declarations made by William Hardy in his own interest, to the effect that he was not a partner with his son in the general merchandise venture, which the latter was conducting at Willard under the style of William Hardy &

Son. These declarations were essentially hearsay, and contrary to the rule, that one may not make evidence in his own behalf by his declarations, and were highly prejudicial to the interests of appellants.

It is said in section 110, volume 1, Greenleaf's evidence, 16th Edition: "It is to be observed that where declarations offered in evidence are merely narrative of a past occurrence, they can not be received as proof of the existence of such occurrence. They must be concomitant with the principal act, and so connected with it as to be regarded as the mere result and consequence of the co-existing motives, in order to form a proper criterion for directing the judgment which is to be formed upon the whole conduct. It is a necessary consequence of the principle, as above explained, that declarations made after the equivocal act has ended can not be regarded as forming part of it, complimenting and interpreting the physical part of the act, and they, therefore, come as ordinary assertions of a past fact, obnoxious to the hearsay rule and not admissible under the present principle."

The American & English Ency. of Law, volume 9, 2d edition, page 50, thus states the rule: "An extra judicial self-serving declaration of a party is generally hearsay evidence, and is no evidence in his behalf unless it constitutes a part of the res gestæ, or is made in the presence of the opposite party, and is acquiesced in by him." (Terrell v. Commonwealth, 18 Bush, 346; Penn. v. Fightmaster, 18 Ky. Law Rep., 449.)

For the reasons indicated the judgment is reversed for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

BENNETT v. RYAN.

Timber—Contracts—In an action to recover upon a timber contract it was error for the trial court to award judgment against appellant for timber which he did not receive and which was left in the possession of the appellee with his approval and consent.

Wilfred Carrico and J. C. Jonson for appellant.

W. L. Reeves for appellee.

Appeal from Muhlenberg Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

In the year 1897 the land of the appellee, J. B. Ryan, was sold under four executions, and was bought by the plaintiffs in the executions for less than two-thirds of its value. There was also some taxes against the land. These execution claims and taxes made an indebtedness of $2,000, which it was necessary for appellee to raise to redeem the land. For the purpose of raising this sum the appellee entered into an agreement with appellant, in which it was stipulated that appellant should cut the white oak and poplar timber of specified sizes from this land, and the appellee was to receive a credit on the indebtedness of $2,000 of thirty cents per hundred feet for the amount so cut, and if the amount of timber purchased under this contract at that price exceeded the $2,000, then appellant was to pay to appellee the excess; but if the timber did not amount to as much as $2,000, then the appellee was to pay the appellant the difference. Appellant was to have three years in which to remove the timber from the land.

Appellant ceased to cut and remove timber from the land about July, 1898, and at that time rendered a statement to appellee of the amount of timber so received under this contract, amounting to $788.18. Thus matters stood until July 24, 1900, when appellant brought this action, seeking to recover the difference between the $788.18 and the amount he had paid for appellee in redeeming the land, to wit, $3,000.

Appellee answered, admitting the amount and value of the timber received by appellant from the land, but alleged that there was other timber upon the land which had not been cut and removed, and which had been purchased by appellant under his contract, amounting to more than the amount sued for by the appellant. In other words, that if appellant had cut all the timber called for under the contract, that appellee would not be owing appellant anything, but, on the contrary, the appellant would be owing the appellee. Afterwards appellee filed an amended answer, in which he stated that appellant not only cut and removed $788.18 worth of timber from this land, but that he cut and removed over $1,000 worth.

Appellant replied, denying these allegations, and alleged that a portion of this land on which much of the timber was situated was covered by a dower interest or claim of one Mrs. Blaine, who objected to the cutting and removal of the timber therefrom, and appellee directed the appellant not to cut this timber; that upon the remaining portion of the land there were only a few trees left uncut within the size and specifications of the contract, and these were not cut by the request of appellee.

The proof was heard by the lower court and it adjudged that the appellee was entitled to a credit of $696.22 as the value of the timber actually cut and received by appellant under his contract, and also adjudged that appellee was entitled to a further credit of $812.69, the value of the trees uncut, and which were then standing upon the land that were within the size and specifications of the contract.

As to the amount credited to the appellee for the timber actually received we are not disposed to disturb the finding of the court thereon. But we can not agree with the action of the court in allowing a further credit of the $812.69 for the timber not taken and received by the appellant under his contract, for the reason that the preponderance of the evidence shows that the timber failed to be cut by appellant was not cut by the direction, consent and approbation of appellee. In addition to this it is also shown by the evidence that the timber was left standing on the land uninjured, owned by and in the possession of appellee, and was of much greater value than the price agreed to be paid by appellant in his contract, and instead of appellee being damaged by the failure of appellant to comply with his contract and remove the timber, he was benefited thereby.

It would be unconscionable to make appellant pay and account for timber which he did not receive under his contract, which was left in the possession of appellee and growing upon his land, especially when the same was not received by appellant and left standing and growing upon his land with the approval and consent of appellee.

For these reasons the judgment of the lower court is reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings consistent herewith.

HAGAN, &c. v. CLEMONS, &c.

Inheritance—Where a negro man and woman who as slaves had cohabited made a statutory declaration of their intention to live together as man and wife, and the wife acquired title to a lot with the provision in the deed that the lot was to be for "Ellen Lewis, Eddy Brown and Rebecca Brown," the two latter being infant children of the man and woman who had contracted the slave marriage, the deed providing that upon the death of one or two the property should go to the survivor, upon the death of the wife without other issue and the death of the two children without issue, the father took the property under section 1401, Kentucky Statutes.

John D. Wickliffe for appellants.

Geo. S. & John A. Fulton for appellees.

Appeal from Nelson Circuit Court.

Ellen Lewis was a negress and a slave. Before the emancipation of slaves she and John Brown, who was also a slave, had contracted a slave marriage. There were born to them two children, Eddy Brown and Rebecca Brown. On the third of January, 1868, they made and entered of record in the proper county clerk's office the statutory declaration of their intention to live together as husband and wife. In 1870 Ellen Lewis purchased from J. W. Muir a house and lot in Bardstown, this State, and paid for it with her own means. Muir's deed conveying the property contained this clause: "The house and lot conveyed by this deed to be for Ellen Lewis, Eddy Brown and Rebecca Brown, and at the death of either one or two the property to survive to the longest liver of the three."

Eddy Brown and Rebecca Brown named were infant children of John Brown and Ellen Lewis. Eddy Brown died in infancy in the lifetime of her mother, and without issue. The mother, Ellen Lewis, then died, leaving Rebecca Brown and her husband John Brown. Afterward Rebecca Brown died without issue and an infant. John Brown continued to live upon the property and to claim it as his own for a long while. He then sold and conveyed it to appellees.

This suit by appellants, who are brothers of the half-blood of Eddy Brown and Rebecca Brown, being sons of Ellen Lewis, but not of John Brown, seek to recover the property, appellants claiming that they inherited as heirs at law of their half-sister Rebecca Brown. Under section 1393 of the Kentucky Statutes, when a person having title to real estate of inheritance dies intestate as to such estate, it descends in parcenary to his kindred in the order, first, to his children and their descendants; if none, then to his father and mother, if both are living, a moiety each, but if either parent be dead, then the whole estate shall pass to the other. Section 1401 provides that if an infant dies without issue having title to real estate derived by gift, devise or descent from one of the parents, the whole shall descend to that parent and his or her kindred in the manner provided by the statute.

It is the contention of appellants that upon the death of Rebecca Brown in infancy and without issue, she being the survivor of the three beneficiaries named in the deed, and having succeeded to the entire estate under the deed, that the title thus acquired was by gift from her mother. In the recent case of Guler, &c. v. Bridges, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 945, the question was involved whether an inheritance passing from an infant dying without issue, leaving a mother and father surviving, and the conceded purchase of the land and payment therefor by the father, descended to the father, or under the statute, section 1398, to both father and mother in equal portions. In that case the father claimed the entire estate in consequence of his having paid for same when it was conveyed to the infant. This court denied the father's claim, and in speaking of section 1401, observed: "It has always been most strictly construed, and the statute has been held to apply only to those cases where the title to the real estate owned by the infant came to him by gift, devise or descent from one of his parents. * * * The infant's title to the real estate did not come from the father, but from his vendor."

That decision controls this case.

Therefore, the judgment is affirmed.

NELSON COUNTY v. BARDSTOWN & LOUISVILLE TURNPIKE CO.

(Filed February 19, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Dismissing appeal—An order refusing to enter a judgment non obstante verdicto is not such a final order as may be appealed from.

Nat W. Halstead, C. C. McChord, W. S. Pryor, Morgan Yewell, Eli H. Brown, Jr. and Robt. L. Greene for appellant.

John A. Fulton, J. S. Kelly and G. S. & J. A. Fulton for appellee.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

We have this day decided the appeal of Bardstown & Louisville Turnpike Co. v. Nelson County. In that case, after the verdict for the Turnpike Company, the appellant here moved the court for a judgment non obstante verdicto. The motion was overruled, and from that action this appeal is prosecuted. The motion seems to be based upon the theory that the pleadings showed that the county had not the power under the vote for free turnpikes to enter into the contract for the purchase of the road; also that the plea of estoppel by judgment discussed in the other opinion was a bar to this action. Those matters are disposed of adversely to appellant's contention. The order refusing to enter a judgment for the defendant upon the pleadings, notwithstanding a verdict for the plaintiff, is not such final order as will sustain an appeal.

This appeal by Nelson County is, therefore, dismissed.

BISHOP, ADM'R v. MATNEY.

(Filed February 19, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Jurisdiction—In an action to enforce a lien upon real estate this court has jurisdiction of an appeal without regard to the amount or value of the matter in controversy.

Roscoe Vanover for appellant.

J. M. Roberson for appellee.

Appeal from Pike Circuit Court.

In this suit to enforce a purchase money lien of less than $200 upon a tract of land the judgment denied the plaintiff any relief, upholding the defendant's plea of payment. It is first contended on this appeal that this court has not jurisdiction of the case because the amount in controversy, exclusive of interest and cost, is less than $200. Where the action seeks to enforce a lien upon real estate this court uniformly holds that it is an action involving the title to real estate, and, therefore, this court has jurisdiction of the appeal without regard to the amount or value of the matter in controversy.

The plea of payment was supported only by this proof: The note sued on was executed to William Bishop, who is now dead. Before an administrator had been appointed for his estate, he having died intestate, one of his sons, Andy Bishop, attempted to transfer the note to the payor, appellee, in consideration of the compounding of a felony. The plea of payment was not sustained. In the first place the title to personal property, including choses in action, of one dying intestate passes to the administrator. The heir at law has not the right to collect the chose or dispose of it. In the second place the consideration shown for the attempted cancellation of the note was vicious. The agreement was void.

The judgment is reversed, and cause remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent herewith.

PEACOCK DISTILLING CO. v. COMMONWEALTH.

1. Indictment—Nuisance—An indictment charging a distillery company with permitting its still slops to flow into the waters of a creek, "whereby the said stream of water was rendered foul, noisome, and unfit for man or beast, and caused the fish in said stream to die," etc., did not charge two offenses, and a demurrer to it was properly overruled. The gravamen of the offense was the creation of unhealthful odors, and the fact that fish were killed was an incident of the main offense.

2. Same—The fact that a distiller sold its slop to owners of cattle under an agreement that the distiller should be held harmless from any prosecution for permitting slops to escape into a stream, will not relieve the distiller where the primary conditions resulting in the pollution of the stream were produced by him.

Emmet M. Dickson for appellant.

Dennis Dundon and N. B. Hays for appellee.

Appeal from Bourbon Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

Appellant was indicted, convicted and fined $1,500 for suffering and committing a common nuisance. The indictment describing the offense charges that the defendant corporation, being in the possession and control of a certain distillery in Bourbon county, which was located on Stoner creek, and near a public highway, "did unlawfully suffer and permit the still slops and refuse from said distillery to accumulate at and around said distillery, and did suffer and permit same to flow into the waters of said Stoner creek, whereby the said stream of water was rendered foul, noisome and unfit for use for man or beast, and caused the fish in said stream to die, whereby there did arise from a distillery, still slops and refuse, stream of water and dead fish, foul, unhealthy and disagreeable odors, and render the atmosphere foul, noisome, disagreeable and dangerous to the health, comfort and happiness, and to the common nuisance and annoyance, of all citizens of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, and especially to those living in the neighborhood of said stream and distillery, and passing along said highway," etc.

Appellant complains that the indictment charges two offenses: One the common law offense of maintaining a nuisance, and the other the statutory offense of poisoning or polluting a stream of water, whereby fish are sickened and killed, and that, therefore, it was demurrable for multifariousness. It not infrequently occurs that the same act may constitute, in whole or in part, two or more offenses. In that event it is the accusative part of the indictment that determines the offense charged by the Commonwealth. This indictment does not go upon the idea that the statute has been violated. It is not a prosecution for a violation of that or any statute, but it is drawn to charge the common law offense of maintaining and suffering a nuisance. The description of the acts constituting the offense states not only the suffering of the filth and slop to accumulate so as to create unhealthful and offensive odors, but that by letting the slops and filth escape into the stream it killed the fish, which, decomposing, added to the offensiveness of the other odors. The gravamen is the creation of unhealthful, noisome, odors; that fish were killed and waters polluted by the slop were only incidents and parts of the main offense. The indictment was not duplex, and the demurrer was properly overruled. (Commonwealth v. Megibben, 19 Ky. Law Rep., 292; Greenbaum v. Commonwealth, 10 Ky. Law Rep., 723.)

Appellant showed that it had sold all of its slop for the season to Lair & Houston, and let to them its cattle stables and pens under an agreement that Lair & Houston were to feed all the slop to their cattle there, and to hold the distillers harmless from any prosecution for suffering the slops to escape into the stream, and to so use the premises as not to create a nuisance. It is claimed for appellant that as the only nuisance shown was such as was created by the conditions in and about the cattle pens, and the escape of refuse therefrom into Stoner creek while Lair & Houston were in possession under their contract, that the court should have instructed the jury to find the defendant distillery company not guilty.

To fully understand the applicability of the principle invoked by appellant we must state the facts showing the situation. The distillery is situated on the side of Stoner creek, and on the Paris and Peacock turnpike road, north of the city of Paris. The capacity of the distillery, at least its operating capacity at that time, was to mash 800 bushels of grain each day. The slop produced from this was forced through an overhead main across the creek into a number of large tubs or vats, whence it was drawn off into the cattle stables and there fed to the cattle and hogs. Three hundred and seventy cattle, and about seventy hogs, were provided to consume this slop. The distillery began running about the 1st of March, and continued till about the 10th of June. The cattle and hogs were confined in pens and stables. The excrement from this live stock, the filth, mud, spilled slop, and any surplus slop, all were run into a large pool in the lot, probably 100x200 feet. The effect of the hot, dry weather on this mass of refuse was to decompose it. The odor for miles around, especially on damp days and of evenings, was so strong as to necessitate citizens closing their doors and windows while serving meals, and to escape its discomforts. Stock would not drink the water from the creek. Fish in great quantities were killed. Craw fish, and even snakes and turtles, were killed and driven from the water to the banks where their decomposition attracted great flocks of buzzards and carrion crows. Persons traveling the road were assailed by the stench. Although there was some evidence that the sink was allowed to run off into the creek. It may be that this occurred only after a heavy rain when the pool was filled to overflowing by surface water. It is not shown that Lair & Houston neglected to do anything that they could have done to prevent the conditions complained of. On the contrary, they seem to have used the means provided by the distillery company for caring for this refuse matter. The result was such that it must have been inevitable in the use of the means at hand. Hot weather will decompose damp animal and vegetable matter. The decomposition is essentially offensive to smell, and poisonous. We are asked to say that the distiller who produces these conditions can escape the consequences by contracting with a tenant that the latter will stand for the prosecutions, and agree to prevent a nuisance. It may be doubted whether one can contract to shift the consequences of his violation of the law to protect health upon another. It would seem to be contrary to a sound public policy to permit it.

Wood on Nuisance, volume 1, page 100, 3d edition, cited by appellant, says: "A landlord who lets premises for a particular purpose, which may or may not become a nuisance, according to the manner in which the tenant conducts the business, is not liable either to an action or to an indictment therefor unless he had reasonable grounds to believe that the nuisance would be created from such use. Neither is the landlord liable for a nuisance created by the tenant when the nuisance arises from a use of the premises which was not contemplated by the lease."

The soundness of the text is not called in question by the court. But if it applies to this case it sustains the argument that the landlord is liable. In this case the so-called landlord, the distiller, furnishes the slop, the pens in which it is to be fed, and the cess pool for the collection and care of the offal and refuse matter. The distillery itself creates the primary conditions. If let alone those things would inevitably become a nuisance. Their decomposition, overflow into the creek, especially in time of rains and their chemical effect in hot weather, were actually known, and the consequences must have been in the thought of the distiller. It undertakes to rid itself of them, and thereby discharge itself from liability to the community. It sells the slop to cattlemen to feed on the premises, and puts upon the feeders the duty to keep the premises from becoming a nuisance. Manifestly the means provided by the distiller were inadequate. The result shows it. The distill-ler claims, and the feeders, Lair & Houston, declare, there was no negligence in their manner of managing the business of taking care of the slop, so far as failure to use the means at hand was concerned. Nor does the evidence show that there was. The question then comes back to this: The distiller having created the conditions, has failed to provide sufficient means to care for them so as to prevent their becoming a nuisance. For this the distiller ought to be liable. It has no right to set in motion causes reasonably sure to injure other people, and then fail to provide against such injury.

Every person must use his own property and conduct his business with regard to certain rights of his neighbors. He can no more neglect to provide against known consequences of certain uses of his property, where it would become deleterious to the health and comfort of others rightfully in the neighborhood, than he could purposely injure them in that respect, without answering in damages. We think the instructions asked for by appellant were properly refused.

The evidence for the Commonwealth clearly, and beyond question, established appellant's guilt. Much of the evidence in defense corroborated it. Whether they should believe that, or the other evidence in defense, was a matter which the jury had the sole right to determine. It is complained that the verdict is excessive. Conceding that we are at liberty to reverse a judgment in a penal prosecution on that account, the instance must be rare, and the abuse of its power by the jury be flagrant indeed, to warrant such interference by this court. Trial juries are peculiarly fitted for the imposition of such penalties as will not only adequately punish the offender in hand, but serve to deter others from a repetition of the breach. They are the people who must execute the criminal and penal laws of the State as directly affecting their community. We decline to interfere with their judgment in this case.

Judgment affirmed, with damages.

SMITH v. LAWLER & SON.

(Filed February 19, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Limitation of actions—Where five years intervened from the accrual of a cause of action to the day next preceding the institution of a suit, the plea of the statute of limitation was a bar against a recovery.

Chatterton & Blitz for appellant.

Crawford & Krieger for appellees.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Common Pleas Branch, Second Division.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

On the 21st day of August, 1897, the board of public works of the city of Louisville made an order that William T. Smith should pay to M. Lawler & Sons, contractors, $36.10 as his proportion of the cost for improving Lucia avenue from the southwesterly line of the Bardstown road to the northwesterly line of Vonbories avenue. On the 21st day of August, 1902, Lawler & Son instituted this action in the Jefferson Circuit Court against Rebecca and James Smith, in which they alleged that Wm. Smith was the owner and in possession of a lot of land fronting Lucia avenue sixty feet at the date of the apportionment warrant issued to them for improving the carriage way of Lucia avenue; that subsequent to the issue of the apportionment warrant W. T. Smith died intestate, leaving the defendant, Rebecca Smith, his widow, and James Smith, his brother, his only surviving heirs at law, and asked that they be adjudged a lien upon the lot to secure the payment of the apportionment warrant, and for an enforcement of their lien. The defendant, Rebecca Smith, answered, denying that William T. Smith was ever the owner or in possession of the lot of land described in the petition, or that James Smith was his brother or heir at law, and that he ever had a brother by the name of James Smith, and alleged that the lot sought to be subjected to plaintiff's claim belonged to her at the time mentioned in the petition, and was her property. On the 8th of November thereafter the plaintiffs filed an amended petition, in which they allege that the lot sought to be subjected to the payment of their claim had been assessed as the property of Wm. Smith, and the apportionment warrant issued against Wm. Smith, but that as a matter of fact they had discovered that it was at the time mentioned in the petition and was then the property of the defendant, Rebecca Smith, and prayed as in their original petition. The defendant, for answer to the amended petition, plead that more than five years had elapsed between the issue of the alleged warrant filed with the petition and the institution of this action for its collection, and plead the lapse of time and statute of limitation in bar of recovery. Plaintiff thereupon demurred to the plea of limitation, which was sustained, and defendant declining to plead further, judgment was entered subjecting the property, and the defendant has appealed.

Section 2515 of the Kentucky Statutes provides: "An action upon a liability created by statute, when no other time is fixed by the statute creating the liability, * * * should be commenced within five years next after the cause of action accrued."

The first question, therefore, to be determined is when appellees' cause of action accrued upon the apportionment warrant issued by the board of public works. In Childs v. Smith's Heirs, 52 Ky., 460, it was held by this court that the rule in regard to the computation of time is that, "when the computation is to be made from an act done, the day on which the act was done must be included, because since there is no fraction in a day, the act relates to the first moment of the day on which it was done. But when the computation is to be made from the day itself, and not from the act done, the day in which the act was done must be excluded."

The rule announced in this case has since been adhered to in numerous decisions. (Irwin v. Irwin, 105 Ky., —, and authorities there cited.) Plaintiff could have instituted suit for the collection of this warrant immediately upon its issue and delivery to him. It, therefore, follows that the five years from the accrual of his cause of action expired on the 20th day of August, 1902, the day preceding the institution of this suit. We are, therefore, of the opinion that the plea of the statute of limitation was an effectual bar against recovery in this proceeding. In view of our conclusion on this question, it is unnecessary to consider the other questions relied on by appellant to escape liability.

For reasons indicated the judgment is reversed and cause remanded, with instruction to dismiss the petition.

LITER v. JOHNSON'S EX'OR, &c.

Lands—Title—In an action by appellant to recover a house and lot where a deed had been made to her father, now deceased, by one who at the request of the father paid the balance of purchase money, where the deed had been made without her knowledge, and where an amount about equal to the value of the lot had been charged to her by her father's will, it was error in the trial court to fail to adjudge that she was the owner, and a statement by her to her mother upon her father's death when the mother was bewailing her distressed financial condition: "Mother, don't grieve so: you have a home at Elizaville. If they sell you out, come live there, and I'll rent a house," was not a disclaimer of her ownership in the house and lot.

John P. McCartney for appellant.

B. S. Grannis for appellees.

Appeal from Fleming Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

One Jas. T. Johnson, of Fleming county, Kentucky, died in February, 1899, testate. By his will, made in the year 1895, he directed his debts paid by the sale of such personal property as could best be spared, and gave all the balance of his property, real and personal, to his wife, Eliza Johnson, for life, at her death all to be sold and divided amongst his six children, after charging his son, John, with $1,000, and his daughter, Mary Ruth Liter, with $1,500. When he made his will he was practically out of debt, but afterwards, by reason of the failure of the Exchange Bank of David Wilson, his brother-in-law, he became much involved, and at the time of his death he owed some $7,000 or $8,000, an amount largely in excess of his personal property. S. P. Scruggs, his son-in-law, was appointed and qualified as his executor of the will, and on the 9th of March, 1899, filed his petition in the Fleming Circuit Court for the settlement of the estate, and for a sale of enough of the real estate of the decedent to satisfy the debts. At the time of decedent's death he owned a farm near Johnson's Junction of 150 acres, worth about $12,000, certain lots at the Junction, worth some $1,500, ninety acres known as the Clark farm, worth $2,000, and held the paper title to the house and lot in controversy, worth about $600.

Appellant filed her answer to this petition, and denied that Jas. T. Johnson owned this house and lot, and claimed that under the statute of fifteen years' adverse possession she was the owner of it; that her father paid $600 of the purchase price, and that $500 of the $1,500 charged to her as an advancement against her in his will was made on that account, and that the legal title was taken to Jas. T. Johnson by mistake. The issues were formed, proof heard, and the trial resulted in a judgment for appellee, to reverse which this appeal is prosecuted.

The proof shows that some years prior to the year 1883 the appellant married Joseph Liter, and her father, Jas. T. Johnson, advanced her $1,000 to aid her and her husband to purchase a farm. On account of the poor management and intemperate habits of her husband they soon lost the farm, and then her husband bought a small house and lot in the town of Elizaville, from a Cincinnati firm of Lee & Pinckard, and paid $100 in cash, and executed their notes for the balance, taking from them a bond for title. Shortly after this her husband died. She and her husband took possession of this house and lot in the year 1883, and she has resided in this house continuously from that time until the trial, claiming it adversely to all. She listed it and paid the taxes from 1883 up to the present, and he never did list it or pay an taxes thereon. She had made and paid for all the repairs on the property, and it was generally known and understood to be her property all the time.

Soon after the purchase of this property Lee & Pinckard began to press for the purchase price, and threatened a suit for that purpose. Appellant wrote to her father, who was then in the State of Missouri, appealing to him for assistance. He wrote to David Wilson to pay the unpaid purchase price, which Wilson did, and caused a deed to be prepared from Lee & Pinckard to Jas. T. Johnson. David Wilson died before this action was instituted, and it is not shown whether this deed was prepared in accordance with any direction of Jas. T. Johnson or not, but it is shown that appellant did not know that the deed was so made until a long time afterwards.

It is further shown in the proof that when Jas. T. Johnson became largely involved by reason of the breaking of Wilson's bank, he executed a mortgage to secure the sum for which he was liable, and in this mortgage he included his homestead and every piece of real estate owned by him, naming and describing them, but did not include this house and lot in controversy. It is reasonable to infer, under the facts proven in this case, that $500 of the $1,500 charged to appellant in the will of Johnson represented $500 of the $600 paid to Lee & Pinckard on this house and lot. In opposition to these facts and circumstances there are some statements said to have been made by Jas. T. Johnson after he became involved by the failure of this bank, but these statements were not made in the presence of appellant.

In addition to this, it was proven by appellee that at the house of Jas. T. Johnson, when Johnson was a corpse, the appellant, in the presence of the appellee, said to her mother, when the latter was bewailing her condition of being left alone with all these debts against the estate, which would take from her her home: "Mother, don't grieve so: you have a home at Elizaville. If they sell you out, come live there, and I'll rent a house."

We are unable to construe this language, used under the circumstances related, as a disclaimer of ownership of the house and lot. It, at least, is not sufficient to overcome and outweigh all the evidence introduced in her behalf. We are of the opinion, under the proof in this case, that the appellant was the owner of the house and lot in controversy, and the lower court should have so adjudged.

Wherefore, the judgment of the lower court is reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings consistent herewith.

ROBINSON, &c. v. MARSHALL.

(Filed February 19, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Forcible entry—Subsection 1 of section 452 of the Civil Code defines a forcible entry "as an entry without the consent of the person having the actual possession," therefore, in order to entitle one to maintain an action for forcible entry he must show that he was in the actual and peaceable possession of the premises at the time of the entry, and where the testimony was sufficient to show consent that the tenant might enter the premises, the trial court erred in not leaving that question to the determination of the jury.

Montgomery & Lea for appellants.

Victor F. Bradley for appellee.

Appeal from Scott Circuit Court.

On the 7th day of August, 1902, the appellee, Mary Marshall, sued out a writ charging the appellant, W. L. Robinson, with having forcibly entered and taken possession of a house and tract of thirty-five acres of land, of which she was in the actual possession, and with refusing to surrender the possession thereof. The inquisition on the premises resulted in a verdict of a jury finding the defendant guilty of forcible entry, and a judgment for possession in favor of appellee. W. L. Robinson traversed the inquest and executed the bond required by law and carried the case to the circuit court. A trial in the circuit court resulted in a verdict, pursuant to a peremptory instruction by the court, finding the defendant guilty of the forcible entry complained of. The defendant filed grounds and made a motion for a new trial because the court erred in giving the jury a peremptory instruction to find the defendant guilty of the forcible entry complained of; second, because the court erred in refusing to permit the defendant to testify that he had a deed from Richard Marshall, the brother of the plaintiff, for the land in controversy, dated in 1898; and that Marshall was his tenant at the time of his death, and his term expired upon his death; third, because the court erred in refusing to permit the witness, F. H. Abbott, to testify that the appellee promised him that she would get her things out of the house and give him possession; fourth, in refusing to instruct the jury to find the defendant not guilty.

Upon the trial the deposition of appellee was read to the jury, in which she deposed that she had lived upon and occupied the premises in dispute with her brother, Richard Marshall, and his wife for some eight or nine years; that after the death of her brother and his wife she continued in the actual possession of the premises, retaining the key to the dwelling house, and expected to remain there if she could get anybody to stay with her; that defendant on one occasion borrowed the key of the house from her, but subsequently brought it back to her; that the house was locked up; that by agreement between herself and Richard Marshall she occupied the place with him and his wife. She denied that she had ever agreed with defendant that she would take her belongings out of the house, or consented that Abbott, his tenant, should have possession. She testified that she had a bed, a bureau, a trunk, two chairs and a looking glass, and some clothes in the house at the time of the entry by defendant. She also introduced several witnesses who testified that she lived on the land in controversy with her brother for several years before his death, and was there when he died. The appellant, Robinson, on the other hand, testified that he had been in the undisputed possession of all the land in controversy since 1898; that Richard Marshall had married his mother, and he had agreed to allow them to occupy the house and premises as his tenants as long as they lived; that appellee lived with her brother and his wife, and was also living there when he died; that after the death of Richard Marshall he administered upon his estate and sold his personal property; that his wife occupied the house from the death of Richard Marshall until the day of the sale; and that appellee stayed with her and left the premises on the same day, leaving a few articles of furniture; that he left the key with her so that she could get them out when she found a place to take them; that he notified her that he had rented the house to F. H. Abbott, and that he would want possession in a week or so, and directed her to give him the key to the house when he called for it, and that she said she would do so, and would get her things out of the house as soon as possible, and would not leave them in Mr. Abbott's way; that he lived several miles from the house in controversy, in Owen county; that when Abbott went to take possession of the property he supposed that appellee had taken her things out, but found that she had not; that he did not know where she was at the time he took possession of the house, and that he entered through a door which was not fastened. Appellant also introduced Mrs. Lynn, who testified that a short time after the death of Richard Marshall, Robinson came to her house to see Mary Marshall, and asked her for the key, and told her that he had rented the house to Abbott, and that he would move in in a week or so; that appellee responded "all right;" that she would move her things out so that they would not be in Mr. Abbott's way; that Robinson told her that if she could not get a place to take them that she could put them up stairs out of the way, but that appellee said not to put them up stairs; that she would take them away immediately. Robinson also told her that Abbott would be there to plow the garden the next day, and she did not object. William True testified that he had rented the land in controversy from Robinson for three years immediately preceding the death of Richard Marshall, and cultivated it as his tenant. Fenton Jones testified that he had seen a contract in writing between Richard Marshall and Robinson, which provided that appellee, Mary Marshall, should live with Richard Marshall on the place as long as Richard Marshall and his wife lived.

Subsection 1 of section 453 of the Civil Code defines a forcible entry "as an entry without the consent of the person having the actual possession." In order to entitle one to maintain an action for forcible entry he must show that he was at the time of the entry in the actual and peaceable possession of the premises in question. The specific acts and conditions required to constitute actual possession differ according to the peculiar circumstances of each case. Generally any overt acts indicating a purpose to occupy, and not to abandon, the premises will satisfy the requirements as to possession. (13 A. & E. Ency. of Law. 748.) The only legitimate inquiry upon the trial of a writ of forcible entry is whether the defendant entered upon the land which at the time of the entry was in the actual possession of the plaintiff. The defendant can not justify an entry in such a case by showing title or right of entry. (Hunt v. Wilson, 53 Ky., 36.) But if a tenancy be determined and the tenant has gone away and locked up the house, consenting that the legal owner, either in person or by his tenants, should take possession of the property, and he does so, under such a state of case he would not be guilty of "forcible entry." We think there was ample testimony introduced by appellant in this case conducing to show that appellee consented for appellant to enter the house; and that the trial court erred in not leaving the determination of this question to the jury. As to the land outside of the house, the overwhelming weight of the testimony is that it was actually in the possession of the appellant, and had been for several years.

For reasons indicated the judgment is reversed and cause remanded for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

WADE v. KEOWN.

(Filed February 23, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Lands—Liens—Where one entered on land for the purpose of holding and using it as long as he could, having no right or title to it, he was not entitled to a lien on the land for improvements made by him.

Ira Julian and C. W. Massie for appellant.

R. D. Walker, J. E. Fogle and W. S. Pryor for appellee.

Appeal from Ohio Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

In the year 1888 E. D. Walker sold to one E. H. Basham a tract of ninety-two acres of land, situated in Ohio county, and took his note for the sum of $450, the purchase price. When it became due, in 1891, Walker sued him on this note, and enforced his lien on the land. The land was sold by the commissioner under this judgment and E. D. Walker became the purchaser, and the court granted him a writ of possession for the land.

When the sheriff, Stephens, undertook to execute this writ he found one E. F. Basham, a son of E. H. Basham, in the possession of the land. E. F. Basham then sued the sheriff and E. D. Walker, and obtained a temporary injunction, restraining them from the execution of this writ and putting him off of this land. Basham in his petition alleged that he was the owner of this land, but did not state how or when he became the owner thereof. The issues were formed and the case remained on the docket until 1902, when the plaintiff, Basham, dismissed his action without prejudice. In the meantime E. D. Walker died, and the action was revived in the names of his devisees, and they obtained another writ of possession and placed it in the hands of appellee, C. P. Keown, then the sheriff of the county, to execute. When he undertook to execute it he found the appellant, Geo. T. Wade, in possession of the land, and he brought this action to enjoin the sheriff and the devisees from ejecting him, claiming that he was the owner thereof; but he also failed to state how or when he became the owner. The issues were completed and the proof, by depositions, was taken, a trial had, and the court adjudged the land to the devisees of Walker, and dismissed appellant's action, of which he complains.

The preponderance of the evidence shows that E. F. Basham obtained the possession of this land from his father under the promise that he should own it, provided he paid Walker the $450 note; but after he obtained the possession he changed his mind and concluded that he would, and did, set up claim to the land, and while he was in possession appellant Wade made an arrangement with one Coppage to trade E. F. Basham out of his right of possession, which he did by giving him a wagon and gear, and then appellant at once moved on this land in the night time. Appellant does not claim that he obtained the possession from Basham, but says he found the place vacant and moved on it, concluding that he would set up claim to it in his own right.

The proof shows that E. F. Basham and appellant both recognized the claim and right of Walker to this land, and they knew the pendency of the action referred to, and appellant, prior to his entry on the land, wrote letters to Walker, giving him information of facts and witnesses to enable him to defeat Basham in his suit, and also offered to buy the land of Walker. It is evident that when Basham and appellant entered on this land they knew of the pendency of the actions mentioned above and that the land belonged to Walker; and it was their purpose to hold and have the use of this land as long as they could, and if possible beat Walker out of it. Appellant asked that he be allowed pay and a lien on the land for improvements made by him. Under the circumstances he is not entitled thereto. He entered without any color or pretense of right or title, and at the time knew the land belonged to another.

The judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

SPRIGGS, &c. v. SIMPKINS' ADM'R, &c.

(Filed February 23, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Patents—Lands—Where the evidence shows a tract of land was covered by a prior patent the claim to it by one failing to establish continuous, actual, adverse possession for fifteen years was not made out.

W. H. Vaughn and C. B. Wheeler for appellants.

Alexander & Lackey for appellees.

Appeal from Martin Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

This case involves the location of patents to land as well as questions of possession and trespass.

In the year 1854 one W. G. Wells obtained four patents, three of them containing 200 acres each, the other 100 acres. This last patent boundary, or a part of it, he sold and conveyed to one Shardlick Ward, who erected a cabin on it near the line of one of the 100-acre patents. After this, and in the year 1865, Ward obtained a patent, the boundary of which included 1,055 acres, but by the terms of the patent 855 acres were excluded therefrom. The boundary of this Ward patent covered the most of the land patented to Wells in 1854, and it is fair to presume that the exclusion of 855 acres from this patent boundary was meant to exclude the lands covered by the Wells patents. Appellant Spriggs claimed to be a tenant of the Ward heirs, and occupied the house or cabin near the line of one of the 200-acre patents of Wells. Ward, when he occupied this cabin, enclosed and cleared fifteen or twenty acres of land across the line and on the Wells patent. When Spriggs entered as tenant to appellants, the Ward heirs, he began to clear and enclose thirty or more acres to this Wells patent, and appellees, as the owners by purchase of the boundaries covered by the Wells patent, brought this action against appellants to recover this land, and damages for the trespass and destruction of timber, and to enjoin them further trespass. Appellants answered, denying the ownership of this land by appellees, and claimed the whole of it by virtue of the Ward 1,055-acre patent, and also by adverse possession. The issues were completed; proof was heard, and the lower court sustains appellees' claim, except to the extent of the fifteen or twenty acres of land first cleared and enclosed by Ward. This small piece was adjudged to appellants; of this judgment appellants complain.

The appellants have not filed a brief, but we have examined the record, and are at a loss to understand upon what claim or theory they expect a reversal. It is clear that appellees own this land covered by the Wells patents, and they are prior in date to the Ward patent. They have failed to sustain by the proof their claim of fifteen years' continuous, actual, adverse possession of this land, or any part thereof, except the fifteen or twenty acres adjudged them by the court.

For these reasons the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

STOVALL v. HAYNES.

(Filed February 23, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Lands—Adverse possession—Where one was in the actual, adverse possession of land when the deed was made to another the transaction was champertous and void, the occupant having lived on the land more than fifteen years, and the testimony was conflicting, the purchaser claiming that her occupancy was only permissive, the case should have been submitted to a jury under appropriate instructions, and it was error to give a peremptory instruction.

Geo. W. Reeves and Reeves & Thorp for appellant.

Appeal from Ballard Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

Appellant's husband, J. C. Stovall, occupied a tract of twenty-eight acres of land, which was part of a larger tract of 113 acres. The larger tract was sold under a judgment foreclosing a mortgage on it, executed by J. C. Stovall's father in his lifetime. The suit was brought after the mortgagor's death, J. C. Stovall being made a party defendant. The judgment was rendered without defense. The sale was made and confirmed in 1889, and the deed executed in 1891. There was no writ of possession so far as this record shows. J. C. Stovall continued to live on the twenty-eight acres, and died shortly after the sale by the commissioner. His widow has continued to live there and claim the land adversely, she says, for more than fifteen years before this suit was brought by the vendee of the purchaser at the commissioner's sale aforesaid. The purchaser claimed that the widow of J. C. Stovall continued to occupy the premises by permission. But this was denied. Upon that evidence the court peremptorily instructed the jury to find for the plaintiff, which was error. If appellee for fifteen years claimed and adversely held the land, the owner's title and right of entry was barred, although appellant's husband had been a party to the suit in which the title was sold to appellant's vendor. But the record shows that the judgment confirming the sale of the land in the foreclosure suit and the order making the deed thereunder were within fifteen years from the time of the bringing of this suit. As appellant claims under her husband's title, and as he, if living, could not claim back of the judgment making the deed to which he was a party, she can not do so. Manifestly her claim did not begin until after his death.

It was attempted to be shown that appellant's husband and the purchaser at the decretal sale, who was his sister, had an agreement at that time by which J. C. Stovall was to continue to hold the land in dispute, and that it was not to be affected by the purchase, and that in consideration thereof he did not make defense to the proceeding. The trial court should have allowed this evidence. A deed executed by the purchaser after the death of J. C. Stovall conveyed all the 113 acres, except the twenty-eight, and in the deed one of the boundary lines is named as being the boundary of the land owned by J. C. Stovall's heirs. This seems to confirm the claim that there was some adjustment between J. C. Stovall and his sister, the purchaser. Furthermore, if appellant was in the actual, adverse possession of the land when the deed was made to appellee by his vendor, the transaction was champertous and void. The case should have been submitted to the jury under appropriate instructions covering these two points.

Reversed and remanded for proceedings not inconsistent herewith.

SMITH v. SMITH.

(Filed February 23, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Passway—Adverse possession—Prescription—Where a father gave to his son a tract of land thirty years ago, but did not make him a deed until 1885, the title to the land was perfected by adverse claim and user before the deed was made, and the use of a passway by him contemporaneously with his possession and use of the land created a prescriptive right to the use of the passway at the end of fifteen years from the time his possession began.

J. F. Montgomery for appellant.

Appeal from Adair Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

Joel Smith owned a farm of 610 acres in Adair county, lying between the Columbia and Greensburg road and the Columbia and Campbellsville pike. About thirty years ago he gave to his son, appellee, J. Garrett Smith, a tract of seventy-six acres of this farm, lying immediately on the Columbia and Greensburg road. Appellee took possession of the farm and continued to use it and claim it as his own from that time until the bringing of this suit.

During the same time he also used as a matter of right a passway from his tract to the Columbia and Campbellsville pike. This was his way out to his postoffice, school and stores, where he did the most of his trading, as well as to the church attended by his family. Joel Smith did not make Garrett Smith a deed for the land until 1885; that deed recites that the grantor and his wife "have given to our son, Jeremiah Smith, a certain piece or parcel of land, with all the appurtenances thereto belonging," etc. No express reference was made in the deed to the passway. Garrett Smith continued to use this passway until his father's death some years afterward, and since the partition of the remaining lands among his brothers and sisters. A disagreement having arisen between appellee and his brother (appellant) over other matters originally not connected with the passway, appellant closed the passway through his part of the tract that had been allotted him, and this suit was brought to compel the removal of the obstruction.

The evidence clearly shows that appellee has used this passway as an appurtenant to this tract of land for more than thirty years. Ordinarily this would be sufficient to constitute a complete right by prescription. But it is insisted by appellant that as appellee had not title to the land to which the easement is claimed as an appurtenant, and did not get the title until 1885, his use of the passway as a matter of right then began; that his occupancy of the seventy-six acres of land up until that time was without title, and by the permission of his father, the title holder, and that the use of the passway over the remainder of the father's land was permissive and not adverse. It is not denied that title to land may be acquired by adverse possession where the possession is taken under a parol gift. Appellee's title to his seventy-six acres of land seems to have been perfected by his adverse claim and user before his father made him a deed for it. By using the passway contemporaneously with his possession and use of the land, the prescriptive right to use the passway as such was created and perfected at the end of the fifteen years from the time it began. The fact that appellee accepted a deed subsequently from his father can not affect his adverse claim and use of the passway inasmuch as there is nothing contained in the deed inconsistent with such claim. Indeed the grant of such appurtenances as belonged to the tract conveyed might well be held to include the easement in question.

Such having been the judgment of the circuit court it is affirmed.

ANDREWS v. ERWIN.

(Filed February 23, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Forcible detainer—In an action of forcible detainer it was error for the trial court to dismiss appellant's proceeding against appellee, a tenant, it appearing that he had broken the terms of a lease for five years, the lease providing that if "the lessee shall fail to clear, fence and put the land in a good state of cultivation, by the 1st of January, 1903, he shall forfeit all work and claims under the lease," the relation of landlord and tenant existing, the breaking of the contract by the tenant constituted a forcible detainer.

Zeb Stewart and Will Lewis for appellant.

Simms & Thompson for appellee.

Appeal from Calloway Circuit Court.

On the 5th of June, 1899, the appellant, Mollie J. Andrews, contracted in writing with H. L. Thompson as follows:

"This indenture witnesseth: Mollie J. Andrews, of Dexter, Calloway county, Kentucky, has this day leased to H. L. Thompson, of the same place, all her timber land lying west of Rock Grass creek and east of the N., C. & St. L. R. R., for a term of five years from the 1st day of January, 1900. Said H. L. Thompson agrees to clear, fence and put said land in a good state of cultivation, and remove all timber except stumps from said land by the 1st day of January, 1903, or to forfeit all work done and all claims on said land. * * * This indenture binds all heirs or assigns of both parties to fulfill said article same as the original parties."

On the 21st of January, 1903, Mollie J. Andrews instituted a proceeding in the Calloway Quarterly Court, in which she alleged that her original lessee and tenant, Thompson, had died on the — day of —, 1900; and that all of his rights and interest in the real estate leased from her had been sold at public outcry, and that appellee, Erwin, became the purchaser thereof, and subrogated to the rights, liabilities and covenants of Thompson with reference to the lease; and that he had taken possession thereunder; that neither her original lessee, Thompson, nor his vendee, Erwin, had complied with the covenants of the lease to clear, fence and put the leased premises in a good state of cultivation, by removing the timber, except the stumps, therefrom by the 1st day of January, 1903; and that in accordance with the terms of the lease she had demanded possession thereof, which he refused to surrender, and forcibly detained possession thereof without right or consent on her part, and asked that he be adjudged guilty of a forcible detainer; and that she have restitution of the premises. The defendant, Erwin, filed a general demurrer, which was overruled, and thereupon filed an answer, in which he denied that either he or Thompson had failed to comply with their contract, or that by reason of such failure he had forfeited his lease, and alleged that prior to the institution of this proceeding he had not received any notice to surrender the possession of the land, and moved the court to dismiss the petition. The motion was overruled, and the law and facts being submitted to the court, it was adjudged that the defendant, Erwin, was guilty of the forcible detainer complained of, and that the plaintiff should have restitution of the premises. The defendant traversed the finding of the lower court, and carried the case to the circuit court, where he renewed his motion to dismiss the proceeding on the face of the papers, which was sustained by the trial court over the objections of plaintiff, and she has appealed.

It is the contention of appellee that the judgment of the circuit court should be affirmed on two grounds: First, because the written contract does not specifically provide that the tenancy or term of lease is to expire on a certain day, as required by section 2295 of the Kentucky Statutes; and, second, because no demand or written notice for possession was served upon him prior to the institution of this proceeding. There can be no doubt that the relation of landlord and tenant is created between the parties by the written contract, and a forcible detainer is defined by section 453 of the Civil Code as the "refusal of a tenant to give possession to his landlord after the expiration of his term, or of a tenant at will or by sufferance to give possession to the landlord after the determination of his will." The reservation of rent in some form and allegiance to the title are the distinguishing characteristics of a contract by which the relation of landlord and tenant exists. (Sections 2298-95-96, 2326 and 2327 of the Kentucky Statutes.) And the rule is well settled that where a lease expired by its own limitation no written demand from the landlord for possession is necessary in order to bring an action for forcible detainer. While the lease in this case is for five years, it distinctly specifies that if the lessee shall fail to clear, fence, and put the land in a good cultivation, and remove all timber except stumps, by the 1st day of January, 1903, that he shall forfeit all work done and all claims under the lease; and that this provision in the contract shall bind both the heirs and assigns. We, therefore, conclude that the circuit judge erred in dismissing appellant's petition before trial.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded for proceedings consistent herewith.

REED v. TAYLOR, &c.

(Filed February 23, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Forcible detainer—Jurisdiction—In a forcible detainer proceeding before a police judge the latter was without jurisdiction to proceed in the action except to return the papers to the court, to which a traverse had been taken.

2. Damages—Judicial officer—It is a well-settled rule that while a judicial officer will be protected against suits for damages resulting from an erroneous exercise of judgment or power, yet where he acts corruptly, maliciously, or beyond his jurisdiction his office is no protection.

W. T. Burch and S. H. Bush for appellant.

Appeal from Hardin Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

Appellant was the owner and in the possession of a certain hotel property at West Point, Kentucky. He contracted with appellee Taylor for the latter's services as assistant in the management of the hotel for one year from March 1, 1901. Under the contract Taylor and wife were to occupy one of the rooms of the hotel. The net proceeds of the venture were to be divided between the two parties, Taylor and appellant. Appellant was to receive and disburse all money. Before the expiration of the year, for some reason not shown in this record, appellant instituted a forcible detainer proceeding before appellee, J. L. Shipley, judge of the police court of West Point (which is a town of the 6th class), seeking to oust Taylor from the premises. The judgment of the police court was adverse to appellant, but within three days he traversed the judgment and executed a bond before the police judge, which was approved by him. Thereafter, at the instance of appellee Taylor, Shipley, the police judge, issued warrants of arrest against appellant, and caused him to be arrested thereunder, charged with contempt of the police court, and held until he had executed bond for his appearance. Other warrants were issued against him of a similar nature thereafter, but which were not executed because he fled. The police judge also issued an order putting the hotel property in the hands of a receiver, and directing the books and papers, etc., belonging to appellant to be turned over to Taylor. The police judge also issued an order, directed to and served upon certain customers of appellant, proclaiming that the hotel was open for business under the contract with Taylor, and forbidding them ignoring Taylor's rights in the premises as adjudged by the said police court, and not to pay any money in violation thereof to appellant.

Appellant brought this suit against Taylor and against the police judge, Shipley, to recover the damages alleged to have been sustained by him because of the false imprisonment under the warrants above named, and because of the annoyance and worry, loss of business and expenses incurred in defending the other proceedings, which were sued for as results of malicious prosecution. It was charged in the petition that there was a conspiracy between Taylor and Shipley by which it was agreed that appellant was to be harrassed and annoyed so as to abandon his property and yield it to Taylor during the balance of the term. At the close of the evidence in appellant's case the court peremptorily instructed the jury to find for the defendants. This was error. There was evidence deducible from the circumstances proven to the jury to sustain the charge of the conspiracy. Furthermore, after the execution of the traverse bond the police judge was utterly without jurisdiction to proceed further in that action other than to return the papers to the circuit court, and in no event did he have authority to appoint a receiver for the hotel property. It is well settled that while a judicial officer will be protected against suits for damages resulting from an erroneous exercise of judgment or power, yet where he acts corruptly, maliciously or beyond his jurisdiction, his office is no protection. (Blincoe v. Head, 108 Ky., 106; Stephens v. Wilson, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 1832.)

Judgment reversed and cause remanded for a new trial under proceedings not inconsistent herewith.

HANNA'S ASS'ES V. GAY, & CO.

(Filed February 23, 1904.)

Contracts—Homestead—Where a wife joins with the husband in a contract to sell their farm, which was made by his assignees, the consideration of the wife's signing being that she was to be paid $3,000 cash of the proceeds of the farm, she agreeing to relinquish all claims to dower or homestead, but before the sale was completed the husband died. In a suit for specific performance of the contract the lower court adjudged that in addition to the $3,000 mentioned, $1,000 of the proceeds should be set aside to the wife as a homestead. Held—That the lower court erred in setting aside the $1,000 as a homestead.

Willis & Todd and J. C. Beckham for appellants.

R. L. Pulliam, Pickett & Barrickman for Mrs. E. V. Hanna and infant defendants.

W. W. Jesse, guardian ad litem.

Appeal from Shelby Circuit Court.Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

In May, 1902, John S. Hanna being indebted beyond his ability to pay, executed a general deed of assignment to appellants for the benefit of all his creditors. Among the properties embraced in the conveyance was a farm of 261 acres in Shelby county. The deed contained this reservation: "Except there is expressly reserved from this deed of assignment, and there does not pass hereby, any of the property that by the law of this Commonwealth is exempt from execution, attachment or distress, and same is expressly reserved by first party for the benefit of himself and family."

The debtor's wife did not join in the deed. It is admitted that neither her potential right to dower nor the debtor's right to a homestead of $1,000 in value passed by this deed.

In the following July the assignees contracted with appellee, J. T. Gay, to sell him this farm at the price of $18,000. The debtor and his wife joined in the contract. The contract contained this agreement, as affecting directly the interests of the debtor and his wife: "In consideration of $3,000 cash to be paid to Mrs. E. V. Hanna, wife of John S. Hanna, they, John S. Hanna and E. V. Hanna, his wife, hereby agree and bind themselves to sign the deed hereinbefore set out, and to release and relinquish all claims to dower and homestead in the property hereinbefore described. But it is expressly agreed if the deed herein provided for shall not be made, or for any reason this contract shall not be consummated, then the aforesaid $3,000 shall not be taken or considered in any way the value of said dower or homestead in future transactions, this agreement as to same being applicable to this agreement only."

Before the contract of sale could be confirmed by the county court to whom it was submitted by the assignees, and before the deed could be executed, the debtor, John S. Hanna, died.

This suit was brought by the assignees against the purchaser, J. T. Gay for a specific execution of the contract. The widow and children of John S. Hanna were made parties to the suit. J. T. Gay answered that he was willing to accept the title to the land if it could be conveyed by the judgment of the court, and was willing to pay for it as agreed. The widow answered that she was willing to join in the deed if she was paid the $3,000 mentioned in the contract, but not otherwise. A guardian ad litem for the infant children answered, claiming a homestead of $1,000 value out of the proceeds of the sale. The circuit court adjudged the specific execution of the contract; required the adult heirs to sign the deed with the assignees; required the widow to do the same; and had the commissioner of the court convey for the infants. But the court adjudged, and there was paid over to the widow the $3,000 mentioned, and $1,000 additional of the proceeds of sale to Gay were set aside as a homestead for the widow and children during the life of the former and the minority of the latter. The assignees have appealed from as much of the judgment as set apart the homestead money for the widow and children.

By the contract the wife of the debtor was not bound at all. A married woman's potential dower interest in her husband's land can be relinquished only in the modes pointed out by the statute—by the execution of a deed with her husband or by separate deed if he has already conveyed, and by privy acknowledgment before a proper officer of her execution of the deed. After the death of her husband Mrs. Hanna's inchoate dower became dower consummate. As to it she could then sell it by deed or contract. Voluntarily filing her answer in the suit, offering thereby to conclude the agreement made by her during marriage, and executing the deed and receiving the consideration stipulated in the contract, she divested herself of dower in the land.

It has been repeatedly held that the widow of a decedent can not claim both dower and homestead in his lands; but she may elect which she will take. The homestead in the decedent's land is declared by statute (section 1707, Kentucky Statutes) to be for the benefit of the widow and infant children of the decedent. Therefore, if she elects to take dower in lieu of homestead, the infant children's right to a homestead, to be jointly occupied with their mother during their minority, would attach to the land set apart as the widow's dower. But a more serious question arises in this case: Was there a right of homestead available to either the widow or infant children? The statutes prohibit the subjection of the debtor's homestead to the payment of his debts only when it is attempted to be taken under an execution, attachment, distress or judgment. But it does not prevent the debtor's selling his homestead. The debtor can not mortgage his homestead without his wife joins in the mortgage. (Section 1706, Kentucky Statutes; Thorn v. Darlington, 6 Bush, 448; Wing v. Hayden, 10 Bush, 276; Lear v. Totten, 14 Bush, 101.) But he may sell it whether or not she joins in the deed or contract. (Brame v. Craig, 12 Bush, 404; Whitesides v. Cushenberry, 8 Ky. Law Rep., 590; Gullett v. Arnett, 19 Ky. Law Rep., 1892.) Of course if he should die first her right to dower would then prevail over to the deed to that extent.

In this case it will be observed that the debtor had sold by executory contract all of the remaining title in fee owned by him in the land. There can not be a homestead without title to the land, and as the husband had contracted to convey, and had bound himself to convey all the title he had in the land, it necessarily divested him, and all others who might have been entitled by relation to it, of a homestead in the land. The cases of Schnabel v. Schnabel, 22 Ky. Law Rep., 234, and Kiesewetter v. Kress, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 1242, relate alone to where the owner of the homestead died having title to it, and treat of the power of the widow to elect, or to waive or relinquish a homestead so as to defeat the claims of the infants, which would attach but for such waiver or election.

The judgment is reversed and cause remanded, with directions to the lower court to set aside so much of the judgment as sets apart the $1,000 to the widow and infant children as a homestead in this case, and for further proceedings not inconsistent herewith.

BEATTYVILLE BANK v. ROBERTS, &c.

(Filed February 23, 1904.)

1. Construction of statutes—Under section 483, Kentucky Statutes, the partial or total failure of consideration or fraud in the execution of a note, made payable and negotiable at an incorporated bank which has been discounted before maturity by a bank, is not available as a defense to it if purchased in good faith by the bank without notice of its infirmity.

2. Parol agreement—In a sale of an article a parol agreement that the article should be taken back if the purchaser should die, and a note executed for the payment of the article, where the purchaser was living when the note matured he could not rely upon the agreement to defeat recovery, where he made no claim that a bank which discounted the note had notice of the parol agreement that he was only to pay for the article as delivered.

Gourley & Roberts, John J. McHenry and T. B. Blakey for appellant.

S. P. Stamper and O. H. Pollard for appellees.

Appeal from Lee Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

This action was instituted by the Beattyville Bank of Beattyville, Ky., against T. T. Roberts, Ibbey Roberts and the J. W. Slack Co., on a promissory note dated March 25, 1902, payable four months after date, for $546, the note being signed by T. T. and Ibbey Roberts, and endorsed by J. W. Slack Co. The defendants, T. T. and Ibbey Roberts, in their answer plead that the note was executed by them to their co-defendants, J. W. Slack Co., without consideration, and that the plaintiff was apprised of this fact before it purchased the note. Plaintiff for reply denied that the note was executed without consideration, or that they were apprised of this fact before its purchase by them, or that there was no consideration to support it. A jury trial resulted in a verdict and judgment for the defendants, and plaintiff has appealed.

The facts developed by the testimony are as follows: "On the 22d of November, 1901, T. T. Roberts and Ibbey Roberts, executed and delivered to the J. W. Slack Co., of Louisville, Ky., the following promissory note:

Beattyville, Ky., Nov. 22, 1901.

"Four months after date we promise to pay to the order of the John W. Slack Co., distillers, of Louisville, Ky., $686, without defalcation, value received, negotiable and payable at the Beattyville Bank, Beattyville, Ky.

(Signed) "T. T. ROBERTS,
"IBBEY ROBERTS."

Simultaneously with the execution of this note the J. W. Slack Co. executed and delivered to T. T. Roberts the following written agreement:

"We have this day sold to T. T. Roberts fifteen barrels of ninety-eight whisky, and twenty barrels new, for which he gives me his four months' note, dated November 22, 1901, for $686. If Mr. Roberts should die, we agree to take back the whisky at what it was sold to him.

"J. W. SLACK CO.,

"By J. W. SLACK, President."

Before the maturity of this note the J. W. Slack Co., by J. W. Slack, endorsed and delivered it for value to the appellant, the Beattyville Bank, of Beattyville, Ky. At the maturity of the note the bank gave notice thereof and demanded its payment both from appellees and the J. W. Slack Co.

Upon the trial T. T. Roberts testified that he did not know that the bank held the note until he received this notice; and that he immediately went to the bank and notified R. N. Goodloe, its cashier, that he had a contemporaneous parol agreement with the J. W. Slack Co. that he was only to pay for the whisky as it was delivered to him; and that he had already paid to them $140 for whisky delivered, which should be credited upon the obligation; and that he directed him to return the note to the J. W. Slack Co., and not to purchase any more of his notes executed to the company, and at the same time explained to him the conditions of the written agreement of the Slack Co. to him; that a few days after his conversation with Goodloe he received a letter from the Slack Co. enclosing the $686 note, dated November 22, 1901, and the note sued on for $546, which he executed in renewal of the balance due upon his original obligation, which reads as follows:

Beattyville, Ky., March 25, 1902.

"Four months after date we promise to pay to the order of John W. Slack Co., inc. distillers, of Louisville, Ky., $546, without defalcation, value received, negotiable and payable at the Beattyville Bank, Beattyville, Ky.

"T. T. ROBERTS, and

"MRS. IBBY ROBERTS."

That after the execution of the last-named note the Slack Co. failed in business, and that he never received any more of the whisky from them; that Slack represented at the date of the execution of the note that the whisky was in bond in his warehouse in Louisville, but that he did not give him any warehouse receipt therefor; that he simply took his word that the whisky was there; that he usually ordered two barrels at a time and paid for it when it came; that he was induced to buy thirty-five barrels by the Slack Co. agreeing to abate from the price 25 cents a gallon below their ordinary charges. Both the vice-president of the bank and the cashier testified that the bank acquired the original note for $686 in due course of business for value without notice of any lack of consideration for its execution; and that when it fell due both Roberts and the Slack Co. were notified thereof by mail; that a day or two afterwards he met T. T. Roberts on the bridge, and Roberts requested him to send the note to the Slack Co., and offered to show him the written contract executed by the Slack Co. to him; that he did not read it, but Roberts explained its contents; that he sent the note to the Slack Co. and shortly thereafter he received a check for $140 and the note sued on in renewal of the balance of the original note. He denied that Roberts notified him not to take any more of his notes, or informed him that they were executed without consideration at the date of his conversation on the bridge with reference to the original note, but said that the first time he ever heard of this claim was after the publication in a paper that Slack & Co. was broke, when Roberts came to the bank for the first time, claiming that he had notified him when the first note fell due not to buy any more of his notes.

The partial or total failure of consideration, or fraud in the execution of a note, made payable and negotiable at an incorporated bank, which has been discounted before maturity by a bank of this Commonwealth, or organized under the laws of the United States, is not available as a defense to it if purchased in good faith by the bank without notice of such infirmity. (Section 483, Kentucky Statutes; Kelley v. Smith, 58 Ky., 312; Hargis v. Louisville Trust Co., 17 Ky. Law Rep., 218; Moreland's Ass'ee v. Citizens Savings Bank, 92 Ky., 211; Clark v. Tanner, 100 Ky., 275.)

There is nothing in the written contract relied on by appellee which suggests any lack of consideration for the execution of the original note; it was simply an agreement on the part of the Slack Co. to buy back the whisky in the event of the death of appellee. As he was alive at the date of the maturity of the note, he certainly could not rely upon this agreement to defeat recovery, and there was no claim by appellee that appellants had notice of his alleged contemporaneous parol agreement with the Slack Co. that he was only to pay for the whisky as delivered previous to or at the time of the purchase by them of the original obligation of November 22, 1901. The law presumes a consideration for the execution of bills of exchange and negotiable notes placed upon the footing of bills of exchange by the statute for the benefit of the holder in an action against the maker or endorser of such paper. Besides, it was not competent for appellee to impeach his written contract by testimony of a contemporaneous parol agreement providing for a different time and manner of payment. The note sued on was simply the renewal of the balance due upon the original obligation, which appellant had purchased in due course of business without notice. It was not a new transaction. Even if it be conceded that appellee notified appellant's cashier, at the time he was called upon to pay the original obligation, of his parol agreement with the Slack Co. that he was only to pay for the whisky as it was delivered, and that the original note was without consideration, this would not have been sufficient to impeach the consideration of a note subsequently executed by him to Slack Co. for the balance due in the hands of an innocent purchaser for value.

We have reached the conclusion that there was no competent testimony to support the plea of no consideration relied on to defeat recovery; and that the trial court should have given the jury a peremptory instruction to find for the plaintiff. The judgment is, therefore, reversed and cause remanded for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

Lands—Liens—Conveyances—Where Johnston conveyed a tract of land to his son, and the son died without paying anything on the land, when the father qualified as his administrator and in order to enforce his lien had his lawyer to assign the notes to Row, his son-in-law, instituted a suit in Row's name for the sale of the land, obtained judgment, attended the sale and bid the land in in Row's name. The sale was confirmed, deed executed to Row, which was approved by the court and delivered by the circuit clerk to the county clerk who placed it in a box, but did not record it because the tax was not paid. Row took no part in the suit, was not at the sale and did not know the deeds were made to him. Upon Johnson's death Row discovered that the deed was made to him and claimed the land. Held—A judgment in an action by the heirs-at law of Johnson adjudging the land to be their property was proper.

W. L. Reeves for appellant.

Perkins & Trimble and S. Y. Trimble for appellees.

Appeal from Todd Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

On September 15, 1885, B. H. Johnson conveyed to his son, Jake M. Johnson, a track of land known as his river farm in consideration of $1,500 to be paid in one, two and three years. Jake M. Johnson died in the year 1888 without having paid anything on the land. His father, B. H. Johnson, qualified as his administrator. When he consulted an attorney as to bringing a suit to foreclose his lien on the land for the purchase money he was advised by the attorney that he had better not bring the suit in his own name as he was the administrator of his son and would thus be both plaintiff and defendant. He replied that he would transfer the notes then to his son-in-law, John H. Row, and requested the attorney to write the transfer, which he did. Johnson thereupon signed the transfer endorsed on the back of the notes and delivered them to the attorney with directions to institute the suit and subject the land to the payment of the notes. This the attorney did; he had no communication with Row, was not acquainted with him. Judgment was obtained for the sale of the land. Johnson attended the sale and bid in the land in the name of Row. The sale was confirmed and the commissioner executed a deed to the purchaser, which was approved by the court and ordered to the proper office for record. The deed was delivered by the circuit clerk to the county clerk, who placed it in a box and did not record it as the tax was not paid. Row took no part in the suit, was not present at the sale, and seems not to have known that the deed was made to him. This was in the year 1889. B. H. Johnson took possession of the land and held and used it from that time until his death, on April 24, 1900. He used and claimed it as his own, built a barn on it, had a dispute with a neighbor about one of the lines, his home place was adjoining and he held the whole boundary alike, shifting the fences as he pleased, and treating it all as one farm. Row was a man of moderate means, and lived about five miles from Johnson. He was well acquainted with Johnson's holding and use of the land. After Johnson's death Row said at first that Johnson had only asked him to let him sell that land in his name, and he told him all right; that he had not paid a dollar on it, and it was no more his than it was the rest of the heirs; that he had not thought about it from the day he and the old man made the arrangement until them. After this, however, he set up claim to the land as his own, one of Johnson's sons having found the deed lying in the county clerk's office and had it recorded. B. H. Johnson's widow qualified as his administratrix, and on October 19, 1900, filed a suit in equity against Row, alleging these facts, and charging fraud, and praying that if the defendant failed to convey the land to the heirs of B. H. Johnson, then she be adjudged a lien on it for the purchase money. On November 12, 1900, the children and heirs-at-law of Johnson filed a suit against Row, alleging the same facts, and praying that they be adjudged the owners of the land. The two suits were consolidated. On final hearing the court dismissed the action of the administratrix and adjudged the land to be the property of the children and heirs at law of B. H. Johnson. From this judgment Row appeals.

He pleaded the pendency of the first action by the administratrix in abatement of the second action by the children and heirs at law. The plea was properly held bad because the actions were by different parties, and sought the enforcement of entirely different rights. He also relied on the first action as an election to sue for the purchase money, and insists that after this election was made the heirs could not sue for the land. But the administratrix who represented only the personal estate could not, by any action of hers, prejudice the rights of the real representatives. Besides, the second action was brought very soon after the first, and before Row was in any way prejudiced by the bringing of the first action. In other words, he was in no worse position than if that action had not been brought. He was misled in no way, and lost no right which he would otherwise have had. There is, therefore, no substance in either of these objections.

It is also insisted that the deed to Row as long as it stands is an insuperable barrier to the recovery of the land by the heirs of Johnson, and that there can be no recovery on the oral contract or relief on the ground of fraud under sections 2515 and 2519, Kentucky Statutes, providing that an action for relief on the ground of fraud or mistake must be commenced within five years next after the cause of action accrues; that the cause of action shall not be deemed to have accrued until the fraud or mistake is discovered; but that no action shall be brought ten years after the time of the making of the contract or the perpetration of the fraud. No title passes by a deed until it is delivered. There is no delivery without an acceptance. Row did not know that the deed was made, or know that it was in the county clerk's office until after Johnson's death. No liability could be imposed upon him by reason of this deed until he accepted it, and no rights can accrue to him without an acceptance of it. Besides, if the deed was made to him in trust for Johnson, and he in fact held the title in trust for him, this trust may be established by parol, and may be enforced. Row's whole conduct, as well as his declarations, indicate that he had not accepted the deed, and that he recognized that such title as he had was held by him in trust for Johnson. By a long line of cases it has been held that a trust of this sort may be established by parol. (Williams v. Williams, 8 Bush, 241; Webb v. Foley, 20 Ky. Law Rep., 1207; Butler v. Prewitt, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 814; Brothers v. Porter, 7 B. Monroe, 109; Farris v. Dunn, 7 Bush, 278; Miller v. Antle, 2 Bush, 408; Green v. Ball, 4 Bush, 586; Martin v. Martin, 16 B. Monroe, 8.)

The statute of limitations is equally inapplicable. Row was never in possession of the land. Johnson took possession after the commissioner's sale and continued in undisputed possession until his death, more than eleven years afterwards, Row acquiescing all this time in Johnson's ownership of the land. The title of the trustee can not ripen into a perfect title in him simply because he stands by without claim to the property and permits the real owner to enjoy for over ten years. To so hold would be to make the statute of limitations a sword and not a shield, and to adjudge that long acquiescence in their claims to the property was a sure means in the hands of the crafty to bar the true owners of their rights. In Burt & Brabb Lumbe Co. v. Bailey, 22 Ky. Law Rep., 1264, a man obtained from two ignorant old people, who could not read or write, a deed for four thousand acres of land, telling them it was a different kind of paper. They remained in possession of the land and did not learn of the fraud for ten years, when they brought an action to enjoin him from cutting their timber or disturbing them in the possession of the land. He relied on limitation of ten years, but it was held that the statute was not applicable as he was never in possession of the land. This case was followed and approved in Sewell v. Nelson, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 2488, where the court said, speaking of the plea of limitations: "The argument is a novel one. It is that one out of possession under a fraudulent and void conveyance, it may be, can have such conveyance ripened by time into a perfect one; that it may sustain an action of ejectment against one originally having the better title and in possession. The position is fallacious. The statutes of limitation do not apply (as respects property) to any one not in possession."

These cases were followed in Potter v. Benge, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 24. The proof in the case clearly establishes the facts above stated, and leaves no room for doubt of the correctness of the chancellor's judgment.

The judgment is, therefore, affirmed.

BINION, &c. v. WOOLERY, &c.

(Filed February 24, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Land—Sale for taxes—Where land was sold for taxes and a deed made to the purchaser, who sold the land to W., in an action by him to enforce lien for taxes paid a judgment in his favor will not be disturbed where the sale was confirmed without objection.

2. Clerical misprision—Where a judgment claims relief not sought in the pleading, it is a clerical misprision which may be corrected on motion.

J. R. Botts and Hazelrigg & Chenault for appellants.

R. D. Davis for appellees.

Appeal from Carter Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

John Nemezwski owned a tract of land in Carter county. He failed to pay the taxes for the year 1882, and in January, 1883, the land was sold for the taxes, amounting to $8.37, and was bought by John Rice. Nemezwski did not redeem the land and the sheriff made Rice a deed. Rice after this paid the taxes on the land as his own. In the year 1894 Nemezwski claimed the land, and Rice agreed to give it up to him if he would pay him back his money. They had a conference as to how much was coming to Rice and finally agreed on $100 as the amount; but Nemezwski failed to pay the money. After this Rice sold the land to Daniel H. Woolery. Previous to this, however, Nemezwski had filed suit for the land. Rice died and Woolery defended the suit.

Judgment was entered in that case in favor of the plaintiff for thirteen-fifteenths of the land, and Woolery was adjudged lien on it for the amount of the taxes paid. Jones & Davis, who were attorneys for the plaintiff, asserted a lien on the recovery for their reasonable attorney's fee of $300. On June 29, 1897, Woolery brought this action, alleging these facts and that the taxes paid on the land amounted to $173.98; he prayed judgment enforcing the lien adjudged him in the former case. Jones & Davis, on their petition, were made defendants, and asserted their lien for $300. On final hearing the court adjudged Woolery $100, with interest, also adjudged Jones & Davis $300, subject to Woolery's lien, and ordered a sale of the land, which was had. Woolery bought the land for the amount of his debt, interest and costs, and the sale was confirmed without objection.

The tax lien was on the entire tract, and the court, therefore, properly ordered the whole tract sold on Woolery's claim. The proof is very indefinite as to the amount of the taxes paid by Rice owing to the fact that he is dead, and that all the tax receipts can not be found. From those that are produced, however, it would appear that the taxes on the land were about $6.60 per year, and nobody but Rice seems to have paid any taxes after the year 1882. Rice and Neinezewski agreed on $100 as the proper amount coming to Rice on account of the taxes which had been paid, and this agreement of the parties is the best evidence in the record on the subject. After so many years the death of Rice and the loss of the tax receipts, the court properly followed the agreement and gave judgment in favor of Woolery for the amount so agreed on.

Appellants can not raise the question that the land did not belong to Rice when he sold it to Woolery on the ground that it had been forfeited to the Commonwealth for the nonpayment of taxes by Rice. Woolery was adjudged a lien on the land in the former suit, and that judgment is conclusive. Besides, the forfeiture took place after Rice's death, and there is nothing here to show the regularity of those proceedings. It is true Jones & Davis had only a lien on thirteen-fifteenths of the land, and that a sale should have been ordered of only what they had a lien on for the payment of their debt. But this was perhaps a clerical misprision in entering the judgment. They only asserted a lien on the land they recovered, and in so far as the judgment grants relief not sought in the pleading or claimed in any way, for which no foundation is laid, it is perhaps a clerical misprision which may be corrected on motion (Martin v. McKinney, 4 Ky Law Rep., 452; Emerson v. Walker, 17 Ky. Law Rep., 288; Long v. Elfort, 80 Ky., 152), it being patent that it was only so entered by inadvertance. But in any event the land when sold brought only Woolery's debt, Jones & Davis getting nothing. Appellants have not, therefore, been prejudiced.

Judgment affirmed.

PRICE v. PRICE.

(Filed February 24, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Divorce and alimony—Contracts—After the separation of appellant and his wife, but before they were divorced, they entered into a contract by which, in lieu of all rights of maintenance and alimony and all rights in real estate and other property, the wife should be paid $1,500, and have one-half of the household and kitchen furniture, such contract did not relieve the husband of the payment of a note that he had previously executed to the wife for money derived from her father's estate.

2. Husband and wife—Under the married woman's act of 1894 the husband may become indebted to the wife and execute to her an enforceible obligation.

J. F. Gordon and C. J. Waddill for appellant.

Baker & Baker and Lockett & Lockett for appellee.

Appeal from Webster Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

The appellant, C. S. Price, was formerly the husband of the appellee, but the bonds of matrimony had been dissolved. After the separation took place, but before they were divorced, they entered into a contract which reads as follows: * * * "Now we, for the purpose of settling our respective property rights, and in order to effect a fair and equal division of the property of whatsoever possessed by the party of the second part, do hereby covenant and agree as follows: The party of the first part agrees to accept in lieu of all rights to and interest in all real estate, personal property and cash possessed by the party of the second part, all rights of maintenance and alimony, the sum of $1,500 and one-half of the household and kitchen furniture now on hand, said sum of $1,500 and one-half interest of said household and kitchen furniture has this day been paid, and receipt of same is hereby acknowledged by the party of the first part, in full of all rights above mentioned, and the party of the first part does hereby relinquish to the party of the second part all rights of dower, homestead and other rights to and interest in all property of which party of the second part is now possessed or that he may hereafter acquire." * * *

At the time this contract was executed the appellee held the appellant's note for $574.88, which had been previously executed for money which she derived from her father's estate. After the divorce was granted the appellee instituted this action on the note against the appellant and recovered a judgment therefor with interest. This action of the court is here for review. The writing in clear and explicit terms shows the parties were contracting with reference to the wife's interest in the husband's estate, and that they were dividing the property possessed by him. The relinquishment which she made was "to right of dower, homestead and other rights to and interest in all property of which the party of the second part is possessed or that he may hereafter acquire." The contract does not purport to have reference to any other property save that of the appellant. There is no ambiguity in the writing and neither fraud nor mistake has been shown in its execution. The record shows that the appellant was indebted to the appellee in the sum evidenced by the note. He so became indebted since the act of 1894. Under that act a husband can become indebted to a wife, and execute to her an enforceable obligation.

The judgment is affirmed.

SIMMONS v. REINHARDT.

(Filed February 24, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Mortgage—Husband and wife—In a mortgage by the husband on his real property in which the wife joined, conveying all their interest in a house and lot, the expression "all their interest" conveys everything, and the fact that the word "interest" is singular instead of plural in nowise militates against this conclusion.

2. Same—The imperative language of a mortgage must control, and in an action to enforce the lien created by it one who signed it can not be heard to say that he did not intend it should accomplish what the language of the instrument clearly embraces.

Sweeney, Ellis & Sweeney and W. S. Pryor for appellant.

Miller & Todd and L. P. Little for appellees.

Appeal from Daviess Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

The appellees were the sureties on the official bond of A. M. C. Simmons, tax collector of the city of Owensboro. This officer having become short in his accounts to the extent of $2,220, which he was unable to pay, this sum was paid by his sureties; whereupon, in order to indemnify them against loss, he and his wife, the appellant, executed and delivered to the appellees the following mortgage:

"That in in consideration of $2,220, A. M. C. Simmons and Lucy M. Simmons hereby convey to John G. Delker, Louis H. Reinhardt and L. P. Little all their interest in the house and lot in Owensboro, Kentucky, on the west side of Frederica street, bounded on the north by the lot of R. J. Fryser; on the south by the lot of J. D. Brashear, and on the west by the lot of W. H. Clark. Also the one-half interest in the vacant lot north of Seventh and Center streets owned jointly by A. M. C. Simmons and John Wandling, and being the same property conveyed to them by T. L. Hall.

"The purpose of this conveyance is to secure said Delker, Reinhardt and Little in the said $2,220 four months from this date; should the said Simmons pay, or cause to be paid, the above mentioned indenture, then, in that event, this mortgage shall be null and void; otherwise it remains in full force and effect.

"This May 1, 1896.

"A. M. C. SIMMONS.

"LUCY M. SIMMONS."

After the execution of this mortgage A. M. C. Simmons died, and W. E. Aud was appointed administrator of his estate. The debt which the mortgage was executed to secure not having been paid, this action was instituted by the appellees for personal judgment against the administrator and an enforcement of their lien against the land described. To this action Lucy M. Simmons was made a defendant. To the petition of appellees she filed an answer, pleading, first, that she joined in the mortgage only for the purpose of giving a lien upon the interest of her husband, A. M. C. Simmons; that he only had a life estate therein, and after his death she had a life estate, which was not embraced, and not intended to be embraced, in the mortgage in question; second, that at the time of the execution of the mortgage her husband was mentally unsound to a degree which incapacitated him from contracting; that, therefore, his act was void, and he not having joined with her, her act was void; and, third, that the execution of the mortgage was procured by fraud.

The affirmative allegations of this answer were placed in issue, and the case coming on for trial on the merits, the chancellor rendered a judgment in favor of appellees, enforcing their lien upon the life estate of the appellant, Lucy M. Simmons, from which judgment she has appealed. Although the appellees, at the time they took the mortgage to secure their debt, believed that the whole title of the property was in A. M. C. Simmons, the undisputed fact is that he had only a life estate therein, and that at his death, his wife surviving him, she had a life estate; and the first question that arises is whether or not Mrs. Simmons mortgaged her life estate by the instrument which she signed. On this question we do not think there can be two opinions. The language of the mortgage precludes the existence of any estate in the land owned by A. M. C. Simmons or Lucy M. Simmons which was not mortgaged to appellees. The expression "all their interest" conveys everything, and the fact that the word "Interest" is singular, instead of plural, in no wise militates against this conclusion. The imperative language of the mortgage must control, and appellant having signed it, can not now be heard to say that she did not intend it should have accomplished what the language of the instrument clearly embraces. While the appellees did not know the exact condition of the title, as between Simmons and his wife, they did understand that they were getting all the title that they had, and this, we think, they are entitled to.

The allegation of the unsoundness of mind of the husband is not sustained by a preponderance of the evidence. We doubt if the evidence of appellant alone on this subject would sustain her position; but, when taken in connection with all the evidence, we think that the soundness of mind of the husband, at the time he executed the instrument in controversy, is clearly established.

The issue of fraud or overreaching was not even pretended to be established, and the uncontroverted testimony shows that, so far from appellees' attempting to defraud or overreach A. M. C. Simmons, they had not even asked him to execute the mortgage in question; on the contrary, however, he approached F. G. Delker, and told him that he desired to secure his sureties, asking him to come to his (Simmons') house that night for the purpose of receiving the mortgage, the other sureties not knowing, until after the instrument was executed, anything of the transaction. Delker and appellant alone testify as to what took place when the mortgage was executed and delivered, and while she makes a feeble attempt to show that he represented to her that she was only conveying her husband's interest, he testifies that he made no representation to her whatever, and the burden is on her.

We fully appreciate the hardship of this case upon appellant, and the pathos of her position, in being left aged, penniless and widowed, deeply affects us; as to this aspect of the case we can make no better answer than is contained in the opinion of the learned chancellor below: "I have gone over the whole case, the pleading, evidence and suggestions of counsel, two or three times, and reflected over it, with unusual care and deliberation, because of the fact that the defendant is an old woman, and the property involved is her last bit of earthly estate, and when deprived of it she will be left houseless. These are considerations that have compelled me to anxiously consider every fact and interpret every doubtful fact more favorably toward the defendant, and this much a chancellor is warranted in doing, but he is not warranted by such considerations in disregarding well-established rules, and giving to language an interpretation contrary to its plain grammatical import. Nor may he, in considering the right and credibility of testimony, discard the logical effect of overwhelming preponderance of the evidence on the one side or the other, if it exists."

Judgment affirmed.

CUMBERLAND VALLEY BANK'S ASS'EE V. CITIZENS NATIONAL BANK.

(Filed February 24, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Contracts—A writing executed by the assignee of a lumber company and one to whom it had executed notes, and banks to which the notes were indorsed, that the one to whom the notes were executed could sell certain lumber and distribute the proceeds pro rata between the banks, was a valid contract, the parties being capable of making the agreement and the lumber being properly subject to such agreement.

Hazelrigg & Chenault and S. B. Dishman for appellant.

Robt. T. Quisenberry for appellee.

Appeal from Boyle Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

The petition as amended, to which a demurrer was sustained, contains averments to the effect as follows: The Stone-Heines Lumber Co., of Cincinnati, Ohio, executed to John W. Faulkner its several notes, aggregating over $33,000, which he endorsed and sold to various banks. One of the notes for $7,987.40 was endorsed and sold to the Cumberland Valley Bank and one to the appellee for $3,150. In July, 1890, the Stone-Heines Lumber Co. made an assignment to Granger for the benefit of its creditors. On August 2, 1890, Faulkner, the banks to which he had endorsed and sold the notes (including the Cumberland Valley Bank and appellee) and Granger, as assignee, entered into a writing by which all the parties to the contract agreed that Faulkner should sell certain lumber which he owned, and after deducting the expense of making the sales and delivery of the lumber turn over the proceeds to the Cumberland Valley Bank, who was to distribute it pro rata to the banks on the notes which they held. Faulkner shipped some car loads of lumber to Cincinnati, O., for sale, and on March 6, 1891, the appellee sued out an attachment in a court in that city, and had it levied on the lumber which had been sent there by Faulkner, and was sold in satisfaction of its debt, but only realized $1,920. Just before the appellee instituted the action in Ohio the Cumberland Valley Bank instituted one in Kentucky, and attached the lumber which was the subject in part of the agreement referred to. It was averred in the petition, as amended, that the action was for the benefit of all the banks which entered into the agreement.

To sustain the judgment of the court below it is urged, first, that the instrument was a nudum pactum; second, that it was a preferential act and operated as an assignment of Faulkner's property for the benefit of his creditors; third, that the Cumberland Valley Bank violated the agreement by bringing the suit, thereby releasing all other parties from its terms. We are unable to see that it was a nudum pactum. The parties were capable of making the agreement. The lumber could be the subject of such an agreement. The owner placed it in trust so that the net proceeds might be applied to the payment of his debts. The petition does not disclose that Faulkner was insolvent when he entered into the contract, and that he entered into it with the design to prefer the contracting creditors to his other creditors. It is averred in the petition that the Cumberland Valley Bank prosecuted the action in which it obtained an attachment against the property for the benefit of all the banks; that this fact was known to the appellee, and its attorney co-operated in the prosecution of the action. The facts averred do not raise the question discussed by counsel, that the Cumberland Valley Bank violated the agreement in bringing the action.

Counsel for appellee argues the case as if the petition contained an averment that the Cumberland Valley Bank instituted the action for its own benefit, and in disregard of the terms of the agreement. When this state of facts is shown by the record the question will arise whether or not the institution of the action by the Cumberland Valley Bank for its own benefit had the effect of releasing all the parties from the terms of the contract.

The judgment is reversed for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

HILTON, &c. v. COLVIN.

(Filed February 24, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Damages—Title to land—In an action for damages from cutting timber, where the plaintiff, by record evidence, traced his title to the Commonwealth and proved actual possession, a verdict for damages will not be disturbed on the ground that he was not the owner of the land.

2. Pleading—Estoppel—In admissions to one about the title to land, and that he might go ahead and buy, such admissions not being pleaded as an estoppel in pais, testimony on that point is incompetent.

D. D. Sublett for appellants.

John W. Rodman for appellee.

Appeal from Magoffin Circuit Court.

The appellee brought this action against the appellants for damages for having entered upon his boundary of land, and cut and converted to his own use certain valuable timber trees growing thereon. Appellants answered, denying that plaintiff was the owner or in possession of the land from which the trees were taken, and alleged that they were the owners and in possession of the tract. A trial before a jury resulted in a verdict and judgment for plaintiff for $60. Defendant's motion for a new trial having been overruled, they have appealed and ask a reversal on two grounds: First, because the verdict is palpably against the weight of the evidence; and, second, because the plaintiff was estopped by admissions and representations made by him to them previous to their alleged purchase of the land in dispute from one S. W. Brown from the prosecution of this suit.

Upon the trial the plaintiff introduced record evidence tracing his title back to the Commonwealth to the land from which the trees were taken, and proved actual possession thereof by a number of witnesses. And we are inclined to the opinion that the verdict of the jury is sustained by the weight of the evidence. Both of the defendants testified that a short time previous to their purchase of the land in controversy from S. W. Brown that they had a conversation with plaintiff about the title thereto; and that the plaintiff represented to them that the title was all right, and advised them to go ahead and buy the land. Their testimony on this point is also corroborated by several other witnesses, but denied by plaintiff. Whilst this testimony was admitted without objection, in fact the record fails to show that a single exception was reserved by either party during the course of the trial, it is a well settled rule of pleading that estoppels must be specifically plead, with great particularity and precision, leaving nothing to intendment. This rule proceeds upon the theory that an estoppel precludes a party from asserting the truth, and all things essential to give the right to shut out the truth should be affirmatively plead. (Bliss on Code Pleading, section 364; 8 En. of Pl. & Pr., 7; Farris and Wife v. Dunn, &c., 70 Ky, 276.) As the defendants did not plead the representations and admissions of the plaintiff with regard to the title to the land in controversy as an estoppel in pais, the testimony on this point was incompetent, and could not have been made the basis of a judgment. Besides, no instruction on this point was asked or given by the trial court.

For reasons indicated the judgment is affirmed.

DEERING & CO. v. VEAL.

(Filed February 24, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Married women—Sureties—A married woman who signed a note at the request of her husband and gave it to him, made him her agent to deliver it, and she is bound by the representations he made as her agent.

2. Same—Where the wife, who was surety upon notes of the husband, executed a note in lieu of the former notes, a plea of no consideration could not be maintained because the relinquishment of the cause of action against the husband upon the former notes was a sufficient consideration for the note executed by the wife.

N. B. Hays for appellants.

Appeal from Bell Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

Appellant brought this suit against appellee on the following note:

October 3, 1888.

"On or before the 1st day of March, 1889, for value received, I, the undersigned, of section —, township —, State of Kentucky, promise to pay William Deering & Co., or order, $826.14, with interest at 6 per cent. per annum from date until paid.

"The endorsers, signers, sureties and guarantors severally waive presentment for payment, protest and notice of protest and notice of nonpayment of this note and diligence in bringing suit against any party to this note, and agree that time of payment may be extended without notice or other consent and without affecting their liability.

In the first paragraph of her answer she pleaded that the note was executed without any consideration. The second paragraph of her answer is in these words: "Defendant alleges that about two years prior to the date and time when said note is alleged to have been executed by this defendant the plaintiffs did enter into a contract with and sell to one James Veal a self-binder reaper for the amount as stated in said note and plaintiff's petition; that it was for the price of said reaper which was sold and credited to said James Veal for which said note was executed by this defendant; that this defendant never bought said reaper or anything else from plaintiffs, and never had any other transaction with or received any consideration from plaintiffs, but that at the time she signed and executed said note it was understood and agreed by the plaintiffs and this defendant that defendant was only to be surety for said James Veal on said note for the purchase price of a reaper which the said Veal had bought from said plaintiffs and owed them for; that said note became due and payable March 1, 1889; that the defendant is surety to James Veal in the said note sued on, and that the cause of action set forth in plaintiffs' petition did not accrue within seven years before the commencement of this action."

The plaintiff demurred to the answer, and his demurrer being overruled, filed a reply controverting its allegations. The proof for the plaintiff on the trial showed that on September 1, 1886, Elenora Veal and James Veal, who were then residing near Lexington, Ky., executed to William Deering & Co. two notes, each for $100, due September 1, 1887, and December 1, 1887, respectively; that on September 19, 1887, James Veal and Elenora Veal executed to it another note for $90, due in one year, and on November 4, 1887, executed a fourth note for $50, due October 1, 1888; that after the four notes fell due certain sums were paid on them, and on October 8, 1888, the balance due on them aggregated in all $336.14; that she then executed her individual note sued on for the amount which was accepted by William Deering & Co. in satisfaction of the four old notes, she claiming to be on the point of selling some land, and agreeing to turn over as security for the note a $900 purchase-money note for the land which she expected to sell, but that this she afterwards failed to do.

The defendant stated on her own behalf on the trial as follows:

"Two gentlemen came down to our place one morning to have me sign a note with Mr. Veal as surety. Mr. Veal did not sign it for some reason. He told me that he wanted me to sign it as surety."

"Q. Where was it that you signed this note?"

"A. I signed it in my own home."

"Q. Where were you living then?"

"A. In Fayette county, Kentucky."

"Q. This note was executed for a self-binder?"

"A. Yes, sir."

"Q. Did you sign any other notes prior to this note?"

"A. No, sir; I had not myself."

"Q. Had you ever signed any other notes that were made to them?"

"A. No, sir."

"Q. Did Mr. Veal when he brought you this note tell you for what it was executed?"

"A. Yes, sir; self-binder."

"Q. You remember the circumstances of your husband having bought a self-binder from William Deering & Co.?"

"A. Yes, sir."

"Q. How long prior to the execution of this note?"

"A. In the summer of that year."

"Q. You had not bought any machinery from them yourself?"

"A. No, sir."

"Q. Any other property?"

"A. No, sir."

"Q. Ever obtain anything of value from either of this firm?"

"A. No, sir."

"Q. Ever have any business transaction with them other than the one you have just stated?"

"A. None at all—never was in their office."

On cross-examination her attention was called to the form of the note, and she said:

"A. The note was drawn up for Mr. Veal—he was to be the undersigner."

"Q. Mr. Veal did not sign it?"

"A. I suppose that is his neglect."

"Q. There is no one's name but your own."

"A. I signed it where it should be, in the proper place."

"Q. Any one sign it but yourself?"

"A. I supposed my husband would sign it when he took it back to the men."

She denied that the four old notes were surrendered when the note in suit was given, or that she agreed to give as collateral the purchase-money note of $900 for the land, but said her husband purchased a self-binder, and that the note in suit was given for it, and was the only note she signed.

On this evidence the court refused to instruct the jury peremptorily to find for the plaintiff, and instructed them as follows:

"1st. Gentlemen of the jury, if you believe from the evidence the note described and mentioned in plaintiffs' petition as having been executed and delivered by the defendant to the plaintiff, was executed without consideration, you will find for the defendant.

"2d. If, however, you believe from the evidence in this case that the defendant signed this note as surety, and with the understanding that that was the proper place to sign on the first line above as it appears, and that she did sign the same as surety only and not as her personal obligation; that more than seven years have elapsed since the maturity of this note before the institution of this action, you will find for the defendant.

"3d. unless you so believe you will find, as stated in instruction No. 1, for the plaintiff the amount of note sued on."

To constitute a sufficient consideration for a contract it is not necessary that the promissor receive a benefit from it. A consideration may be something beneficial to the promissor or disadvantageous to the promisee. A release of a legal right by the promisee is a sufficient consideration to support a contract. (Bishop on Contracts, sections 61-68.) If the four old notes were settled by the note in suit, or if no notes had been given for the binder, and the note in suit was executed therefor, it is not without consideration,

For if the next day Deering & Co. had sued James Veal for the price of the binder, he could have answered that the plaintiff had accepted the note of Elenora Veal, due the following March, for the debt, and this would have defeated the action. The relinquishment of the cause of action against James Veal was a sufficient consideration to support the defendant's promise. On the undisputed facts, therefore, the note was not without consideration.

By section 2514, Kentucky Statutes, an action on a written obligation for the payment of money must be commenced within fifteen years after the cause of action accrues. By section 2551 a surety in such an obligation shall be discharged from all liability thereon when seven years have elapsed without suit after the cause of action accrues. A surety is one who contracts for the payment of a debt in case of the failure of another person who is himself principally responsible for it, or, as it has otherwise been expressed, a surety is a person who being liable to pay a debt is entitled, if it is enforced against him, to be indemnified by some other person who ought himself to have paid it before the surety was himself compelled to do so. (Brant on Sureties, section 1; Addison on Contracts, 618, 8th edition; Wendlandt v. Sohre, 37 Minn., 163.) Appellee was not surety for anyone on the debt sued for. It was her debt. In Short v. Bryant, 49 Ky., 10, Short executed a note with Withers, who was an infant. When they were sued on the note Withers pleaded infancy; judgment was rendered for him on that plea, and a judgment for the debt was rendered against Short alone. After the lapse of more than seven years execution was issued on the judgment, and Short relied on limitation. The plea was held bad. The court said: "Short's liability on the judgment was not as surety in the judgment, nor in the original note, but as the only person ever bound by the note; he, therefore, does not come within the fair interpretation of the terms of the statute, and as he had no right against the original co-party which might be affected by the conduct of the creditor in the enforcement of the judgment, he does not come within the reason or principle on which the statute makes the delay of execution a discharge of the surety."

In Gaines v. Poor, 60 Ky., 504, Poor bound himself by a writing to save Gaines, his heirs and representatives, free from any claim of Mrs. Gaines for dower in his estate, and suit was not brought on the contract until seven years after the cause of action accrued. Mrs. Gaines did not sign the contract, but it was held that if she had signed it as principal, and Poor as her surety, the contract would have been void as to her, as she was a married woman, and Poor would not have been her surety within the meaning of the statute. These cases control here, for no one else was bound to William Deering & Co. for the debt except appellee after the note in suit was accepted. By the statute now in force a married woman can not bind her estate for the debt of another unless it has been set apart for that purpose by a mortgage or conveyance. (Kentucky Statutes, section 2127.) But the note in suit was given before this statute was passed. The defendant did not plead her coverture.

If a surety signs a note and places it in the possession of the principal under his promise to procure another to sign it before its delivery, and he in violation of his promise delivers the note to the payee, who is ignorant of the arrangement, the surety is bound notwithstanding the fraud of the principal. (Smith v. Moberly, 49 Ky., 268; Whittaker v. Crutcher, 68 Ky., 622.) But the surety so signing is not bound if the agreement between the principal and surety is known to the payee when he accepts the note. (Coffman v. Wilson, 59 Ky., 542; Bivins v. Hensley, 61 Ky., 78.) When appellee signed the note at the request of her husband, and gave it to him, she made him her agent to deliver the note, and she is bound by the representations which he made as her agent. (Tompkins v. Triplett, 28 Ky. Law Rep., 805.) The fact that her name appeared on the second line, and not on the first line for signatures to the note, was not sufficient to put appellant on notice of any infirmity in the paper, for notes and contracts are often signed in this way. But this defense also was not pleaded. The court, therefore, erred in refusing to instruct the jury peremptorily to find for the plaintiff.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded for further proceedings consistent herewith.

CHINN v. SHACKELFORD.

1. Fees—Clerk of Court of Appeals—Section 44 of the act of June 15, 1893, relating to the collection of fees, does not apply to the clerk of the Court of Appeals, but applies only to those officers who are required monthly to report the amounts in their hands and pay it into the State treasury and are then allowed to draw back for salaries and expenses 75 per cent. of the amount so paid in.

2. Same—Where there is a change in the office of the clerk of the Court of Appeals, the incoming officer takes up the work where the former put it down, and he may properly collect any fees due the office and apply it to the conduct of the office just as the former might have done had he continued in office.

R. L. Greene for appellant.

N. B. Hays for appellee.

Appeal from Franklin Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

The term of S. J. Shackelford, as clerk of this court, expired on the first Monday in January, 1904. He was succeeded by J. Morgan Chinn. At the expiration of the term there were a number of fee bills, outstanding and unpaid, due the clerk of this court for services rendered. This agreed case between Shackelford, Chinn and the auditor of the State was filed to determine what should be done with these fee bills. The question turns on the construction of the provisions of the sections 38-54 of the act "relating to fees," approved June 15, 1893, which, with some amendments, now constitute sections 1761-1777, Kentucky Statutes. As the question before us turns on the construction of the original act, we will refer to the sections of it. Section 38 is in these words: "The clerk of the circuit court, the clerk of the county court, commissioners, receivers, examiners and the sheriff of each county having a population of 75,000 or over, shall, after the terms of the present incumbents, respectively, expire, and on the first day of each month, severally send to the auditor of public accounts a statement, subscribed and sworn to by each of them, showing the amount of money received or collected by or for each of them the preceding month as fees or compensation for official duties, and shall, with such statement, send to the auditor the amount so collected or received."

Section 39 provides that each of the officers mentioned above shall receive an annual salary of $5,000, and that the number of deputies, their compensation and the necessary expenses of the office shall be fixed by an order of court, which shall be forwarded to the auditor. Section 40 provides that the chief deputy shall receive a salary of $2,000, and the other deputies not exceeding $1,500 each. Section 41 provides that the salary of each officer, and his deputies and the expenses of the office, shall be paid monthly by the treasurer of the State upon the warrant of the auditor, if 75 per cent. of the amount paid into the treasury during the month is sufficient to pay them, and that if there is a deficit for any month it may be made up out of the amount paid in any succeeding month. Section 42 provides a penalty if the officer fails to make the report or pay the money any month. Section 43 makes it a felony if the officer knowingly makes a false report. Then follows section 44, which is in these words: "When the term of any chief officer shall expire, or he shall die or resign, or be removed from office, he or his personal representative, trustee or committee, as the case may be, shall at once deliver to his successor in office all accounts, claims and fees due to such officer in his official capacity; and it shall be the duty of such successor to have such fees, claims and accounts collected, or the auditor may, in his discretion, when said accounts, fees and claims are so delivered to the successor, appoint some person to collect them, and if he does, the successor shall at once, or at any time when demanded by such person, deliver to him all accounts, fees and claims uncollected. The successor or the person appointed by the auditor, as the case may be, shall, every sixty days after receiving such accounts, fees and claims, report to the auditor, under oath, the amount collected thereon, and at the same time pay to the auditor the amount so collected, and shall continue to so report for three years, unless the accounts, fees and claims are sooner collected."

Section 45 directs that the auditor shall draw his warrant on the treasurer in favor of the person collecting for an amount equal to 20 per cent. of the sums so paid into the treasury, and that this shall be in full of the compensation allowed to collector. Section 46 provides that if the amount paid to any officer during his term shall not have been sufficient to pay the salaries and expenses of the office, the auditor shall, out of the money so collected, pay to the person entitled thereto an amount sufficient to supply the deficit due for salaries and expenses, but that he must not so pay exceeding 75 per cent. of the amount of fees which accrued during the term and were collected and paid into the treasury. Section 47 and section 48 provide penalties for the violation of the above provisions. Sections 49, 50, 51 and 52 make similar provisions as to the jailer in counties having a population of 75,000 or over, the principal difference being that the jailer is required to report monthly not only his collections, but also all sums due him, money due from the State being treated as paid. Section 53 regulates the jailer, county clerk, circuit clerk, commissioners, receivers, examiners and sheriff in a county having a population of over 40,000 and under 75,000. These are required to make annual reports and to pay over annually the balance in their hands. Then follows section 54, which is the only one in which the clerk of the Court of Appeals is mentioned. So far as material it, as originally enacted, reads as follows: "The clerk of the Court of Appeals and each assessor in a county having a population of over 75,000 shall annually, in the month of January, report to the auditor under oath the amount received by him on account of his official duties or position, from all sources during the preceding year; as well as the amount paid out by him for deputies or assistants, giving the amount paid to each and for expenses of his office; and if it shall appear from such statement that any such officer received as compensation on account of his office from all sources more than $4,000 after the payment of his deputies or assistants and all the expenses of his office, such officer shall, with such statement, pay to the auditor the amount so received in excess of $4,000. * * *

"The salaries of the deputies of the clerk of the Court of Appeals shall be fixed by an order of the Court of Appeals, a copy of which order shall be filed with the auditor by the clerk of said court when made."

By an act approved March 4, 1898, the following words were added to this section: "If it shall appear from the reports required to be made to the auditor by the clerk of the Court of Appeals under this section that the amount earned and received by said clerk, on account of his office, is not sufficient to pay him $4,000, together with the salaries of his deputies or assistants and the other legitimate expenses of his office in any year, then said officer may retain out of money earned or received by him, on account of his official duties in said office during the year or years following, enough to make up such deficit."

Another amendment to the act was made by the act of March 21, 1900, but it refers only to commissioners and receivers in counties having a population of 75,000 or over, being an amendment to section 38 above quoted, and is, therefore, not material here. The case before us turns on the question whether section 44, above quoted, applies to the clerk of the Court of Appeals. If it does not, the fees due at the end of Shackelford's term being due the office, may be collected by the incumbent of the office. But if this section applies, these fees, whether collected by Chinn or by a person appointed by the auditor, must be paid into the treasury, and are not available for the payment of the salaries or expenses of the office under section 54.

It will be observed that section 38 refers only to the clerk of the circuit court, the clerk of the county court, commissioners, receivers, examiners and the sheriff of each county having a population of 75,000 or over. After the amount of the salaries of the officers and their deputies and the necessary expenses of the office are regulated in sections 39 and 40, it is provided in section 41 that 75 per cent. of the amount paid in by them monthly may be used to pay these salaries and expenses. In other words, the officers named are required to make monthly payments and monthly reports to the auditor and are allowed to draw back 75 per cent. of the amount so paid in. Then follow two sections relating to penalties, and then comes section 44, on which the case turns. At first blush it must strike any one that this section refers to the officers above mentioned, and that the reason why the fees must be collected and paid into the treasury is that the salaries and expenses of the officers may be paid out of the treasury as provided in section 41; and that this is the meaning is shown by section 46, which provides that out of the money so collected the auditor shall pay any deficit due for salaries and expenses not exceeding 75 per cent. of the amount paid into the treasury, which is the same provision as to the per cent. as contained in section 41, which by its express terms applies only to the officers named in section 38. The clerk of the Court of Appeals is not so limited to 75 per cent. of the fees collected by him.

The next four sections of the act, 49-52, apply only to the jailer in counties having a population of 75,000 or over. Section 53 applies to officers in a county having a population of over 40,000 and under 75,000. Section 54 applies to the assessor in counties having a population of over 75,000 and the clerk of the Court of Appeals. It will thus be seen that by the act the officers are divided into four classes: First, the clerk of the circuit court, clerk of the county court, commissioners, receivers, examiners and the sheriff in counties having a population of 75,000 or over; second, the jailer in counties having a population of 75,000 or over; third, the jailer, county clerk, circuit clerk, commissioners, receivers, examiners and the sheriff in counties having a population over 40,000 and under 75,000; fourth, the clerk of the Court of Appeals and assessors in counties having a population of over 75,000.

In classes 1 and 2 the money must be paid into the treasury by the officer and only 75 per cent. of the amount so paid in can be paid back on account of salaries or expenses of the office. In these classes also monthly reports are made and monthly payments. In classes 3 and 4 the officer pays the salaries and expenses out of his receipts and pays into the treasury the balance in his hands. Annual reports are made and an annual payment of the balance in the hands of the officer. As to classes 3 and 4 there is no provision of law for any money which is paid into the treasury being paid back to the officer in any event on account of salaries or the expenses of the office; and if section 44 were held applicable to the clerk of the Court of Appeals, it would follow that if the clerk should die or resign, all fees due the office would have to be collected and paid into the treasury, and only 75 per cent. of the money could be withdrawn to pay the salaries and expenses of the office; although if the clerk had lived or had not resigned, the whole fund might have been used for this purpose. In carefully thus classifying the different offices and making essentially different provisions as to them the legislature showed a clear purpose not to put the clerk of this court under the provision enacted for certain offices in counties having a population over 75,000, the reason being, no doubt, that litigation in this court varies, and it was deemed uncertain what, if any, surplus would be left to the State after paying the expenses of the office; so it was deemed unwise to place such restriction as might cripple the public service.

For these reasons we conclude that section 44 does not apply to the clerk of this court; but that as shown by section 46 and the context it applies only to those officers who are required monthly to report the amount in their hands and pay it into the State treasury, and are allowed to draw back from the treasury for salaries and expenses not exceeding 75 per cent. of the amount so paid in; that it is intended to carry out this plan in case of the death or resignation of these officers or the expiration of their term, for without it there would be no way of paying the salaries and expenses of the office unpaid at the death of the occupant or the expiration of his term, the plan being that if the officer lives or continues in office he shall collect the fees and pay the money into the treasury, and if he dies or his term expires another shall do so. But as to the clerk of this court a different scheme is made. He collects his fees, pays the salaries and expenses of his office, and at the end of the year pays the balance in his hands into the treasury. There is no reason under this plan that there should be a change at the end of the term of the clerk, or when he dies or resigns. When Shackelford's term expired and Chinn succeeded him, the incumbent of the office only being changed, the latter took up the work where the former put it down, and might properly collect any outstanding fees due the office and apply the money to the conduct of the office, just as the former might have done had he continued as clerk. In order that a proper settlement may be had by the auditor with each of them, a list of these unpaid fees should be made out, and Chinn should receipt to Shackelford for them. Then the records of the office will show just what each received, and proper settlements can be made.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded for a judgment as herein indicated.

CITY OF LEXINGTON v. WOOLFOLK.

SAME v. HAYMAN.

(Filed February 25, 1904.)

1. Street construction—Collection of assessment—Where the general council of a city ordained that certain streets be improved by brick paving, having been petitioned by the owners of a majority of the front property abutting the proposed improvement, and the work was completed and accepted, and the general council ordained that the assessment for these improvements be paid July 1, 1895, and annually thereafter for ten years, the abutting lots were a lien to the city for these assessments; but where the city bought the tax bills it acquired no greater lien than it had before and the provision for a year for redemption does not, therefore, apply, and after the assessment became delinquent the circuit court had jurisdiction at any time to enforce its collection.

2. Same—Construction of statutes—Section 8'01, Kentucky Statutes, making provision for street improvement and as to offering the tax bill for sale is merely cumulative, enabling the city to realize the money earlier than by suit.

3. Same—Pleading—In an action to enforce a lien on abutting property for street improvements the allegation in the petition that the ordinance requiring certain streets to be paved with brick was duly passed; that the engineer made and filed plans and specifications, and pleading in substance the contract by which the lowest bid was accepted, was sufficient.

Allen & Duncan for city of Lexington.

Morton, Webb & Wilson for appellee Woolfolk.

L. J. Moore for J. Q. A. Hayman, appellee.

Appeal from Fayette Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

The city of Lexington is attempting by these suits to enforce liens on appellees' lots abutting certain of its streets for the cost of reconstructing the streets with brick at those points.

The circuit court dismissed the city's petitions on demurrers. Under section 8096, Kentucky Statutes, the general council of cities of the second class may, by ordinance, provide for the reconstruction of its streets, upon the petition of the owners of a majority of the property abutting the street to be improved, or by a two-thirds majority vote of all the members elected to each board of the general council. The cost of such reconstruction is one-half chargeable to the abutting property, pro rata per the front foot, and the other half to be paid by the city. By section 8101 it is provided that the general council may provide that any such reconstruction shall be made on the ten-year plan. In that event, upon public notification, the property owners who are charged with half the cost of the improvement are required to pay their respective portions of the assessment in cash at a time fixed in the notice. Upon default of such payment the general council is authorized to borrow money to discharge the cost of the improvement, and to issue the city's bonds therefor payable in equal installments through ten years, and bearing interest. The abutting owners, who have not paid in cash their assessments, are required to pay one-tenth of such assessment, and 5 per cent. per annum interest thereon, and 5 per cent. per annum interest on the remaining assessment unpaid, annually at such time as shall be specified in the assessing ordinance. The manner of collecting the annual installments, and indeed of collecting the whole assessment, is the main point in controversy in these suits.

By section 8096 it is provided: "There shall be a lien upon such lots or parcels of real estate for the part of the cost of such improvement so assessed thereon, and the same shall bear interest from the time of the assessment. All such liens may be enforced by action."

In section 8101, speaking of the default in paying the annual installments discussed above, it is provided: "In default of such payment at such times, the same penalty shall attach on the amount so payable as attaches to the nonpayment of other municipal taxes, and shall be collected, together with the amount so due from the owner or owners of such lot or parcel of land, in the same manner as other city taxes and penalties are collected for municipal purposes, and such assessments and penalty shall be and remain a lien upon such lot or parcel of land until the same has been fully paid and satisfied."

The general council of Lexington ordained that the streets in question be improved by brick paving, having been petitioned by the owners of a majority of the front foot property abutting the proposed improvement. The work was completed, inspected and accepted, and the general council ordained that the assessment for these improvements be paid on July 1, 1895, and annually thereafter for ten years. Appellees failed to pay their assessments in cash. In May, 1903, the city caused the tax bills, including the assessments and penalties and interest for each of the years 1895, 1896, 1897, 1898, 1899, 1900, 1901 and 1902 to be offered for sale at public outcry. There being no other bidder, they were bid in by the city. This proceeding was taken by the city under section 8187, Kentucky Statutes, governing the method of collecting "other city taxes and penalties."

Section 8187 requires the delinquent tax bills to be advertised by the auditor and sold by the treasurer "on the first Monday in the next month" after they shall have come to his hands as such. The sale must be for cash "at public auction to the highest bidder." The auditor then returns the bills to the treasurer, who, on said day, offers them for sale as advertised, if then unpaid. "If no one will offer the face of said bills for them, he shall buy them in for the city."

The section continues: "The owner or owners of any lot, the tax bill on which has been sold, shall have the privilege of redeeming the same within one year of the day of sale by paying to the treasurer the said bill, with all penalties and interests as herein provided to the day of payment."

It is the contention of appellees that the taxpayers, in these cases the lot owners, have one year from the date of the sale of the delinquent assessments or tax bills in which to pay the amount before a suit can be brought by the city to enforce the lien on the lots. The complication in the application of this provision is doubtless due to the fact that it is particularly applicable in all its features to the collection of ordinary tax bills alone. There is no provision in the chapter governing cities of the second class other than in this section for a lien upon specific property of the taxpayer to secure his city taxes. This lien is made to attach upon the sale of the tax bill as above provided. The purchaser of the tax bill at such sale acquires a lien on the lot described in the tax bill, but which he can not enforce for one year from the date of sale. The section, contemplating that the city might buy in the bills, provides in that event: "When the city shall buy in the tax bills the city solicitor shall, by proper proceedings in the name of the city in the circuit court, enforce the lien on the property for the city."

There is no express reference in the section or elsewhere to a time for redemption from the sale to the city. It is argued that the legislature could not have intended that the taxpayer should have one year in which to redeem from the sale if the bill was sold to any other person, while if it was sold to the city there would be no time for redemption. The argument proceeds upon the theory that the legislature was looking alone to the interests of the delinquent taxpayer. This supposition is erroneous. The first thing in view in enacting the section was to provide a sure and speedy method of collecting the city's revenues, so essential for the maintenance of its government. The rights of the taxpayer were regarded merely incidentally, and must be secondary to the right of the city to subsist. There could be no good reason for putting the delinquent taxpayers' interest first. After having been afforded a fair chance, and reasonable time within which to meet his tax obligation, further indulgence by way of encouragement to more protracted delinquency, and to further postpone the collection of the city's revenues, would be contrary to the purpose of the statute; that the city was not to be put off longer is reasonably certain from the whole section. Note that the sale of the tax bill was to be by summary proceeding and for cash in hand. The purchaser was given a liberal interest in the way of percentage and penalties to justify his investing his money, so as to encourage his bidding. This was an inducement to insure the city's getting the money due it quickly, and not as a punishment to the delinquent. True, the latter is given a year in which to redeem from that sale. A shorter time would scarcely have afforded enough of interest to justify an outsider's buying in such claims. Yet to give the whole of an adequate penalty to such purchaser at once might be very harsh treatment of the taxpayer; so that by giving the purchaser a good bargain to tempt him to buy and part with his money, and by giving the delinquent a whole year in which to redeem from that sale, something of an equitable arrangement is made, and the city is relieved. But none of these reasons apply where the city is the "purchaser" of the tax bill. The delinquent taxpayer has already been given his full time, the same as given all others, to pay the tax. Under the law the city can not levy more than enough to pay its current and fixed expenses, consequently it can not have a surplus of ready money to meet deficits. The city's administration of its government, as well as its credit, depend on its ability to promptly collect the taxes due it, the principal and practically the sole source of its income. When no one else will offer to buy the tax bill at the sale the city has exhausted all efforts save one to collect the tax. It already has a lien on the property. The penalties have been added already, not as a matter of speculation or gain to the city, but as an incentive to the taxpayer to pay promptly so as to avoid them. They have been unavailing, though. Why should the city be compelled to wait another year before taking the only remaining and efficient step to get its money? No other consideration could be advanced than a sentimental regard for the delinquent who has been deaf to every call and impervious to every claim that he should meet his obligation. In the absence of express declaration that such was the legislative intent, we can not reasonably adopt it, it is so obviously at war with the whole purpose of the section being interpreted. Furthermore, the section does not in terms give the right of extended redemption when the city buys in the bill, as it does where another buys it.

It is argued that the statute must be construed strictly against the city and in favor of the taxpayer; that all laws must be construed strictly against the taxing power. When the inquiry is, has the power to tax been granted, has it been exercised, or is its object a governmental purpose, such construction would doubtless be followed. But when the power exists, and has been exercised in aid of a governmental function, why should the statute regulating the manner of collecting the tax be strictly construed? It is true taxes are not debts. Yet they are obligations of the very highest nature, imposing at least a patriotic duty on the citizen to pay them. The sustenance of government, and consequently the enjoyment of all its privileges, depend upon the prompt collection of its revenues. Statutes imposing and providing for the collection of taxes are to be construed fairly with regard to their purpose, the office of construction being to help do what the legislature intended should be done in enacting the law. In applying and enforcing such statutes we are not yielding the stubborn submission of unwilling subjects, but are applying those reasonable and necessary provisions for the maintenance of an orderly social compact among a self-governing people. A rule of strict construction that thwarts the purpose of the legislature, and makes unduly difficult the thing that was intended to be made simple, direct and easy, will be rejected. The rule of interpretation here adopted is in harmony with the legislative direction in this respect. Section 3100, Kentucky Statutes, expressly provides against errors in the proceedings of the general council invalidating the taxpayer's obligation after the work has been done. But it is stated that "the general council or the courts in which suits may be pending shall make all corrections, rules and orders to do justice to all parties concerned." This was intended to avoid that line of strict construction adopted with reference to such proceedings, and to place them on the same footing in the courts as other claims of liens sought to be enforced.

From these sections we conclude that the abutting lots were in lien to the city for these assessments, which were due in installments on July 1, annually, beginning with the year 1895; but not including the penalties and compound interest to be imposed where the sale of the tax bill by the treasurer was to another than the city; that the city by buying in the tax bills got no new or greater lien than it had before; and that the provision for a year for redemption does not apply where the city "buys in the bill," that is, fails to sell it. We are also of opinion that the circuit court had the jurisdiction to entertain these suits at any time after the assessments became finally delinquent.

Appellees contend that as the sale of the tax bills did not take place, nor were they advertised to take place, on the first Monday in the month after they had been listed with the treasurer, the city has acquired no rights by the sales, and that they were invalid. Authorities are cited to the effect that when a tax sale is required to be had on a day named, a sale on any other day is void. But none of those authorities hold that for that reason the tax assessment is void, or that the lien is extinguished or lessened. The argument followed out would mean that these assessments can never be collected; for the first Monday of the first month after they became delinquent having passed without an advertisement or sale of the bills, they can never be legally offered, and, therefore, no right to sue to enforce the lien given by them can ever accrue to any one. If the sales had been made in fact, and some one had bought the tax bills, then this defense might be pertinent. But here there was no sale. There was merely an offer of sale. This section, wherein the city is permitted to sell the delinquent tax bills, is manifestly for the benefit of the city. Before another than the city could have the right to maintain a suit to enforce a lien on the lot the statute giving such right must be shown to have been substantially complied with. If the city failed to offer the tax bill for public sale the lot owner has no ground of complaint. He still owes the assessment; it is past due, and delinquent in every sense of the word. Section 3096 gave the lien and the right of the city to sue in the circuit court to enforce it. The provision of section 3101 as to offering the tax bill for sale is merely cumulative, enabling the city to realize the money due it quicker possibly than by suit.

Very earnest complaint is made by appellees of the form and sufficiency of the petitions. It is argued that the general demurrers were properly sustained on this ground, if no other. The pleader in setting out the various ordinances and steps by which the city obtained the lien on appellees' lots for the cost of the improvement of the abutting ways did not plead the ordinance at length. The following from one of the petitions will serve to illustrate the matter complained of: "High street * * * is one of the public streets of the plaintiff; that the owners of a majority of the front or abutting feet of the real estate abutting on said street petitioned the general council to provide for the reconstruction of said street with brick; that thereafter the general council, two-thirds of the members elect in each board voting therefor, passed ordinance No. 422, which was duly approved and published in the official newspaper, a copy of said ordinance being filed herewith, marked exhibit 'A,' and made a part hereof, the same as if fully written herein, directing the roadway of the street aforesaid to be constructed by blocks with brick; that the city engineer, in accordance with the directions contained in said ordinance, prepared accurate profiles, plans, specifications and estimates for the reconstruction of said street with brick, which were accepted and approved by the general council by ordinance No. 463, which was approved and published in the official newspaper, a copy of said ordinance being filed herewith," and so on, setting out similarly every essential step required by the statute to be taken to make a valid contract for the improvement. It is insisted that the ordinances are not sufficiently pleaded. We think they are. Good pleading not only does not require, but forbids, the setting out of each step with undue prolixness. Although the copies of ordinances referred to as exhibits are not filed with the petition, the averments are sufficient; that an ordinance to improve a certain street with brick was duly passed is enough to state; that the engineer did make and file plans and specifications, which were adopted by the council, fully apprises the other party and the court that those necessary steps had been taken. So the substance of the contract by which the lowest bid was accepted is enough to be pleaded.

The judgments sustaining the demurrers and dismissing the petitions appear to us to be erroneous, and are for the reasons above stated reversed and the causes are remanded for further proceedings consistent herewith.

RHODES, &c. v. LOWRY & GOEBEL.

(Filed February 25, 1904—Not to be reported.)

T. E. Ward for appellants.

R. H. Cunningham for appellees.

Appeal from Henderson Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

The appellees ask the court to extend its opinion to cover the points made by them on their cross appeal.

At the time this case was under consideration it was not noted on the record that a cross appeal had been granted appellees; but it appears that such an appeal had been granted. It appears that the lower court allowed appellants two credits, one of about $25, the other about $50, in addition to credits admitted. Of this action appellees complain. Under the evidence as appears of record, and giving some weight to the opinion of the chancellor, we do not feel authorized to disturb his finding.

For these reasons the judgment of the lower court on the cross appeal is also affirmed.

MAYER v. MAYER.

(Filed February 25, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Wills—Homestead—Where a testator provided in his will that his wife, if she chooses, may occupy the dwelling house on a certain street, named in the will, or such other homestead as he may own at his death, the purpose of the will was to provide a home for his wife, and there being no provision that contemplates a forfeiture of it, the wife, if she chooses, may either occupy the house or rent it out and appropriate the rent; as she sees fit.

Montgomery Merritt for appellant.

Clay & Clay for appellee.

Appeal from Henderson Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

The last will and testament of Jacob F. Mayer, deceased, was duly probated in the Henderson County Court on the 24th day of June, 1890. He had been twice married. He left surviving him a widow and three children, the issue of his last marriage, and three children by a former wife. After making certain provisions for his wife, he directed that all the residue of his estate should be held in trust by his executor for the use and benefit of all of his children. For several years after the death of testator his surviving widow and her infant children occupied the family residence, but more than five years before the institution of this suit she moved with her children to the State of New Jersey, where she has since resided. This suit was instituted by appellee, Harry Mayer, who belonged to the older set of children, against the widow, asking a construction of the fourth clause of the will of his father, which is as follows: "It is my desire that my wife, while a widow, may, if she chooses, use and occupy the dwelling house on the corner of Green and Clay streets in the city of Henderson, Ky., or such other homestead as I may own at the time of my decease."

It is insisted that by the permanent abandonment of the dwelling house as a residence the widow had forfeited all right to use it; and that under the terms of the will it became a part of the general estate, which his executors were directed to hold in trust for the benefit of all the children, and asked that it might be so adjudged; and that appellant, Martha W. Mayer, be required to pay over to the executor the reasonable rents thereof since the date of her abandonment of the premises as a residence. The circuit judge so held, and the widow has appealed.

In Jarmon on Wills, 5th edition, section 798, the author says: "A devise of the 'free use,' or 'use and occupation,' of land passes an estate in the land, and consequently a right to let or assign it, and is not confined to the personal use and occupation of the property unless the context clearly calls for a more limited construction."

This rule is approved in 29 A. & E. Ency. of Law, 1st edition, 403, and the editor has collated in the note quite a number of decisions from the courts of various States who have also adopted and approved the rule. But it is the contention of appellee that the entire context of the fourth clause in this case clearly indicates a purpose on the part of testator to make the devise of the use of the dwelling house to his wife conditional upon its occupancy by her as a home, and that the words "may, if she chooses, use and occupy the dwelling house" have an entirely distinct meaning from the words "use and occupation." In our opinion the distinction attempted to be made is too fine spun. It is perfectly clear that testator had no particular affection for the house on the corner of Green and Clay streets, for he provides that if at the time of his death he was occupying another homestead, that she should have the use and occupancy of that dwelling house. The predominant idea in the devise was evidently to provide a home for the use and occupation of his wife during her widowhood. There is no intimation in the will which contemplates a forfeiture of this provision for her. We, therefore, conclude that appellants may, if she chooses, actually occupy the dwelling house at the corner of Green and Clay streets, or she may, if she sees fit, rent it out, and appropriate the rents for her own use.

For reasons indicated the judgment is reversed and cause remanded for proceedings consistent herewith.

2. Same—Where the husband never occupied a house and lot with his family as a homestead, he never acquired a right to a homestead therein.

Matt O'Doherty for appellants.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery Branch, First Division.

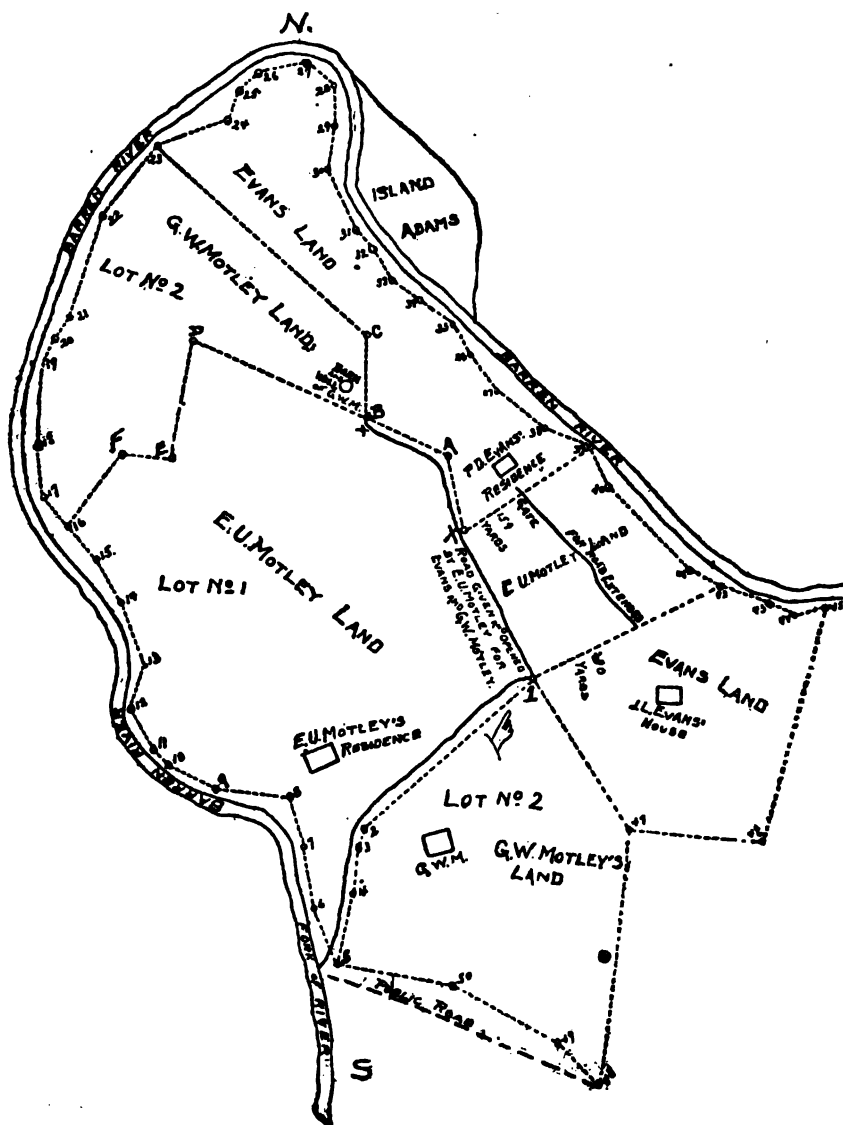

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

Bartholomew Higgins died, leaving as his widow Honora Higgins, and two children, Mary and Dennis. Mary is dead, and Dennis is over twenty-one years of age. The question for determination on this appeal is whether the widow has a homestead or dower in a house and lot in the city of Louisville, of which Bartholomew Higgins died seized.

The evidence tends to show that at one time after the death of her husband the widow occupied the house with the children, but for how long is not disclosed. The evidence fails to show when the husband died, or where he then lived, or that he ever occupied the house with his family, or at all, as a homestead. If he never occupied it with his family as a homestead, he never acquired a right to a homestead therein. An unexecuted intention to occupy it did not create the right. (Fant v. Talbot, &c., 81 Ky., 25; Hansford v. Holdam, 14 Bush, 210.) As the evidence fails to show that the husband had the right to the homestead in the property when he died, it is not shown that the widow did have such right. Section 1702, Kentucky Statutes states the conditions upon which one has a homestead in real property. Section 1707, provides that the homestead shall be for the use of the widow so long as she occupies it, and the unmarried infant children of the husband are entitled to a joint occupancy with her. The language used shows the widow's right to a homestead is predicated upon the pre-existing right of the husband to it. The court erred in holding that the widow had a right to homestead in the property instead of the right to dower therein. The fact that the widow is now insane and confined in an asylum does not have any bearing upon the question as to whether she took a homestead or dower interest in the property.

The judgment is reversed for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

EVANS v. MOTLEY.

(Filed February 18, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Wills—Passways—Were decedent divided his land among his two sons and the children of a deceased daughter, a passway over the land which was used almost solely by him for his own convenience was not such a passway as to be held by them, or one of them, by prescription, and where he announced his purpose to his sons of providing a passway over the lands for the use of one that should have a certain part, the one who took the part charged with a suitable and proper passway must maintain one, and could not convey such passway with the provision that it must be kept closed or the deed to it should be void.

B. W. Bradburn and Goad & Carpenter for appellant.

John M. Wilkins for appellee.

Appeal from Allen Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

John A. Motley died a resident of Allen county in the year 1888, the owner of a large boundary of land in what was known as Motley's bend on Barren river. Shortly before his death he divided this tract of land into three parts, and by his will, which was duly proven and recorded after his death, devised these respective pieces to his two sons, George S. and E. U. Motley, and to the children of his dead daughter, Mrs. John L. Evans. The location and division lines of these respective tracts of land are shown in a map made by L. Bowcher, filed with this opinion (see accompanying page):

The lot which he gave to his son, E. U. Motley, embraced the homestead, and ran from the river on the west to the river on the east, and separated the parts devised to G. W. Motley and to the Evans children from the public road. During the life of J. A. Motley he made use of a passway which ran along the eastern side of his boundary of land in order to get from the front of his farm back to the land lying in the bend. This passway, after the division of the entire tract of land, crossed the land devised to E. U. Motley and connected the lands devised to the Evans children, but did not touch either piece devised to G. W. Motley. It followed a zigzag course through a boundary of heavily timbered land, and did not connect any particular piece, but was simply used by John A. Motley as a matter of convenience.

In making the division of his land among his children testator made no provision for a passway from the back land devised to G. W. Motley and the Evans children to the public road. It appears from the map that the only public road which this boundary of land bordered on was the one from Scottsville, in Allen county, to Bowling Green, in Warren county. At the time of the division of his lands John A. Motley told both his son, G. W. Motley, and his son-in law, Evans, that he intended to provide a passway for the back land to the public road. With the view of carrying out the purpose of his father in this respect E. U. Motley opened a road, beginning at the letter B on the plat along the line between the land of E. U. Motley and the Evans children, but wholly upon his own land to the letter X, and thence across his land to the figure 1, which is the division corner of the southern boundaries of the land between G. W. Motley and the Evans children, from this point out to the public road at figure 5, and at the same time executed a deed to the passway twenty feet wide to G. W. Motley and the Evans children, in which the true location of the passway is described by courses and distances.

In this deed E. U. Motley reserved the right to put gates across the passway, and stipulated that the second parties were to keep them closed, and in the event of their failure to do so that the deed to the passway should become null and void. The appellant, P. D. Evans, one of the children of J. L. Evans, refused to accept this passway, and instituted this suit against E. U. Motley, asking that he be perpetually enjoined from in anywise obstructing the old passway, which ran parallel to the new road some 250 or 300 feet distant, upon the ground that the new passway was not suitably located for a road, and claiming the old passway by prescription. The issues were made in this proceeding, proof taken and upon final submission the circuit judge dismissed plaintiff's position, and he has appealed. We think the evidence in this case entirely fails to establish any prescriptive right in appellant to the use of the old passway. It was established by John A. Motley over his own land, and solely for his own convenience, and was rarely used by any one else.

The evidence also fails to support the contention that the new passway dedicated by appellee is not a convenient or suitable one. In fact it is quite apparent from an inspection of the plat that it affords a much more convenient outlet to the public road from the back land of G. W. Motley and the appellant than the old road; and that the trial court properly refused the injunction sought. However, appellee took the land devised to him by his father charged with the burden of providing a suitable and convenient passway, having regard to the pecuniary rights of all the parties, from the back land of appellant to the public road; and that he had no right to stipulate that this passway should be forfeited by a failure on the part of appellant or G. W. Motley to keep gates, that he might erect thereon, closed.

For any violation of his rights in this respect the law affords an adequate remedy. For this reason alone the judgment is reversed and cause remanded, with instructions that the trial court enter a judgment establishing the passway for the back lands of the Evans children and G. W. Motley, along the line indicated in the deed from E. U. Motley and wife to G. W. Motley, reserving to E. U. Motley the right to establish gates thereon at convenient places, and for other proceedings consistent with this opinion.

FIDELITY TRUST CO., TRUSTEE, &c. v. LLOYD, &c.

(Filed February 24, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Wills—Trusts—Where a testator provided by his will that his executors should have a period of forty years in which to administer their trust, such trust attempted to be created was obnoxious to the rule against perpetuities and to section 2360 of the Kentucky Statutes, for the reason that it unlawfully suspends the power of alienation for a longer period than the continuance of a life or lives in being at the creation of the estate and twenty-one years and ten months thereafter, the will plainly providing that his real estate shall remain in the hands of his executors for such period of forty years without reference to any life or lives in being.

2. Same—Construction of devise—Where a will creating a trust postpones the vesting of the estate beyond the statutory period of limitation, the trust created is void, and the estate devised must be treated and administered as intestate property.

Humphrey, Burnett & Humphrey, R. C. Kinkad and H. H. Nettleroth for appellants.

Joyes & Jarvis for Fidelity Trust Co., trustee, &c.

Bodley, Baskin & Flexner for Alice Drummond, &c.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery Branch, First Division.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

The will of Edwin V. Thompson, Sr., was probated without objection in the Jefferson County Court on the 10th of June, 1893. He left eight children and numerous grandchildren, some of whom were alive and some have been born since the probate of the will. The will disposed of a large estate, consisting of land in Jefferson county, Ky., outside of the city of Louisville, real estate in the city, and lands and personalty in Iowa and Kansas. On the 1st of July, 1902, four of testator's daughters, the husbands of two of them uniting, brought this action against the other children of testator, his grandchildren, the Fidelity Trust Co., as trustee under the will an statutory guardian of some of the infant grandchildren, and the National Trust Co., receiver, asking a construction of each clause of the will; and that the 1st, 3d, 4th, 7th and 8th clauses be declared void as contrary to and in violation of section 2360 of the Kentucky Statutes, prohibiting restraint upon the power of alienation for a longer period than during the continuance of a life or lives in being at the creation of the estate and twenty-one years and ten months thereafter. In an exhaustive opinion the chancellor upheld the contention of plaintiffs, and adjudged that E. V. Thompson, Sr., died intestate as to all the real estate owned by him, or in which he had any interest at the time of his death; and that it descended in equal shares to his eight children; that none of the grandchildren of testator, nor any of the proposed beneficiaries living at the expiration of forty years from testator's death, took any interest in any of the real estate which E. V. Thompson owned at the time of his death, or in which he had any interest. Defendants have appealed, and ask a reversal.

The clauses of the will involved upon the appeal are as follows:

"1st. I will that the house I now live in with four acres of ground attached, together with the outbuildings and appurtenances to said home, and all the personal property pertaining to said home, including animals, vehicles, implements, furniture, etc., shall be kept as a home by my wife, Jane L. Thompson, so long as she lives or so desires. And after her death, or otherwise giving it up as a home, it shall be so kept as long as any of my unmarried daughters may choose to occupy said place as a home. When the said place shall cease to be so used as a home the realty and personalty is to be disposed of according to other portions of this will.

"2d. My executors shall place the entire amount of my stocks and bonds and other securities for money, which are in the State of Kentucky, in charge of the Fidelity Trust and Safety Vault Co., to be by it held as follows: Said company shall make collections of debts, interest, dividends, etc., and make investment and reinvestments, and pay of the entire amount of the net income so derived to my wife, Jane L. Thompson, so long as she lives. After her death said net income is to be paid over to my children and grandchildren as follows: Said income shall be paid to my children who are then living in equal shares, and if any one of said children should not be living his or her share shall go to his or her children, with this provision, however, that in making said division all of my grandchildren shall take shares equal with one another.

"This trust is to continue for twenty years after my death. At the end of said twenty years the said personalty so held by said company, or its successor, shall be divided among my children and grandchildren in the same manner as the income aforesaid is to be divided among them. If, however, at the end of said twenty years any one of said grandchildren is less than thirty years of age, his or her share shall continue to be held by the said Fidelity Trust and Safety Vault Co., or its successor, until such grandchild attains the age of thirty years, and then be paid over. If my executors should at any time during the above trust all agree that it would be advisable to substitute some other custodian in the place of said Fidelity Trust and Safety Vault Co., they are hereby empowered to do so. Neither said company nor such substitute shall sell for reinvestment any of my stocks, bonds, or other securities it may hold, except with the consent of my executors.

"3d. It is my will that all the real estate I own in the State of Kentucky, outside the city limits of the city of Louisville, shall not be sold or mortgaged or otherwise encumbered for the period of forty years after my death, excepting that such of my lands now lying outside the said city limits which may be taken into the said city limits may be sold by my executors as directed in the next clause of this will. My lands remaining unsold as aforesaid shall be held by my executors and their successors and managed by them for the period mentioned for the benefit of those who may be the heirs of my body. The revenue derived therefrom during said period is to be divided among my children and grandchildren in the same manner as the net income from my personalty is directed to be divided in clause two. And at the expiration of said forty years said real estate shall be divided among those who shall then be the heirs of my body.

"4th. My real estate which is now in the city of Louisville, Ky., and which may hereafter come within its limits, and also my real estate in Iowa, Kansas and Texas, shall be managed by my executors, and the revenues derived therefrom appropriated as directed in clause three, as long as they remain unsold. When my executors so desire they may sell the same, and they are hereby invested with full power to sell and convey the same. If sold, the proceeds shall be invested in good interest-paying securities, or real estate yielding income, and the same shall be held for the same uses and purposes as is directed in clauses two and three.

"7th. All the lands owned by me at the time of my death in the State of Iowa jointly with my son, Edwin, shall be managed by him as at present, for the uses and purposes mentioned in clause three, if the same is agreeable to my said son. If not, then they are to be managed by those named, and in the manner directed, in clause four.

"Codicil—Upon consideration I have determined to make this addition to my will, and make this codicil: At any time after the expiration of ten years from my death, if all my children then living shall agree that it would be desirable to sell any part of my real estate, they, by uniting with my executors, are hereby invested with full power to sell and convey the same, the proceeds of said sales to be invested in securities or other real estate as directed in clause four."

By these clauses in the will of testator his executors were given full power to manage and control the real estate owned by him in the States of Kentucky, Iowa, Kansas and Texas for a period of forty years after his death, for the benefit of those who might be the heirs of his body. The power to sell, mortgage or otherwise incumber for that period being expressly prohibited except as to such lands as might be taken into the city limits during the period, in which contingency he provided that they might be sold and the proceeds invested in good interest bearing securities, or other real estate, to be held upon the same trust as provided in the second and third clauses of his will. During this period of forty years the executors are directed to pay over the net income of the property to his wife during her life, and after her death to his children and grandchildren in equal shares. In our opinion, the trust attempted to be created by this will is obnoxious to the rule against perpetuities and to section 2360 of the Kentucky Statutes, for the reason that it unlawfully suspends the power of alienation for a longer period than during the continuance of a life or lives in being at the creation of the estate and twenty-one years and ten months thereafter. Testator plainly provides that his real estate shall remain in the hands of his executors for the gross period of forty years without reference to any life or lives in being. The law permits the vesting of an estate and the power of alienation to be postponed for a life or lives in being and twenty-one years and ten months thereafter. But if the vesting of the estate or interest is postponed, or the power of alienation suspended, for a longer period, it is unlawful, and the devise or grant is void. The estate must necessarily vest within the prescribed period. If by any possibility the vesting may be postponed beyond this period the limitation over will be void. The statute concerns itself with the vesting of estates, and not with their termination. These principles have been repeatedly announced in numerous decisions of this court. (Coleman v. Coleman, 23 Ky Law Rep., 1476; Stevens v. Stevens, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 1315; Ludwig v. Combs, 58 Ky., 132; Armstrong v. Armstrong, 53 Ky., 845; Birney v. Richardson & Ford, 84 Ky., 427; Luke v. Marshall, 38 Ky., 355; Brashear v. Macy, 26 Ky., 91.)

While the restriction upon the power of alienation imposed by clause three upon the real estate is removed in the event these lands are taken into the city limits, this contingency may not happen during the forty years; and it is also uncertain who may take at the end of forty years, as it is utterly impossible to know who may be alive at that time. We, therefore, hold that the attempted trust, created by the 1st, 3d, 4th and 7th clauses of the will postpones the vesting of the estate beyond the statutory period of limitation, and, therefore, the whole trust is void, and the estate devised by these clauses must be treated and administered as intestate property.

Judgment affirmed.

SHACKELFORD v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed February 26, 1904—Not to be reported.)

False swearing—Defective indictment—An indictment for false swearing is defective which does not particularize the game or set out where and when played, about which the accused testified, because it does not apprise the defendant with reasonable certainty of the offense with which he is charged.

W. F. Hall for appellant.

N. B. Hays and Loraine Mix for appellees.

Appeal from Harlan Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

The appellant, Henry Shackelford, was indicted by the grand jury of Harlan county, charged with the offense of false swearing. A general demurrer to the indictment having been overruled, a trial of the case was had, which resulted in his conviction and sentence to the penitentiary, of which he is now complaining.

The first question for adjudication is whether or not the indictment states a cause of action against the appellant. It is alleged that he "did falsely, willfully, knowingly, corruptly and feloniously testify before and to said grand jury 'that he had not engaged in a game of cards in Harlan county within the last five years before that time, upon which there was any money or anything of value bet, won or lost, and that he had not seen any person or persons play, or engage in, any game in Harlan county within the last five years before that time upon which there was any money or other thing of value bet, won or lost.' When in truth and in fact said Henry Shackelford had engaged in games of cards in Harlan county within the last five years before said date, and had seen others engaged in games of cards in Harlan county within the last five years before said date, on which games, and on all of which games, there was money and other things of value bet, won and lost."

Section 122 of the Code provides that "the indictment must contain * * * a statement of the acts constituting the offense, in ordinary and concise language, and in such manner as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended; and with such degree of certainty as to enable the court to pronounce judgment on conviction according to the right of the case."

The indictment in this case is defective, in that it does not apprise the accused of the particular offense upon which he is to be tried. The falsity of his testimony before the grand jury is alleged to consist in the fact that, although he had sworn that he had not seen any games of chance played, nor been engaged in them himself, upon which money or other things of value had been won and lost, in Harlan county, within five years next before the examination, yet in truth and in fact he had been engaged in and had seen games of chance played in Harlan county, wherein money or other things of value had been won and lost, within five years; but the indictment does not particularize what game, and when and where played, the accused had seen, or in which he had been engaged. In order that he may prepare his defense it is necessary that he should be apprised, with reasonable certainty, of the offense with which he stands charged. This is not accomplished by the allegation in the indictment, that within five years next before the date of the examination he had seen games of chance played, and had played at them. Under this allegation the Commonwealth was at liberty to prove any of perhaps a hundred games played at different times and different places in Harlan county within the time mentioned, the accused being, in the meantime, unable to know what game the Commonwealth proposed to show that he had played, or had seen played.

The Commonwealth was not entitled to thus throw a dragnet around the accused, and when he was placed on trial to confront him with evidence which he had not been prepared to anticipate or meet. (Commonwealth v. Still, 88 Ky., 275.)

The accused could not have a fair trial without the opportunity to prepare his defense. This opportunity is not afforded him by the allegations of the indictment, and we are of opinion that the court should have sustained the general demurrer, and dismissed it.

Wherefore, the judgment is reversed for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

LOUISVILLE & NASHVILLE R. R. CO. v. DICK.

(Filed February 25, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Railroads—Damages—Pleading—In an action to recover damages for injuries to one who was struck by a train at a crossing where the particular acts of negligence were not set out in the petition and issue was joined on these allegations of negligence, under this state of pleading the railroad company can not say that it was surprised at proof which tended to show that the train was run carelessly and recklessly upon her, there being sufficient notice that the manner of operating the train would be brought in question on the trial.

2. Same—Married woman—Where a married woman is injured by the negligent act of another, the same criterion of recovery in an action for damages exists as to her as to a man or single woman.

Helm, Bruce & Helm and Benjamin D. Warfield for appellant.

Bennett H. Young, Dayton T. Mitchell and J. L. Dorsey for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Common Pleas Branch, Second Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

This is the second time this case has been in this court. The decision of the first appeal will be found in 23 Ky. Law Rep., 1068.

In the month of April, 1898, appellee was walking east on Broadway street, in the city of Louisville, and when crossing appellant's track where it intersects Broadway she was struck by one of appellant's northbound trains, and suffered such injury as resulted in an amputation of her foot. Appellant has two tracks about six feet apart, running north and south, crossing Broadway, the railroad coming out of Brent street which intersects Broadway street at this point. The southbound train runs on the western, and the northbound train, the one that injured appellee, on the eastern track. There were gates or poles on each side of the track across Broadway street used by appellant to warn persons of the approach of trains. When the train is expected to approach these poles were let down to keep people from crossing, and when the train had passed, and the danger was over, these poles were raised.

The appellee in her pleadings alleged in substance that appellant's agent in charge of these safety gates was incompetent, negligent and careless in the handling and management of them, and when she arrived at the crossing she found the gates or poles up, and did not know that a train was near, and that by reason of the fact that the gates were up she had the right to assume that it was safe to cross the appellant's track, and started across, and immediately the appellant's agent lowered the gates or poles, and thus hemmed her in and prevented her escape; and that the board crossing, prepared by appellant, whereon pedestriains were expected to cross the tracks, was in a defective, unsafe and dangerous condition, which fact was known by appellant, and by reason thereof, together with the negligent and improper management of the gates at the crossing, she was thrown, or caused to fall, down, and while down and unable to escape appellant's agents in charge of a train ran the train at a reckless, rapid and dangerous rate of speed, and ran it in such a careless, negligent and reckless manner as to run it upon appellee, and so mangled and injured one of her feet that it was necessary to amputate, and her foot was amputated near the ankle.

The answer was a traverse of these allegations, and a plea of contributory negligence, and also was added the following: "Denies that by any negligence or carelessness whatever on its part, or that of its agents or servants, or any or either of them," appellee was caused to suffer, or was damaged, in any sum. The contributory negligence was denied by appellee. A trial was had, which resulted in a verdict and judgment for appellee in the sum of $5,000, from which the appellant has appealed.

There were many grounds assigned for a new trial, but counsel for appellant only assigns three reasons why this court should reverse the judgment: First, that there was not sufficient evidence to sustain it; second, that the court by its instructions, Nos. 3, 4 and 5, submitted to the jury issues not raised by the pleadings; third, that the court gave erroneous instructions on contributory negligence and the measure of damages. With reference to the matter of insufficient evidence to sustain the verdict and judgment it is sufficient to say that the evidence on all the questions at issue was very conflicting. If the testimony of appellee's witnesses was true, the agent of appellant who managed the gate or poles was very careless and negligent; likewise the agents whose duties required them to make and keep in repair a reasonably safe crossing over the tracks; and, also, the agents in charge of the train were negligent in the management and operation of the train, and as a result of all these negligent acts combined, or any one of them, the jury was authorized to find for appellee. On the other hand, appellant's testimony, if true, established the fact that the gates and trains were managed and operated with prudence and skill; and the injury of appellee was not caused by any act or negligence of theirs, but was produced by her own negligence; and it was also shown by appellant's testimony that the crossing made for pedestrians over the tracks was in a safe and proper condition.

This court, in the former opinion, said: "We are of the opinion that if the testimony of appellant's (now appellee) witnesses be taken as true, she may recover." The testimony for appellee, as appears of record, is stronger than on the former appeal, and it was the province of the jury to determine the weight and effect of the testimony. The instructions of the court, Nos. 3, 4 and 5, did not, in our opinion, submit to the jury issues not raised or made by the pleadings. These instructions said to the jury in effect that if those in charge of the train saw appellee's peril, or by the exercise of ordinary care could have seen it, in time to have avoided the injury by the exercise of ordinary care, and yet failed to do so, then they should find for appellee.

This injury occurred at a place where it was made the duty of those in charge of the train to keep a lookout for those on or about the crossing. (Pittsburg, &c., R. R. Co. v. Lewis, 18 Ky. Law Rep., 958.) But appellant says the pleadings did not authorize these instructions. It is true that this court has decided repeatedly that it is sufficient to charge negligence in general terms, without specifying the particular acts of negligence, but if the particular acts of negligence are specified in the petition, no other acts of negligence can be submitted to the jury than those specified. The reason for this rule is that to permit a party to state in his petition one cause of action and recover on another cause not stated, would simply entrap the defendant, because the latter is led by the petition to believe that he is to meet one state of case, and then on the trial he is called on to meet a different state of case. We are of the opinion, however, that this rule does not apply to the pleadings in this case. In the pleadings of appellee it is alleged that she received her injury as the result of one of three causes, or by the combination of the three: First, the negligent acts of the keeper of the gate; second, the failure to make and maintain a reasonably safe crossing (these two acts of negligence were particularly specified); third, the negligent, careless and reckless management and operation of the train, whereby she was run over and injured. The particular acts of negligence on the part of those in charge of the train were not specified in the petition. The appellant made an issue with appellee on these allegations of negligence, and also denied that its agents, in the operation of the train, were guilty of any negligence of any kind or character. Under this state of pleading the appellant can not say that it was entrapped or surprised at any proof which tended to show that the train was run carelessly, negligently, recklessly or unnecessarily upon her. There was sufficient notice to appellant that the method and manner of operating the train would be brought into question on the trial.

The objection of appellant to instructions on contributory negligence is not well taken. It is the usual instruction given on the subject, and often approved by this court. The instruction on the measure of damages is in the usual and proper form, but appellant objects to that part of it which authorizes the jury to allow her anything "for any impairment of her power to earn money caused her thereby," for the reason that she was a married woman, and there was no proof that she ever had earned any money, and for her labor in performing household duties she was not entitled to anything.

In the case of South Covington & Cincinnati Street Railway Co. v. Bolt, &c., 22 Ky. Law Rep., 906, the court said: "Our opinion is that if a married woman is injured by the negligent act of another, she is entitled to maintain an action for damages, and the same criterion of recovery exists as to her as to a man or a single woman."

Perceiving no error prejudicial to the substantial rights of appellant the judgment is affirmed.

SOUTHERN PLANING MILL, &c. v. DOERHOFER'S EX'OR, &c.

(Filed February 25, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Res judicata—Where a contractor had failed and become a bankrupt, and the trustee, by order of the bankrupt court, had completed the contract, and by order of the court the amount due under the contract had been paid to the trustee, in an action by a creditor of the bankrupt against the owner of the house completed by the trustee to recover a sum due by the bankrupt, the judgment of the bankrupt court is res judicata, and the action was properly dismissed.

Forcht & Field for appellants.

O'Neil & O'Neil for appellees.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery Branch, First Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle.

Appellant, Southern Planing Mill and Lumber Co., instituted this action in the lower court to recover of John Doerhoefer and Andrew Peklink $429.24, alleged to be due it upon account for materials sold to Peklink and used by him in erecting a dwelling for Doerhoefer under contract with the latter, who was alleged to be indebted to Peklink in the amount of appellant's debt.

Appellant also set forth in its petition that it had in the statutory mode obtained a mechanic's lien on Doerhoefer's house and lot to secure the payment of its debt, which lien it sought to enforce. The answer filed by Doerhoefer traversed the averments of the petition, and in addition alleged in substance that though he had employed Peklink to do certain work on the house in question, and to furnish the material for its erection, the latter had, without performing the full work, or furnishing all the material, and after being almost fully paid for what he had done and furnished, abandoned the contract, and filed his petition in bankruptcy; that one Mueller, trustee in bankruptcy of Peklink, by order of the bankrupt court, completed the work upon Doerhoefer's house left unfinished by Peklink, furnishing the material necessary for that purpose, and upon the further order of the bankrupt court and proof heard it was ascertained that Doerhoefer, upon the completion of his house, was indebted for work done and material used on his house by Peklink, and his trustee in bankruptcy, in the sum of $1,400, which sum Doerhoefer, by order of the bankrupt court, paid into that court and to the trustee of the bankrupt.

It is also averred in the answer that appellant had, in the meantime, become a party to the bankruptcy proceedings, filed its claim in that court against Peklink, asserted its mechanic's lien as against Doerhoefer, and insisted upon its payment out of the fund of $1,400 paid to the trustee by Doerhoefer in settlement of the balance he was owing Peklink; and further, that the rights and liens of the parties were thereupon adjudicated and determined by the bankrupt court upon the issues and proof, with the result that appellant's lien debt was fixed at $866.60, of which it received out of the fund in the hands of the trustee paid him by Doerhoefer $426.76, leaving $439.84 of its lien debt unpaid.

The answer of Doerhoefer pleads the foregoing judgment in bar of appellant's claim against him, and this plea of res judicata having been sustained, by the lower court, appellant's petition was dismissed. Doerhoefer died during the pendency of the action in the lower court, or after its decision by that court, and it was thereupon revived against the executors of his will. The record before us sustains the averments of the answer, to the effect that Doerhoefer had paid Peklink before he became a bankrupt several thousand dollars of the contract price as the work on the house progressed, and that after its completion by Peklink's trustee, as directed by the bankrupt court, there was found to be due the estate of the bankrupt only $1,400. This sum Doerhoefer, by order of the court, paid to the trustee of the bankrupt, which payment operated as an acquittance and release to him.

It will not be denied that the bankrupt court had the jurisdiction to determine what amount, if anything, Doerhoefer owed the bankrupt, Peklink, and to require the payment of that sum to his trustee, nor will it be denied that that court had like jurisdiction in the matter of applying the estate of the bankrupt to the payment of his debts; also to determine liens and priorities among creditors, and to that end to require all parties in interest to be made parties to the proceedings in bankruptcy. This being true, it will further be borne in mind that the bankrupt court, after the appellant and other creditors of the bankrupt asserting mechanics' liens, together with Doerhoefer, his debtor, had become parties to the bankruptcy proceedings, directed the trustee of the bankrupt to complete Doerhoefer's house as the bankrupt had contracted to do; otherwise there would have been nothing due the latter's estate from Doerhoefer, and consequently nothing to be paid creditors holding mechanics' liens. After the completion of the house by the trustee the bankrupt court took the necessary steps to ascertain Doerhoefer's indebtedness to the estate of the bankrupt, and after the taking of the necessary proof it was judicially determined that the indebtedness was $1,400, and that this amount was the whole of it.

It was next adjudged that Doerhoefer pay the above sum to the trustee in bankruptcy, which he at once did. It was then adjudged that appellant's lien debt amounted to $866.60, but as there were doubtless other lien debts of equal dignity entitled to share pro rata with that of appellant in the $1,400 paid the trustee by Doerhoefer, appellant was further adjudged to recover only its share of the $1,400, which was $426.76, leaving $429.24 of its debt unpaid. But as between appellant, the other lien creditors and Doerhoefer, under section 2463, Kentucky Statutes, as amended March 21, 1896 (Acts 1896, pages 47-9), Doerhoefer was discharged from liability by the payment to the trustee in bankruptcy, for the benefit of the lien holders, of the $1,400, especially as the payment was made in obedience to a judgment of court, in a proceeding in which all persons having an interest in the fund to be distributed were made parties. If Doerhoefer did not truly account to the estate of the bankrupt for the full amount of his indebtedness on the building contract, appellant should have advised the bankrupt court of that fact, and itself taken such steps by further litigation, or appeal, as would have compelled a full disclosure from, and an accounting by, Doerhoefer. But having failed to prosecute the matter further in the bankrupt court and accepted the benefits of the judgment there rendered, it is too late for appellant by another action, and in a different forum, to re-open questions that were settled by the former judgment. In other words, the plea of res judicata interposed by the answer constitutes a good defense to the appellant's action.

The cases relied on as authority by counsel for appellant can have no application to a case in which, as in the one at bar, the question of the indebtedness of the owner of the property sought to be subjected to the payment of a mechanic's lien created by contract with the builder has been litigated and determined by a court of competent jurisdiction in a previous action between the same parties, especially where the judgment in the former action found such owner indebted to the contractor in a named sum, which, upon being paid by him, was applied by the court to the payment of mechanics' liens against his property.

Judgment affirmed.

SNELL v. PAYNE, &c.

(Filed February 25, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Lands—Trusts—Married women—Under the married woman's act of 1894 all of the estate of a married woman in lands is a separate estate, and where it was the sole discretion of a trustee to sell land, and where land was sold and the proceeds invested in other land which was not held under the will at all, there was no necessity for the appointment of a trustee in place of one resigned in order to invest proceeds of land.

J. D. & G. R. Hunt for appellant.

Morton, Webb & Wilson for appellees.

Appeal from Fayette Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

The question presented for decision by this appeal is as to the nature of the title taken by Mary Powell to a tract of land in Fayette county, Kentucky, which had been conveyed to her in exchange for another tract of land in Nelson county, Kentucky, which was devised to her by her father by the sixth clause of his will. That clause reads as follows: "I will and devise to my friend, Nathaniel Muir, in trust for my daughter, Mary Powell, two hundred acres of land where William Hampton now lives, including the one hundred and forty-nine and one-half acres I sold to the Hamptons and John Wallingford and took back, and enough land from the field directly west and Foster field to make two hundred acres, and enough land continuing west to make, at $45 per acre, $935. Said trust is for the use and benefit of my daughter, Mary Powell, all the proceeds or income arising therefrom for the use and benefit of my daughter, Mary Powell; and should my friend, Nathaniel Muir, at any time conclude that it is to her benefit and interest, he is authorized to sell the same and invest in some good securities, the interest of which to be used for the benefit of my said daughter, Mary Powell, she to be made equal out of my estate with all my other children."

In the proceeding in the Nelson Circuit Court to which Mrs. Powell and her husband, and her trustee, Nathaniel Muir, were parties it was alleged and shown that it was to the advantage of the said cestui que trust, Mary Powell, that an exchange be made by the sale of the land obtained under the sixth clause above named for a certain property, designated and described, which lay in Fayette county, Kentucky. The court decreed that the exchange should be made, and it was made. Thereupon Nathaniel Muir, the trustee, was permitted to, and did, resign as trustee, and deed was taken to Mrs. Powell and her children by the consent of herself and her husband, without the trustee, Muir, or any trustee being named as the grantee in the deed.

It is the contention of appellant that the Fayette county land conveyed to Mrs. Powell is in some way affected by the trust created under the will of James R. Hughes, father of Mary Powell, the trust created by the sixth clause of that will. Aside from the discretion vested in the trustee to sell the Nelson county land devised by that clause of the will, if in his judgment it was deemed desirable to do so, and to invest the proceeds in other securities for the benefit of Mary Powell, it appears that the will created only a dry trust. At the time the will of James R. Hughes was written the estates of married women to land in this State were either general or separate. Under the statute as it now is, and has been since 1894, and as it was at the time Mrs. Powell acquired the title to the Fayette county land, all of the estate of married women to lands in this State is a separate estate. It is now not necessary to have a trustee to hold the title of the married woman's separate estate, therefore, it was not material that Mrs. Powell had not a trustee in whom could be vested the title to the Fayette county land, to be held by him for her use under the will of her father. The sole discretion of the trustee, Muir, seems to have been limited to his selling the Nelson county land, and investing it in other securities without the consent of the beneficiary of the trust. After that land had been otherwise sold with the consent of the trustee and of the beneficiary and her husband, and had been invested in other land which was not held under the will at all, there was no occasion for the appointment of a trustee in the matter, as he had neither duty to perform nor discretion to exercise.

We concur in the judgment of the circuit court that neither the fact that the conveyance to Mrs. Powell of the Fayette county land was not made to her trustee, Nathaniel Muir, nor the fact that said trustee was by the judgment of the Nelson Circuit Court discharged as trustee under the will of Hughes, in any way affects prejudicially the title to the seventy-five acres of Fayette county land conveyed to Mary Powell and her children by R. M. Powell as aforesaid, and that judgment is, therefore, affirmed.

WEST KENTUCKY TELEPHONE CO., &c. v. PHARIS.

1. Damages—In an action by a woman fifty-eight years old for injuries resulting from catching her foot in the loop of a fallen telephone wire in a street, a judgment of $250 each against the city and telephone company will not be disturbed where the evidence showed the injury resulted without contributory negligence, and that the dangerous obstruction was known by the city and telephone company, or could have by the exercise of ordinary care been known in time to have removed it and prevented the injury.

2. Same—Contributory negligence—Where one saw an obstruction in a public street on a previous occasion to her injury resulting from it, she was not guilty of contributory negligence in coming in contact with it when she was passing the street at 6:30 o'clock in the morning, the day being cloudy and she having her mind on a sick sister with whom she had sat up the night before.

W. J. Webb, Robbins & Thomas and Ed. Crossland for appellants.

W. H. Hester and J. N. Crutchfield for appellee.

Appeal from Graves Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle.

The appellee, Tennie Pharis, recovered judgment against the appellants, West Kentucky Telephone Co. and the City of Mayfield, in the Graves Circuit Court, for $250 each in damages, from which judgments they have appealed.

On the night of January 27, 1902, a heavy and destructive sleet fell in the western part of this State, which broke down much timber and many wires and poles of telephone and telegraph companies throughout that section. The appellant, West Kentucky Telephone Co., lost many of its poles and wires by this sleet in and contiguous to the city of Mayfield. Two of its telephone poles, with their wires, fell and lay across the south end of Main street near its intersection with College street. In that city, Main street being one over which there was much travel. These telephone poles and wires were allowed to remain down and in and across Main street from the night of January 27 to the 10th of February, 1902, on which last-named date the appellee, a woman fifty-eight years of age, while passing along Main street on the way to her employment at a factory in the city, caught her foot in a loop of the telephone wire mentioned, and was thrown violently down upon the street, thereby sustaining the dislocation of her shoulder, and other serious injuries to her person, for which she recovered of appellants damages as stated. At the time of the accident travel by pedestrians was necessarily confined to a beaten path or track in the street which had been made rough by vehicles and horses, whereby it became less slippery and dangerous than was the sidewalk, which had temporarily been abandoned on account of its extremely slippery condition, and the presence thereon of broken limbs of trees and other debris.

It further appears from the evidence that the telephone wires at the place of the accident were partly submerged by ice and snow, but in places stood up above the ice and snow in loops, which seemed to be especially true of their condition directly in the traveled way which was followed by the appellee. At the time of the accident appellee was carrying in one hand a bucket containing her dinner, and in the other an umbrella to protect her from the snow that was then falling.

We are of opinion that the several elements essential to a recovery have been shown to exist in this case, as the evidence conduced to prove, first, that the presence of the fallen wires in the street rendered travel thereon under the circumstances dangerous to pedestrians; second, that the appellee was injured thereby without any contributory negligence on her part; third, that the dangerous obstruction of the street by the fallen wires was known, or by the exercise of ordinary care could have been known, to the appellants in time for them to have removed the same, and thereby prevented appellee's injuries.

It was primarily the duty of appellant telephone company to use ordinary care to keep its poles and wires in repair, and if they fell in the street to prevent them from remaining therein to the interruption or injury of persons traveling thereon, and if the presence in the street of the wires made travel thereon dangerous, and appellee's injuries were sustained by reason thereof, the telephone company was and is responsible in damages for such injuries, if it knew, or by the exercise of ordinary care could have known, of the presence in the street of the wires in time to have removed them, and thereby prevented appellee's injuries. It was likewise the duty of the city to exercise ordinary care to see that its streets were kept reasonably safe for the use of persons traveling thereon, and though the telephone company may have been negligent in allowing its wires to so obstruct the street as to render it dangerous to the traveling public, and by reason thereof appellee was injured, if the dangerous condition of the street thus caused by the presence of the telephone wires was known, or by the exercise of ordinary care could have been known, to the city in time for it to have removed, or caused the telephone company to remove, the wires before appellee was injured, and it failed to do so, it thereby became equally responsible with the telephone company to appellee for the damages resulting from her injuries.

The law applicable to the case at bar has been repeatedly declared by this court, in the following cases: City of Covington v. Asman, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 416; City of Covington v. Johnson, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 602; City of Wickliffe v. Moring, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 419; City of Louisville v. Johnson, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 65; City of Midway v. Lloyd, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 2448; City of Carlisle v. Secrest, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 386.

It is, however, insisted for appellants that inasmuch as it was admitted by appellee in her testimony before the jury that the wire over which she fell had been seen by her on a previous occasion, she must be presumed to have known of its presence at the time of the accident, and of the necessity of avoiding contact with it; therefore, in failing to avoid such contact she was guilty of contributory negligence, for which reason the peremptory instruction asked by appellants should have been given by the court. It appears from the evidence that appellee saw the fallen wire four days before receiving her injuries, as she was walking along Main street. The view thus obtained was merely accidental, and at most cursory. According to the authorities, general knowledge of the existence of such an obstruction on the part of one who is injured by contact with it is not of itself sufficient to show contributory negligence, though it is a fact competent to be considered by the jury in determining whether the person injured was or not guilty of such negligence.

It must be borne in mind that the appellee's injuries were received at the early hour of six and a half o'clock on the morning of a cloudy day as she was hurrying to her work through the falling snow, with her mind, as she testified, dwelling upon the serious condition of her sick sister whom she had attended through the greater part of the previous night. Under such circumstances it is not strange that she should have forgotten the presence of the fallen wires, or the danger of catching her foot in one of their loops.

In the Modern Law on Municipal Corporations, section 1202, it is said: "The fact that plaintiff had knowledge of the dangerous condition of a street will not prevent his recovery if he used reasonable diligence to prevent injury, hence his traveling on a sidewalk known to be out of repair is not negligence of itself. It may be evidence of negligence to use a street in a dangerous condition, but it is not negligence as a matter of law." * * *

It is further said in section 1204 of the same work: "Although a person is perfectly familiar with the dangerous condition of a sidewalk by reason of its frequent use, yet if through forgetfulness he walks into a hole in such walk, and is thereby injured, it is not contributory negligence."

In City of Carlisle v. Secrest, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 336, which was an action similar to the one at bar, this court said: "The evidence shows that appellee knew of the defective condition of the sidewalk in question, but momentarily forgot it. The fact that a pedestrian knows generally of the defect in a sidewalk does not make his use thereof negligence per se."

In City of Mayfield v. Gullfoyle, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 43, this court also said: "It can not be fairly said, as a matter of law, that appellee was guilty of contributory negligence by forgetting for the time the existence of the defect."

From the foregoing authorities it is clear that the trial court could not have held, as a matter of law, that the appellee was guilty of contributory negligence in the matter of receiving her injuries; consequently the peremptory instruction was properly refused. An examination of the instructions given and refused convinces us that the trial court did not err as to the law of the case. Those given told the jury in substance that in order to authorize a verdict for the appellee they must believe from the evidence, first, that the falling of the telephone wires in the street rendered travel thereon dangerous to pedestrians using the same with ordinary care; second, that appellee was thereby injured while using the street with such care; third, that the dangerous obstruction of the street by the fallen wires was known, or by the exercise of ordinary care could have been known, to the appellants in time to have enabled them to remove them, and thereby prevent appellee's injuries. We think the finding of the jury in appellee's favor is reasonably sustained by the evidence.

There can be no doubt from the evidence of the seriousness of appellee's injuries. They confined her to bed or room for about six months, during which time she suffered greatly, both physically and mentally, and was incapacitated from doing work of any kind. She, therefore, lost the whole of that time, and incurred a considerable medical bill, to say nothing of the partial permanent disability under which, by reason of her injuries, she must labor for the remainder of her life, whereby her earning capacity has been reduced one-half, for it was shown by the evidence that she was earning $1 per day in a woolen mill at the time she was injured, whereas her wages since that time have not exceeded 35 cents per day. In view of the character and extent of appellee's injuries we are of opinion that the amount of damages allowed her by the jury was moderate in the extreme.

The record being free from prejudicial error, the judgment is affirmed.

(Filed February 26, 1904.)

Evidence—In an action affecting title to land derived from one since deceased, testimony was incompetent which purported to give the statements of the deceased with reference to the transaction at the time the land was sold.

J. Smith Hays for appellant.

B. B. Golden and James D. Black for appellees.

Appeal from Knox Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

Both appellant and appellee claim to have derived title to the land in controversy from Benjamin Eve. The right to the land depends upon the location of the beginning corner of the tract sold by Eve to appellee Campbell, as appellant bought to the latter's line. Campbell claims the beginning corner is located on what is known in this record as the "reverse line," which was a boundary line to a fifty-acre tract owned by Sol Campbell, while appellant claims the beginning corner is located at a different place in Sol Campbell's line to a tract of land known as the Hiram Campbell land, but then owned by Sol Campbell. The title bond from Eve to appellee calls to begin in Sol Campbell's line "at the nearest point to Young's creek." So one of the litigants claims that "the point" is in a line to one tract of land which belonged to Sol Campbell, while the other claims that it is in a line of another tract of land which then belonged to Sol Campbell. This statement is made to show that the solution of the question at issue depends upon the ascertainment of the location of the beginning corner of the appellee's survey and to show the importance of his testimony touching the issue, as appellant claims that its admission was highly prejudicial to him.

Benjamin Eve, through whom both claim to have derived title to their respective tracts of land, was dead when the case was tried, as was Sol Campbell and John G. Eve. The appellant was not present when the transaction and conversation took place detailed by the appellee in his evidence. The appellee was introduced as a witness for himself, and over the objection of appellant, testified that at the time he "traded for the land the witness, Benjamin Eve, John G. Eve and Sol Campbell were on the land looking at it. They were on the reverse line near where it crosses the county road, and near this side at a point defendant claims his beginning corner; that in talking about the trade Ben Eve asked Sol Campbell, who was present, if he did not have a survey on top of that ridge, to which Campbell replied that he did; that he, Ben Eve, then said to the defendant that he would make the beginning of the boundary he was selling him on top of that ridge on Sol Campbell's line at the nearest point to Young's creek, and that they agreed on that point as the beginning, and were in sight of it at the time. The old man, Eve, pointed to a large tree on top of the ridge at the place defendant claims as his beginning, and said they would begin right there on Sol's line."

Was it competent for the appellee to testify to the transaction with and statements of Benjamin Eve detailed by him?

Subsection 2, section 606, Civil Code of Practice, reads as follows: * * * "Subject to the provisions of subsection 7 of this section, no person shall testify for himself concerning any verbal statement of, or any transaction with, or any act done, or omitted to be done by, an infant under fourteen years of age, or by one who is of unsound mind or dead when the testimony is offered to be given, except for the purpose and to the extent of affecting one who is living, and who, when over fourteen years of age and of sound mind, heard such statement, or was present when such transaction took place, or when such act was done or omitted unless * * * the decedent, or a representative of, or some one interested in, his estate shall have testified against such person with reference thereto." * * *

Counsel for appellee is of the opinion that because Benjamin Eve's estate is not affected by the testimony it is competent. The appellant who claims through Eve is affected by it, and he was not present when the transaction took place and the statements were made. The section of the Code quoted declares that no person shall testify for himself concerning any verbal statement of, or any transaction with, or any act done by, one who is dead when the testimony is offered to be given, except for the purpose and to the extent of affecting one who is living and who, when over fourteen years of age, and of sound mind, heard such statement, or was present when such transaction took place, or when such act was done, unless the decedent or a representative of or some one interested in his estate shall have testified against such person with reference thereto. No such testimony was offered as contemplated by the proviso in the subsection. If Eve's heirs still owned the land claimed by appellant, and had the same controversy with appellee as exists, appellee would not be competent to give the evidence in question, for if he was permitted to do so he might thus induce a verdict for himself, and deprive the heirs of their land. The effect of his evidence is exactly the same as to the rights of the appellant, as it would have been on the right of the heirs of Eve in the supposed case. His evidence would tend to establish the corner claimed by him in the one case as in the other. The testimony was original in character to the prejudice of appellant, who was claiming under and through the decedent, whose statements and acts are proven. It was incompetent. (Whalen v. Nisbet, &c., 95 Ky., 464.) This conclusion is supported by the cases of Turner v. Mitchell, &c., 22 Ky. Law Rep., 1784; Townsend, &c. v. Wilson, &c., 24 Ky. Law Rep., 1286.

It is urged that appellant is not entitled to make the question here as to the competency of the evidence, because he moved to exclude all the evidence given by the appellee, some of it being competent. While he made a motion to exclude, he had made his objection to the admission of the evidence when offered, and excepted to the ruling of the court in admitting it. It is recited in the bill of exceptions that "the plaintiff objected to all this evidence when called for, and the court overruled the objection and he excepted, and after it was heard the plaintiff moved the court to exclude it from the jury." So he had preserved the right to have the action of the court reviewed here before he made the unnecessary motion to exclude the evidence. The language of the motion shows he only moved to exclude the part of the evidence objected to as incompetent. But if he had moved to have excluded all the testimony of appellant after objections and exceptions to its admission, he would not have thereby forfeited the right he had previously reserved. Neither the case of Worthley's Adm'r. &c. v. Hammond, 76 Ky., 512, or Williams' Ex'or. &c. v. Williams, &c., 90 Ky., 34, hold to the contrary. In neither of these cases had there been any objections to the admission of the evidence, only to the competency of the witness. The appellant's objection should have been sustained to the evidence of appellee which we have quoted.

The judgment is reversed for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

CUMBERLAND TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH CO. v. WARNER.

(Filed February 26, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Damages—A verdict for $1,000 damages to one who was injured while driving along a public highway by a telephone pole falling on him as a result of workmen stretching the wires so taut as to cause it to break, the evidence conducing to show that his injuries were permanent.

2. Same—Instructions—An instruction using the word skillful, defining ordinary care and negligence, was not objectionable in an action to recover for injuries sustained by a falling telephone pole, the business of operating a franchise along a highway necessarily requiring a certain amount of skill and prudence.

Willis & Todd and Turner & Turner for appellant.

W. B. Moody and W. O. Jackson for appellee.

Appeal from Henry Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

The appellant, at the time the cause of this controversy arose, was operating a franchise, which its name indicates, along the right of way of the turnpike road leading from Eminence to New Castle, in Henry county, Kentucky. On the 9th day of October, 1902, its employes were engaged in stretching its wires, so as to take the slack out of them, and at the same time appellee was driving a two-horse wagon along the pike in question; when immediately opposite one of the poles of appellee, without any warning, it broke, about seven or eight feet from the ground, under the tension of the wires, which were being drawn taut, and was thrown with great force into the highway, striking appellee upon his head, knocking him off the seat of the wagon into the trace chains of the harness upon which he rested, his foot being caught in one of the wheels, and severely straining and injuring his leg. The gentleness of his team, coupled with the fact that they became entangled in the wires thrown into the highway, perhaps saved appellee from being killed.

To recover damages for the injury received this action was instituted. The issues raised by the pleadings are the negligence of the appellant in maintaining an imperfect and dangerous pole on the highway, and the extent and permanency of appellee's injury. A trial resulted in a verdict in favor of appellee in the sum of $1,000, of which appellant is now complaining.

The first error alleged is instruction No. 1, given by the court to the jury, defining ordinary care and negligence, which is as follows: "Ordinary care is that degree of care usually exercised by ordinarily prudent and skillful men in like occupations and under circumstances similar to those proved in this case. The failure to exercise such care is negligence."

The objection of appellant to this instruction is to the addition of the word "skillful." We are not deeply impressed with this objection. It may be true that the word is not ordinarily used in the instruction defining ordinary care and negligence, but it does not follow that it is technically incorrect for that reason. The business of operating a franchise along a highway by means of agencies which may endanger the lives or limbs of the traveling public necessarily requires a certain amount of skill, as well as prudence, in carrying forward the business in hand. One may be prudent without being skillful; or skillful without being prudent. It would appear that the operation of a franchise, such as the one under consideration, with due regard to the safety of the public, requires at least an ordinary amount of both prudence and skill, and while the addition of the word "skillful" may be unusual, we are inclined to believe that it is technically correct. This identical instruction was passed upon in the case of the Southern Railway Co. in Kentucky v. E. V. Otis' Adm'r, in an opinion of this court, delivered February 9, 1904, in which it is said in regard to the addition of the word "skillful" complained of here: "This word is not commonly used by the courts in the definition of ordinary care, but it is hard to distinguish the difference between the instruction as given by the court and the meaning of the ordinary definition. By this instruction no especial skill was required. Ordinary skill is supposed to be possessed by ordinary men in conducting the business in which they are engaged. The word 'skillful,' as used, did not add a new, distinct or different standard, but only required what should be required of ordinary men in the business in which they are engaged."

The second error complained of is that the court submitted to the jury the question of the permanency of appellee's injury, it being insisted that the Evidence in the case did not authorize it. The case of Louisville Southern Railway Co. v. Minogue, 90 Ky., 869, is relied on in support of this position. An examination of the opinion shows that the evidence on this subject was merely conjectural. The court said: "While absolute certainty as to the result of an injury should not be required, yet a mere conjecture, or even a probability, does not warrant the giving of damages for future disability, which may never be realized. The future effect of the injury should be shown with reasonable certainty to authorize damages upon the score of permanent injury. This was not done in this case. The evidence shows that the appellee is as likely to entirely recover, and perhaps in a short period of time, as she is to be permanently affected by the injury."

In the case at bar the evidence on the question of the permanency of the injury is contained in the testimony of three physicians. Dr. McGinnis said: "In this case I almost know he will never be as stout as he was formerly. If he ever gets the same kind of twist as he got before, it will throw him back into the same condition. Just the stepping on a cob, and he will have trouble much more easily than if it had not been sprained. * * * I think it will be a long time, if he gets well at all. He may get so that he will be comfortable, and he can now do a right smart work; he is not wholly unable to work, but if he should twist his back again he would suffer the same intense pain."

Dr. Ellison said: "Yes, sir, I am inclined to think Mr. Warner is permanently injured, should he continue his mode of life he is living now as a working man."

Dr. Nutall, who was introduced by appellant, in answer to a question said: "Well, if that pole struck him a severe blow, I take it for granted the tension of the wires is so very great, and there being quite a number of them, the tension must have been very great that broke the pole and pulled it into the middle of the road, and I take it for granted if it struck him any place it knocked him almost into eternity, and might have upset him some; and from the combination of circumstances, if all this be the case, it is liable to injure him permanently. A man fastened in a wagon and struck by a telephone pole might as well be shot by a cannon ball."

This evidence shows, as certainly as the testimony of medical men not possessed of the power of prevision can, that appellee was permanently injured by the accident which happened to him, and was far beyond the evidence which was given on the same subject in the Minogue case. The witnesses, who are denominated by appellant's counsel as experts, it seems to us, fairly qualified themselves on the subject about which they were interrogated, although we are not prepared to admit that their evidence is such as might be denominated expert testimony. The accident which happened was caused by the breaking of a defective pole; that it was defective is shown beyond question. The real issue on this point was whether or not the defect could have been discovered by ordinary diligence. Both of these witnesses saw the pole, and the subject of their testimony was as to the difficulty or ease in discovering the defect; and a careful study of this testimony, as a whole, results in the belief that it was competent for the purpose for which it was introduced.

The remaining error complained of is the permission given by the court to appellee's counsel to ask one of appellant's witnesses, on cross-examination, as to the relative size of appellant's poles and those of the Home Telephone Co. along the same highway. A comparison of the poles of the two companies, perhaps, did not serve to throw any light upon the issues being tried, but the answer of the witness, if not favorable to appellant, certainly was not detrimental to its interest.

For these reasons the judgment is affirmed.

NORMAN, &c. v. CENTRAL KENTUCKY ASYLUM.

(Filed February 26, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Lunatics—Void judgment—Where the inquest of lunacy was void because there was no service of process, as provided by statute, an action by an asylum, where the lunatic was confined, for maintenance can not be maintained, and a judgment against such person was void in such action.

2. Limitation of actions—Where an action was finally commenced by the filing of an amended petition and the issuance of process, the running of the statute of limitation ceased at that time.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

Joanna C. Norman was, on the 15th day of July, 1897, by an inquisition held in the Jefferson Circuit Court, Criminal Branch, adjudged to be insane, and was committed, by judgment of the court, to the keeping of the Central Kentucky Asylum as a pauper lunatic, where she has been confined ever since.

Subsequently she seems to have inherited a small estate, consisting of real property, situated in Louisville, and on the 9th day of April, 1901, the appellee filed its petition in the Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery Division, where it sought to subject the estate of the lunatic to the payment of her board and maintenance, at the rate of $200 per year, under the provisions of section 257 of the Kentucky Statutes.

To this proceeding the Louisville Trust Co., which had been appointed, by order of the Jefferson County Court, committee of the lunatic, was made a party, and filed an answer, putting in issue the right of appellee to charge the lunatic at the rate of $200 per year for her board and maintenance, and contending that $150 per year was all that could be lawfully charged against her. Subsequently it seems to have been discovered that Joanna C. Norman had not been served with summons in the proceeding by which she was adjudged to be a lunatic, and was not before the court at the time of the adjudication, and that, therefore, under the principle announced in Steward v. Taylor, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 577, and Taylor v. Moore, Id., 1572, the judgment was void; whereupon the appellee, on the 27th day of January, 1903, filed what it called an amended and supplemental petition, wherein it sets forth all of the facts as herein stated, and alleges that it had supported and maintained the lunatic for six years, caring for and furnishing her with everything necessary for her comfortable support and maintenance; that these things were necessary for the comfort and health of the patient, and that she thereby became indebted to it in the sum of $150 per annum for her board and maintenance during the period elapsing from the date of her reception by appellee until the filing of the amended and supplemental petition.

Prior to the filing of this pleading the action, so far as appellee was concerned, was based upon the judgment rendered in the inquisition of lunacy; but this was a necessary and complete abandonment of all procedure based upon that judgment, because, being void for want of process, its effect was as if it had not been rendered. On the 29th day of April, 1908, an agreed order was entered, by which all pleadings filed prior to January 27, 1908, were withdrawn, and stricken from the files. The amended pleading, setting up a cause of action based upon the common-law remedy for necessities furnished the lunatic, was, by this order, the beginning of this action. The summons issued upon this pleading was executed by delivering a copy to the Louisville Trust Co., as committee, and a copy to the lunatic in person.

Section 2151 of the Kentucky Statutes is as follows: "A committee shall not be appointed for the idiot, lunatic or person charged to be imbecile or incompetent, who is a resident of this Commonwealth, unless he has been heretofore, or may hereafter be, found to be such by the judgment of the circuit or county court of the county of his residence, upon the inquest of a jury, as provided in this chapter." * * *

Section 53 of the Civil Code of Practice provides that "if the defendant be of unsound mind the summons must be served on him and on one of the following named persons, if residing within the county, viz., on his committee; or if he have no committee, on his father; or if he have no father, on his guardian; or if he have no guardian, on his wife; or if he have no wife, on the person having charge of him." * * *

Both the committee and the guardian ad litem, who have been appointed to defend for the lunatic, filed answers to the amended and supplemental petition; that of the guardian put in issue all of its allegations, and pleaded, affirmatively, the five years' statute of limitation. Upon final hearing the chancellor rendered a judgment in favor of appellee for $900, being at the rate of $150 per year for the six years. From this judgment this appeal is prosecuted. The first question presented is whether or not the lunatic was properly before the court on the amended and supplemental petition.

Inasmuch as the inquest of lunacy was void for want of proper process, it follows that there could be no appointment of a committee for her. (Section 2151, Kentucky Statutes, supra.) As she had no lawful committee, the service of summons on the Louisville Trust Co., as committee, was void; and, as there was no service on any of the other persons enumerated in section 53 of the Code, it follows that the defendant was not before the court, and the judgment against her is void. As this case must be reversed for this reason, we deem it proper to point out that the evidence in nowise supports the judgment on the issues raised by the answer of the guardian ad litem to the amended and supplemental petition. This pleading controverted the allegation of the lunacy of Joanna C. Norman, and the entire evidence on this point is contained in the following answer, by the superintendent of appellee, to a question propounded to him: "I have only known her for about three years, and in that time her physical condition has been fairly good; but her mental condition has incapacitated her from labor of any kind."

The judgment covers the keep and maintenance of Joanna C. Norman for six years; during three of them the superintendent knew nothing of her whatever; and as to the remaining three he does not state that she was a lunatic at all, but simply that her mental condition incapacitated her from labor of any kind. While the lunatic was liable under an implied contract for necessaries furnished her (Coleman v. Frazier, 3 Bush, 800; Pearl v. McDowell, 3 J. J. Marsh., 858), it is essential that the lunacy should be established by sufficient evidence; that the articles furnished were necessary for her comfort, and the charge therefor reasonable.

This action, as finally presented, was commenced by the filing of the amended and supplemental petition and the issuance of process, and the running of the statute of limitations ceased at that time.

Wherefore, the judgment is reversed for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

HALL v. HALL.

(Filed February 28, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Divorce and alimony—Excessive judgment—Where the husband is well advanced in years, in an action by the wife for divorce and alimony, where the evidence is conflicting, the estate of the husband being worth only about $3,500, a judgment allowing the wife alimony of $2,000, this amount and the costs reaching about $2,500, is excessive, and out of proportion to the ability of the husband to pay.

Lee & Hester for appellant.

Jas. F. Webb and R. E. Johnston for appellee.

Appeal from Graves Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

The appellee, Rose Hall, brought this action against her husband, W. S. Hall, under section 2124 of the Kentucky Statutes for alimony and maintenance upon the ground of cruelty, settled aversion and failure to make suitable provision for her support. At the same time she sued out a general attachment against his property. The answer was a traverse of all the affirmative allegations contained in the petition. Upon final submission of the case the trial court decided that appellee was entitled to a judgment of divorce mensa et thoro, and for $2,000 alimony, and that all the real estate of appellant be sold to pay same, with interest and cost, including an allowance of $150 to her attorneys. Appellant, W. S. Hall, asks a reversal of the judgment for alimony and the allowance to appellee's attorney. It appears from the pleadings and proof that appellant and appellee were married on the 1st day of April, 1871, and lived together as husband and wife from that time in the same neighborhood until the 16th day of June, 1902, when appellee voluntarily abandoned the home of appellant, taking with her their youngest daughter and the bulk of the household furniture. It is developed by the proof that for several years prior to appellee's withdrawal from the home of her husband that they had lived very unhappily together, and that she had repeatedly threatened to take the step which she finally did. The main ground of complaint was that her husband had transferred the affection due to her as his wife to another woman, and smarting under this real or fancied injury, she had grown unhappy, and was habitually disagreeable to her husband in their domestic relations, and often gave vent to her feelings in abusive talk to and about him to their neighbors and friends. Three children were born to them, one, now a married woman about thirty years of age, a son about grown, and a daughter fifteen years of age. The older daughter and son testified in behalf of the father, the youngest daughter being the chief witness for the mother. It would be unprofitable to review in detail the various criminations and recriminations proven in the record. The sole question we have the power to consider upon this appeal is the reasonableness of the amount allowed to appellee by way of alimony. It is shown that appellant is a farmer by occupation, well advanced in years; that he owns a tract of eighty acres of land worth about $1,600, and four-fifths of a tract of one hundred and twenty-five acres, the remaining one-fifth belonging to his wife, worth about $1,500, and about $250 or $300 worth of personal property, consisting of two horses, a cow, some hogs, and household plunder, all his property being worth (in the aggregate not exceeding $3,500. There is some evidence in the record conducing to show that he may have some little money. This evidence is, however, very vague and uncertain. It also appears that he had paid to appellee as temporary alimony $175, and that the judgment in this case in favor of appellee, with interest and cost of the suit, which is very large, including the allowance to her attorneys of $150, will approximate $2,500. In other words, appellant is adjudged to pay a sum equal to two-thirds of his entire estate, and in default of payment thereof his lands are directed to be sold by the master commissioner. The petition in this case did not pray for a divorce, but only for alimony and maintenance, and whilst the judgment decrees divorce from bed and board, this judgment under the statute does not bar either dower or appellee's distributable rights in appellant's estate in the event she should survive him. It seems, therefore, entirely probable that his entire estate would be swept away if the judgment were enforced. There is no fixed rule laid down in this State for determining the amount of alimony which should be allowed, but it is manifest that the allowance made by the trial court is grossly excessive and out of all proportion to the residue of appellant's estate or his ability to pay. Appellant owns one hundred and eighty acres of land, the two tracts are contiguous, and both have dwelling houses on them. We think, therefore, that appellee should have been adjudged by way of alimony one-third of the one hundred and eighty acres, or sixty acres, so laid off as to include one of the dwelling houses, if possible, and adjoining the twenty-five acres owned by her, for her use and occupation during her life, or whilst living apart from her husband, one horse and one cow in lieu of the judgment for $2,000, and that the attorneys' fee allowed her counsel should be reduced from $150 to $100.

For reasons indicated the judgment is reversed and cause remanded for proceedings in conformity with this opinion.

1850 BRAMBLETT, & CO. V. DEPOSIT BK. OF CARLISLE.

BRAMBLETT, & CO. V. DEPOSIT BANK OF CARLISLE, KY.

(Filed February 26, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Banks—Interest—Limitation—Where a note was executed to a bank, payable twelve months after date, where there was no interest reserved, the note being in lieu of an old one in which the interest for the ensuing year was included, it was not placed upon the footing of a foreign bill of exchange pursuant to section 483, Kentucky Statutes, and the five year statute of limitation does not apply.

Kennedy & Dickson and Lewis Apperson for appellants.

Wood & Ross and John I. Williamson for appellees.

Appeal from Nicholas Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

This action was instituted on a note which reads as follows:

Carlisle, Ky., January 25, 1893.

"Twelve months after date we promise to pay to the Deposit Bank of Carlisle, Ky., or order, $2,322.80, for value received, negotiable and payable at the Deposit Bank of Carlisle, Ky., with interest at the rate of 8 per centum per annum after maturity until paid. The drawers and endorsers hereof waive presentment, protest and notice of dishonor.

"BRAMBLETT & GIBSON."

For some years previous to the date of the execution of the note in suit Bramblett & Gibson became indebted to the Deposit Bank of Carlisle by overdrafts for which they executed a note. The note was renewed from time to time, in which the various amounts of interest which had or were to accrue thereon were embraced. On January 25, 1902, the note amounted to $2,150.80, and on that date the note in suit for $2,322.80 was executed, payable twelve months after date, in which was embraced $172 interest for the ensuing year. This was computed on the note for $2,150.80. The appellants pleaded that under the charter of the bank the note was placed upon the footing of foreign bills of exchange, therefore, the five-year statute of limitation bars a recovery on the note. It will be observed that the note in question is made payable to the order of the bank. The question here is, was the note discounted in the meaning of the special provision of the charter of the bank? It is not claimed for appellant that the note was discounted in contemplation of section 483, Kentucky Statutes, which reads as follows: "Promissory notes, payable to any person or to a corporation, and payable and negotiable at any bank incorporated under any law of this Commonwealth, or organized in this Commonwealth under any law of the United States, which shall be endorsed to, and discounted by, the bank at which the same is payable, or by any other of the banks in this Commonwealth, as above specified, shall be, and they are hereby, placed on the same footing as foreign bills of exchange."

The phraseology of the statute differs from that of the charter of appellee. In construing the provision of the statutes this court in Louisville Banking Co. v. Buchanan, 107 Ky., 125, held that the note could be placed upon the footing of a foreign bill of exchange under the provision of the statute when three separate distinct facts existed: First, it must, by its terms, be made payable to a person or corporation at a bank incorporated under a law of this Commonwealth, or of the United States; second, it must be endorsed to the bank by the payee or holder thereof; third, it must be discounted by the bank taking out the interest in advance and paying the balance of the proceeds of such note to the vendor. The court gave the statute the same construction in Magoffin v. The Boyle National Bank of Danville, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 585. The General Statutes contain a provision substantially the same as section 483 of the Kentucky Statutes, and this court, in Nicholson, &c. v. National Bank of New Castle, 92 Ky., 251, and Stevens v. Gregg, 89 Ky., 466, interpreted the General Statutes the same as it has section 483, Kentucky Statutes.

The provision of appellee's charter under consideration reads as follows: "This corporation shall have the right to employ any portion of their capital stock in the purchase or discount of foreign and domestic bills of exchange and promissory notes made negotiable and payable at the office of said company, or at any of the banks or branches of banks chartered by this Commonwealth or national banks, and any such promissory notes purchased or discounted by said corporation shall be, and they are hereby, placed on the same footing with foreign bills of exchange, and remedy may be had thereon jointly or severally against the drawers and indorsers, and with like effect."

This court, in Eastin, &c. v. Third National Bank of Cincinnati, 102 Ky., 64, had under consideration a clause of the charter of the New Farmers Bank of Mt. Sterling, which was almost identical with appellee's charter which we have quoted. It appeared in that case that T. H. Eastin and L. D. Wilson presented to the New Farmers Bank at Mt. Sterling their promissory note for $3,000, payable to its order six months after date. The bank accepted the note and retained the $120, which was 8 per cent. interest on the $3,000 for six months, and placed to Wilson's credit $2,280. The court held that the note was discounted, and in so holding, said: "So the case turns upon what is meant by discount. The bank deducted the $120 as interest from the amount lent at the time the loan was made; in other words, took the interest in advance at the rate of 8 per cent. for six months. In Bouvier's Law Dictionary discount is defined to be 'interest reserved from the amount lent at the time of making a loan.' The Century Dictionary defines discount in finance 'to purchase or to pay the amount of in cash, less a certain per cent., as a promissory note, bill of exchange, etc., to be collected by the discounteer or purchaser at maturity.' * * * Bank discount is simple interest paid in advance and received, not on the sum advanced in the purchase, but on the amount of the note or bill. Counsel for appellant cites Flexner v. Bank of the U. S., 8 Wheaton, 461, to sustain his position, but we are of the opinion that it sustains the opposing view. The court said: 'What is it to discount? Has it not a right to take an evidence of the debt which arises from the loan? If it is to discount, must there not be some chose in action or written evidence of a debt, payable at a future time, which is to be the subject of the discount? Nothing can be clearer than that by the language of the commercial world, and the settled practice of banks, a discount by a bank means ex vi termini a deduction or draw back made upon its advances or loans of money upon negotiable paper, or other evidences of debt, payable at a future day, which are transferred to the bank.' We think that when the appellants presented the note to the New Farmers Bank, and the bank retained the interest and credited Wilson with the balance of the note, that the bank discounted it."

In the case at bar there was no interest reserved. In fact there was no money loaned from which it could be reserved. It was simply the execution of a new note for an old debt, in which was included the interest for the ensuing year. It was not a discounting of a note under the definition given in the Eastin case, hence was not placed upon the footing of a foreign bill of exchange, and the fifteen, and not the five, years' statute of limitation applies.

The judgment is affirmed.

HAVEN v. DAUGHERTY'S ADM'R.

(Filed February 26, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Lands—Liens—A judgment ordering a sale of land to satisfy lien debts will not be disturbed where it does not appear that it can not be advantageously divided.

W. H. Barnes for appellant.

Appeal from Ohio Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

This action was instituted on four promissory notes, aggregating $170, which had been executed for the purchase money on fifty acres of land. Three of the notes had matured; the other had not. The court gave judgment for the amount of the notes which had matured, and ordered a sale of the entire tract to pay the judgment.

There are no other liens upon the land, and all of the notes were held by the plaintiff. A reversal is sought upon the ground that the land is not susceptible to division without material impairment of its value. This fact is averred in the answer, but accompanied with a statement of the reason of the pleader for such conclusion, to wit: "The limited number of acres contained in said tract and its being of no considerable value."

Subsection 3, section 694, provides that where liens are held by same party the court may order the sale of enough of the property to pay the debt then due, unless it appears that the land is not susceptible of advantageous division. There is no question but what the court should refuse to order the sale of land to satisfy a part of a lien debt which is due where the land is not susceptible of advantageous division or for some other reason that the sale would cause a sacrifice of the property, or seriously prejudice the interests of the defendant. Where a reason is given in an answer for the averment that the land is not susceptible of advantageous division the court will determine whether the reasons given will support the averment. If the reasons given show that the conclusion of the pleader is erroneous, the court will so adjudge, just as it has adjudged that a house and lot can not be advantageously divided (Faught v. Henry, 13 Bush, 471), and that a tract of thirty acres of land can be advantageously divided. (Sears v. Henry, 18 Bush, 414.)

Fifty-acre tract may be divided, and the fact that it is of little value does not indicate it can not be advantageously divided.

Judgment is affirmed.

CRAIG v. WELSH, HACKLEY COAL AND OIL CO.

(Filed February 26, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Practice—Where the lower court dismissed a petition and adjourned for the term, it had not jurisdiction to disturb a judgment except in a direct proceeding for a new trial.

2. Same—An amended petition can only be filed in a pending action or proceeding.

J. H. Wilson for appellant.

J. Smith Hays for appellee.

Appeal from Knox Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

The appellant sued appellee in the Knox Circuit Court. The court sustained a demurrer to the petition, and dismissed it. An appeal was prosecuted to this court, and the judgment was affirmed. Afterwards appellant moved to redocket the case, and tendered and offered to file an amended petition, and the court overruled both motions. Complaint is made of that action of the court.

When the lower court dismissed the petition and adjourned for the term, it had no control over the judgment. It had no jurisdiction to disturb it, except in a direct proceeding (if at all) for a new trial. This was not sought. At the time the motions were made the judgment was in full force and effect. The action was not pending in court, as it had been dismissed. The petition had lost its efficacy, and did not exist for amendment, as the action in which it was filed as the initial step was no longer pending. An amended petition can only be filed in a pending action or proceeding. This conclusion is supported by Houston v. Kidwell, 12 Ky. Law Rep., 887.

The judgment is affirmed.

YAGER v. NATIONAL BUILDING AND LOAN ASSOCIATION.

(Filed February 26, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Building and loan association—In a defense to an action by a building and loan association on the idea that it was not "a going concern" at the time of the institution of the action, the plea of the defendant in setting up this defense being insufficiently pleaded, the trial court erred in sustaining a demurrer to it.

W. B. Gaines and C. P. Motley for appellant.

J. G. Covington for appellee.

Appeal from Warren Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

L. R. Porter borrowed of the appellee the sum of $2,500, for which he executed and delivered his note. At the same time he subscribed for twenty-five shares of appellee's stock, of the par value of $100 each, and by the terms of his contract agreed to pay monthly the sum of $15 as dues upon this stock, $12.50 interest, and $8.75 cents premium, until such time as the monthly payments and dividends accruing on the stock should equal the sum of $2,500, at which time the note was to be deemed paid.

Simultaneously with the execution and delivery of this note Porter and wife executed and delivered to appellee a mortgage upon several pieces of real estate in Bowling Green, Ky., one of which is known as lot No. 23, and which, as will hereafter appear, is involved in this litigation. Subsequently, on the 25th day of April, 1893, L. R. Porter sold lot No. 23 to appellant, for the sum of $1,509.50, $250 of which was paid in cash; for $759.50 he executed and delivered his promissory notes, and for the balance of $500 he agreed to, and did, assume the payment of $500 of the mortgage debt due from Porter to the appellee, to be paid in monthly installments of $7.25, in the way of dues, interest and premiums, until the full sum of $500 should be paid to appellee.

After the deed from Porter and wife to appellant was received by him he made seventy-six monthly payments of $7.25 each, and then, on July 31, 1898, assuming that the debt to appellee was paid, he gave it notice that its debt was extinguished, and he would pay no more, demanding that it release the lien it held upon lot No. 23, which was refused; thereupon he instituted this action in equity, setting forth, substantially, the foregoing facts, and praying that the cloud on his title, caused by the unreleased lien in question, be removed.

The petition, among other things, contains this allegation: "That it was a part of the consideration of said transfer from said Porter to the plaintiff (appellant) that the plaintiff was to assume to pay said debt to the defendant (appellee) in installments of $7.25 each month to the defendant in the way of dues, interest and premiums on said mortgage debt of $500 so long as same should remain unpaid; that said agreement between said Porter and this plaintiff was sanctioned by and agreed to by the defendant, and thereupon defendant accepted plaintiff as a stockholder in said association, and said Porter transferred to plaintiff his said shares of stock, which was by defendant transferred on its books to this plaintiff."

The petition also contains the usual plea of usury which occurs between building and loan associations and their borrowing members when the time of settlement arrives.

The answer denies the usury, pleads that it is not a "going concern," and is doing no business except winding up its affairs, being in liquidation; "that on the 8th day of October, 1901, at a regular annual meeting of the stockholders of defendant, it was determined that defendant should go into voluntary liquidation, and the directors of defendant were authorized and directed to convert all of the assets into cash, and distribute the proceeds to the stockholders as rapidly as possible;" and by way of counterclaim, it states the account existing between it and appellant, showing him to be indebted to it in the sum of $386.72, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum from July 31, 1898, until paid, for which it prayed judgment, and for the enforcement of its mortgage lien on lot No. 23. Appellant filed a reply, and an amended reply, to which general demurrers were sustained, and which were afterwards formally withdrawn.

Afterwards, on the 4th day of June, 1903, appellant filed what he calls a "re-reply" to the answer and counterclaim of appellee, this pleading being in lieu of the reply and amended reply withdrawn. The only allegation of this last pleading which we deem necessary now to notice is that which puts in issue the allegation of the answer, that appellee, prior to the institution of this action, had, by resolution of its stockholders, gone into liquidation. A general demurrer to the re-reply was filed and sustained; whereupon the appellant declining to plead further, his petition was dismissed, and a judgment rendered in favor of appellee, as claimed in its answer and counterclaim, for $336.72, with interest from July 31, 1898, until paid, and enforcing the mortgage lien. Except the issue as to appellee's having gone into liquidation, the questions raised by the pleadings in this case are of law. Appellant, by his pleadings and the exhibits, shows that he assumed the position of Porter in regard to the $500 of the latter's debt to appellee, and that stock in appellee, representing this sum, was set aside to him; also that he was accepted and received as a stockholder, and stood, with reference to it, exactly as Porter had stood before the transfer; in other words, he became a borrowing member to that extent, and entitled to settle with appellee precisely as Porter would have had to settle, had he not entered into the contract with him.

The question then arises, how was appellant to settle with the appellee? The rule by which settlements between borrowing members and building and loan associations are made is so well established as to need no citation of authority now. If the settlements are made while the corporation is a "going concern," then the debtor is entitled to credit on his debt by all of the sums paid by him, whether as interest, premiums or dues, under the rule of partial payments. It having been assumed by the court that his undistributed dividends will offset the dues paid; on the other hand, if the corporation is in liquidation, then he is entitled to credits only by premiums and interest paid, his rights as to the dues paid by him being reserved until the affairs of the corporation are finally adjusted. This rule is conceded by the learned counsel for appellant; but he contends, first, that appellant had severed his relation with appellee on the 31st day of July, 1898, at which time he ceased to make payments. As it appears, however, that at this time, according to his own calculation, he still owed appellee $75, which he neither paid nor tendered, he could not be considered as having withdrawn as a member of the corporation. (Globe Building and Loan Association v. Spillman, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 1431.)

Appellant further contends that the corporation could not go into voluntary liquidation, so as to defeat his right to a settlement with it as a "going concern," and thus obtain credit, not only for the interest and premiums paid, but also for the dues. This, as a proposition of law, was decided adversely to him in the case of Eminence Building and Loan Association v. Bohannon, 31 Ky. Law Rep., 1549.

The remaining question for adjudication is whether or not appellee was a "going concern" at the time of the institution of this action. It does not appear under what authority appellee was incorporated, and we are, therefore, unable to determine how it could be dissolved. Assuming for the moment that it was incorporated under the present corporation law, the allegations of the answer, even if undenied, are not sufficient to show that it was lawfully placed in liquidation. Section 561, Kentucky Statutes, authorizes the dissolution of any corporation organized under the present corporation law, by the consent in writing of the owners of a majority of its shares of stock, unless otherwise provided in the articles of incorporation, or amendments thereto. The answer does not allege that the resolution which is pleaded was passed by a majority of the owners of the shares of stock of the corporation, and the imperfect allegation which is made on this subject is placed in issue by the reply.

The question as to how a corporation may go into liquidation is exhaustively discussed in the case of Economy Loan Association, &c. v. Paris Ice Co., 24 Ky. Law Rep., 107. This opinion makes it unnecessary to further discuss this phase of the question. The manner of settlement between appellant and appellee turns upon the question as to whether or not it was a "going concern" at the time it was made. The judge of the trial court evidently entertained the view that appellee was in liquidation, and the judgment rendered was based upon this view. His attention seems not to have been called to the fact of the insufficiency of appellee's pleading on this question, nor to the further fact that the allegation which was made as to the liquidation was placed in issue by the reply. Had his attention been so directed he would doubtless have overruled the demurrer to the first paragraph of the reply, or carried it back to the insufficient pleading.

For these reasons the judgment is reversed for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

SNELLING'S ADM'R v. LEWIS.

(Filed March 1, 1904—Not to be reported.)

New trial—Upon an application for a new trial where it appeared that the party applying lived sixty miles from the courthouse; that his attorney upon whom he relied to manage his suit had died without his knowledge, and that he had not learned of his death until after the judgment against him had been rendered, and that his other attorney was sick and unable to be present at the trial, it was error to sustain a demurrer to a petition setting up these facts.

D. S. Trumbo and R. Gudgeon & Son for appellant.

Appeal from Morgan Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

On May 26, 1886, John F. Alexander, as administrator of Frank Snelling, filed his petition in equity in the Morgan Circuit Court against William H. Lewis, &c., to recover on a note executed by Lewis to his intestate dated May 20, 1882, and due on the 19th day of the next June, for $657, the balance of the purchase price of land sold Lewis by the intestate. He also sought to enforce the lien on the land. He admitted the payment of $500 on the note on October 11, 1882. The defendant answered, alleging that he had also paid on the note the sum of $338 on May 26, 1882, and as evidence of the payment filed with his answer the following receipt:

"May 26, 1882. Received of W. H. Lewis eight steers at $330. Fifty dollars and $18 for back taxes on the land that this money was paid for in the year 1875 on the same land that this money is paid on.

"FRANK SNELLING,
"R. W. D. HUNT,
"T. J. JONES."

The answer was filed at the June term, 1896, and sixty days was given to plaintiff to file reply. No reply having been filed, or none appearing to have been filed, on the second day of the November term, 1897, the case was submitted and a judgment was entered in favor of the defendant on his counterclaim for $27.28, with interest from June 11, 1882, he having pleaded that his two payments more than paid the note by this sum. At the March term, 1898, the plaintiff filed affidavits and moved the court to set aside the judgment and grant him a new trial on the ground that the judgment had been entered by a casualty preventing him from preparing his case on the merits. The court properly overruled this motion as a final judgment had been rendered which could be opened only by petition. Thereupon the plaintiff filed this suit, alleging the facts stated, also the following: That at the time of the institution of the suit he employed as his counsel Hon. John P. Salyer, then a resident of Morgan county, and an efficient attorney of the bar of Morgan county, who prepared and filed the suit; that the plaintiff also employed as associate counsel D. S. Trumbo of Bath county; but that the engagement of the counsel was that Salyer was to conduct the case in court, prepare the pleadings and take control of the action; and that Trumbo was to attend to the taking of the testimony the plaintiff might want taken in Bath county where the plaintiff's witnesses resided; that before the expiration of the sixty days given him to file reply the plaintiff prepared a reply and sent it to his attorney, Salyer, to be filed; whether the reply was filed or not he did not know, but that the reply was not on file with the papers of the case; that the plaintiff then resided, and still resides, in Bath county, nearly sixty miles from the Morgan county courthouse; that his counsel, Salyer, died some time in the month of March or April, 1897, and the plaintiff did not learn of his death until the commencement of the November term, 1897, of the court; that at this term of court, and for some time before, Trumbo, his other counsel, was sick, and unable to attend that term of the Morgan Circuit Court; that the case was submitted and heard without any representation by counsel or otherwise on his behalf; that he had depended upon his counsel, Salyer, to conduct his case in court; that by some unavoidable calamity or misfortune his counsel failed to receive and file his reply to the answer, which was a traverse of its affirmative allegations, and cast the burden of proof on the defendant to support his plea of payment of the note sued on; that the death of his counsel, without his knowledge, his failure to file the reply, and the subsequent submission of the case for trial with the answer uncontroverted and when he was not represented by counsel, was such an accident and surprise as he could not have guarded against with ordinary prudence. He also alleged that the $398 for which the receipt filed with the answer was given were not paid upon the note sued on, but upon another note; that the defendant still owed the balance of the debt, and after the death of his intestate had admitted that he owed it, and promised and agreed to pay it to him. The court sustained a demurrer to the petition, and dismissed it. The plaintiff appeals.

By section 518 of the Civil Code the court rendering a judgment shall have power after the expiration of the term to vacate it or modify it for unavoidable casualty or misfortune preventing the party from appearing or defending, and in construing this section the court has laid down the rule that a new trial may be had where the casualty or misfortune preventing the party from appearing or defending is such as ordinary care would not have guarded against. (L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Bickel, 97 Ky., 222; White v. Richards, 20 Ky. Law Rep., 1369; Vittetow v. Ames & Co., 21 Ky. Law Rep., 225.)

In the case before us, if the reply had been filed by the attorney, the burden of proof would have been on the defendant to make out his own defense, and the case could not have been submitted and judgment taken for the defendant on the pleadings before he had taken any depositions to sustain his defense. The plaintiff lived sixty miles from the court, and naturally relied upon his attorney, Salyer, to manage his case, it being a suit in equity. The attorney had died without his knowledge, and he did not learn of his death until the commencement of the November term of the court, and on the second day of the term the case was submitted, his other attorney, Trumbo, by reason of sickness, not being present at that term of the court.

On demurrer the allegations of the petition must be taken as true, and it is, therefore, conceded that the payment pleaded in the answer was paid on another debt; and in view of the geographical situation of the parties, the death of the leading counsel, and the sickness of the other at that term of court, it seems to us there was such surprise and misfortune in the case being submitted without a reply being filed that a new trial should be granted, if the allegations of the petition are sustained by the proof.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded, with directions to overrule the demurrer to the petition and for further proceedings consistent herewith.

MILLER v. BAKER.

Attachment bond—Action on—In an action to recover upon an attachment bond after an attachment had been discharged, while there was some conflict of evidence, the verdict being supported by it and the instructions conforming to the law, the judgment of the trial court will not be disturbed.

D. E. Castleman for appellant.

G. M. Rogers for appellee.

Appeal from Boone Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

Appellant filed suit against appellee to recover $2,530, and took out an attachment which was levied on some land belonging to appellee. Defense was made to the action and in addition the grounds of attachment were controverted. The defendant's answer was held insufficient as to the debt, and judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff therefor, but the evidence being heard on the grounds for attachment, the attachment was discharged on the ground that the defendant was, at the institution of the suit, a resident of Kentucky, and had sufficient property in the State subject to execution to pay the plaintiff's debt. Thereupon this suit was filed on the attachment bond to recover damages for the attachment, and judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff for $225, and the defendant appeals. The chief item of damage shown on the trial was the attorney's fee in contesting the attachment, which was placed at $300. In addition to this the following items of damage were claimed: $25 feed bill; $5 toll; $10 board; personal expenses of husband $10, making in all $350. The proof for the plaintiff showed that she had twelve or fourteen witnesses present, and it took nearly a day to try the question of attachment; also that $300 was a reasonable fee for the attorneys. The proof for the defendant placed it much lower, being to the effect that there were not so many witnesses and less time was taken up with the trial. While the evidence was conflicting the verdict is not so against the evidence as to warrant us in disturbing it on this ground. The court properly instructed the jury, limiting the recovery to the expenses about the attachment without regard to the defense on the merits of the case. The defendant offered to show that when the attachment was discharged an execution was issued on the judgment and levied on the land. This proof was excluded by the court. The purpose of the evidence was to show that the discharge of the attachment did not substantially help the plaintiff; but her right to recover on the attachment bond accrued when the attachment was discharged, and the measure of her recovery could not be affected by the subsequent conduct of the defendant in suing out an execution and levying it on the land. This was a separate transaction, and the defendant could not, by his vigilance in suing out the execution, affect her right of recovery against him on the attachment bond, which was perfected before the execution issued. To permit him to do so would be to make her recovery on the attachment bond to depend not on what was done about the attachment, but on his subsequent diligence in the collection of his judgment debt.

Judgment affirmed.

BRYANT, &c. v. KENDALL.

(Filed February 26, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Lands—Mistake of boundary—Where a call on a surveyor's books was S. 71 W., and resulted in something like double the amount of land which the State had acquired upon a tax sale, and N. 71 W., being a call that represented the correct amount of the land, the latter was evidently the correct call, and the mistake can not have the effect of vesting title in a greater amount of land than was originally embraced in a patent covering it.

Geo. P. Johnson and Hazelrigg & Chenault for appellants.

Appeal from Whitley Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

On October 18, 1855, a patent was issued by the Commonwealth to Jacob Hudson and Cyrenus Waite for ten thousand acres of land, minutely described by metes and bounds, in Whitley county, the description of the land concluding with these words: "Plotting out of the survey all lands heretofore surveyed."

This excluded from the grant older surveys, but the patent was valid as to all the land embraced within it not theretofore surveyed. (Breathitt Coal, Iron and Lumber Co. v. Strong, 106 Ky., 699.) Before the patent was issued on July 8, 1848, Milton E. White had obtained a patent for three hundred and fifty acres of land lying within the boundary of the Hudson and Waite patent. On June 19, 1871, White having failed to pay the taxes, his tract was sold for taxes and purchased by Joseph Bradford, to whom the auditor afterwards made a deed. Appellees claim under Bradford, and the question here involved is what land they own. The dispute is illustrated by the following map, on which the land embraced in White's patent is indicated by the lines A, B, C, D, E, F, G, H, I, J, K, L, M, N, Y, X, A; and the land embraced in the deed which the auditor made to Bradford is indicated by the lines A, B, C, D, E, F, G, H, I, J, K, L, M, N, O, P, A:

The patent and the deed, as shown by the map, are the same from the beginning corner, A, until the point N is reached. From this point the patent calls are as follows: "Thence N. 71 W. 240 poles to a stake; thence S. 87 W. 196 poles to a stake; thence N. 23 W. 66 poles to the beginning." But from this point the calls of the deed made by the auditor are as follows: "S. 71 W. 240 poles to a stake; thence S. 87 W. 196 poles to a stake; thence N. 23 W. 66 poles to the beginning." If from the point N the next line is run S. 71 W. 240 poles it will go to the point O, and if the next line is run on the call of the deed the closing line will not be 66 poles long as called for in the patent and the deed, but will have to be extended as shown on the map to reach the beginning corner. The way the discrepancy occurred is this, the calls of the patent follow the calls of the copy of the survey filed with the register of the land office on which the patent issued. But the deed made by the auditor follows the calls of the survey as recorded by the county surveyor of Whitley county on the surveyor's records of Whitley county. It will be observed that the only discrepancy between this record and the record at the register's office is in the call of the line running out from the point N, one giving the call as N. 71 W. 240 poles, and the other as S. 71 W. 240 poles. All the other lines in both are identical; both call for three hundred and fifty acres. It is, therefore, evident that in one or the other a mistake was made and the letter N written for the letter S, or S for N, by mistake in the recording of this call.

White testified on the trial that he had the land surveyed and obtained the patent; that the patent covered the land as the same was surveyed as he now remembers it, and that he never claimed any land by reason of the survey except that covered by the patent. In addition to this the plat of the land made by the county surveyor on the copy of the survey filed with the auditor and the plat made by him on his surveyor's books as part of the record give the land as lying in the same shape and as represented on the plat above by the lines A, B, C, D, E, F, G, H, I, J, K, L, M, N, Y, X, A, or substantially so. Neither of these plats give the land such a shape as it would have if run out on the lines N, O, P, A. It is apparent by the application of an ordinary ruler to the plats that each of them is drawn on a scale of one inch to one hundred poles; that the boundary of land embraced is a little larger than a rectangle four hundred and twenty poles long by one hundred and twenty-five poles wide, which would contain three hundred and forty acres. It is, therefore, apparent that the boundary so plotted contains about three hundred and fifty acres of land. It is also apparent that to run the lines, as claimed by appellee, would be to make the survey embrace twice as much land as called for, and to give the closing line a different course from that given in any of the papers, besides making it three or four times as long as it should be. We, therefore, think it evident that the call S. 71 W. on the surveyor's books was simply a mistake for N. 71 W.

The State, by its purchase from White, only took such title as White had, and Bradford, by his purchase from the auditor, got no more than this. For by the patent of 1854 the title to all the rest of the land was vested in Hudson and Waite, and their title could not be affected by the deed which the auditor made to Bradford. The auditor was only authorized to convey the land which the State had bought for taxes, and his conveyance passed no more than the land which White owned. The question is not here presented of a mistake in the patent which did not follow the survey by a mistake either of the county surveyor in making the copy or the register in issuing the patent. The patent evidently followed correctly the survey as actually made. The mistake was made by the county surveyor in recording his survey on his record book. But this mistake, being apparent from the face of the records, can not have the effect of vesting in White title to land which was not patented to him, and was not in fact embraced in the survey.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded for a new trial and further proceedings consistent herewith.

MENGEL BOX CO. v. CITY OF LOUISVILLE.

(Filed March 1, 1904.)

Taxation—Exemption—Where a corporation had quit business in a city and a foreign corporation was organized, taking over the property of the old corporation, the stockholders being composed of some of the members of the old corporation and some of them being new men, where before the organization and location of the new concern the city attorney was advised with and gave it as his opinion that the concern would be exempt from city taxation as provided by section 170 of the Constitution, section 2880a of the Kentucky Statutes, and a city ordinance passed in pursuance of those provisions and an affidavit was filed with the city assessor setting forth all of the facts as to the organization, thus keeping in touch with the city authorities, all these facts appearing, the latter corporation was a new concern and was, therefore, exempt from taxation for the period of five years from the date of its location. The old factory had ceased to exist; as a business enterprise it was dead, and the fact that its plant was bought by the new corporation did not affect the status of the latter concern at all. It is a new concern to all intents and purposes.

A. E. Willson, J. Parker and Gibson, Marshall & Gibson for appellant.

Henry L. Stone for appellee.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

This action involves the right of appellant to the five years' exemption from taxation authorized by section 170 of the Constitution, section 2980a. of the Kentucky Statutes, and the ordinance passed in pursuance thereof.

C. C. Mengel, Jr. & Bro. Co. is a corporation of Louisville, Ky., carrying on a lumber business. Prior to 1899, it, in connection with its chief business, was also engaged in box making, and had a plant for that purpose, representing in round numbers an investment of $200,000. The principal customers of the corporation for boxes were the tobacco manufacturers; and when, subsequently, these went into a combine, there being no longer any competition in the purchase of boxes, their manufacture became so unprofitable that it resolved to go out of that business. This determination was not carried out immediately, owing to the existence of certain unfinished contracts which had to be fulfilled before the enterprise could be actually stopped; but it was finally and definitely determined that it should be abandoned at the end of the contracts in question, and the property constituting the plant sold for whatever it would bring in money, and the proceeds distributed among the stockholders.

About this time C. C. Mengel, Jr., conceived the idea of forming a new corporation, to consist in large part of foreign capital, which he successfully carried into execution, the result being the organization of the Mengel Box Co., under the laws of the State of New Jersey, with a capital stock, at first, of $1,000,000, subsequently increased to one and one-half million dollars. After its organization the question as to where it should be located came up for determination, the foreign incorporators being inclined to St. Louis, rather than Louisville; but the latter city being the home of Mengel, he insisted that it should be located there, and as an inducement for so doing represented that the new plant would be entitled to five years' exemption from municipal taxation; and that there might be no mistake on this score he addressed a letter to the city attorney, setting forth the facts, and asking whether or not he was correct in the assumption that the new corporation would be entitled to the exemption. In reply the city attorney, after setting forth a summary of the law bearing upon the question, said: "In my opinion, in the case you put, of a concern organized in another State, if it desires to manufacture in this city wares or goods, it can come to this city and acquire the property of another manufacturing concern, or any one else, and being a new establishment, so far as the city of Louisville is concerned, or its location having been induced by the ordinance aforesaid, such concern will be entitled to the exemption from taxation. In other words, it makes no difference whether the establishment comes from another State, or is organized under the laws of this State, its coming into the city limits and locating is the condition precedent to its being entitled to the benefit of the exemption provided in said ordinance. The whole object of the ordinance is to increase the manufacturing interests of the city and to induce the location of the same within its limit."

In pursuance of the ordinance relating to the subject-matter, the president of the new corporation filed his affidavit with the city assessor, setting forth all of the facts connected with the organization and establishment of the proposed corporation and the location of its plant, thus in every movement, keeping in touch with the city authorities, and acting in accordance with their advice. After the establishment of the plant this action was instituted by the city for the purpose of recovering taxes on the property for the year 1900. The corporation answered, pleading the exemption; and that alone is the question for adjudication. The evidence in the case consists of the testimony of C. C. Mengel, Jr., the letter of the city attorney, the articles of incorporation of appellant, and the affidavit filed with the assessor in pursuance to the terms of the ordinance.

The law regulating the subject in hand consists of this provision, contained in section 170 of the Constitution: "The general assembly may authorize any incorporated city or town to exempt manufacturing establishments from municipal taxation, for a period not exceeding five years, as an inducement to their location."

Section 2980a of the Kentucky Statutes (being a part of the act regulating cities of the first class): "That the general council shall have power by ordinance to exempt from municipal taxation, for a period not exceeding five years, manufacturing establishments, as an inducement to their location within the city limits."

And an ordinance passed in pursuance of this authority, which is as follows: "That in order to induce the location of more manufacturing establishments within the city limits, any such establishment, owned and operated by any person, firm or corporation, which shall have been, after the passage of the act authorizing this ordinance, permanently located and conducted within the limits of the city of Louisville, shall be, and the same is hereby, exempted for a period of five years after such location and the commencement of the business of manufacturing thereat from all taxation whatever by the city of Louisville, on all property, real or personal, tangible or intangible, owned, employed and used by such person, firm or corporation, in conducting the business of such manufacturing establishment, and which would otherwise be subject to city taxation: Provided, however, The exemption herein specified is granted on the condition that the person, firm or corporation owning and operating such manufacturing establishment shall comply with the provisions of the third section of this ordinance, and no such establishment shall be entitled to an exemption from city taxes until said section is complied with. * * *

"Section 3. That any person, firm or corporation that shall be induced by the provisions of section 1, or section 2, of this ordinance to locate or bring a manufacturing establishment within the city limits shall, prior to the first day of September next, after said establishment shall have been located or brought within this city and begun the business of manufacturing thereat, file with the city assessor a written statement, verified by the proprietor, or one of them, if composed of a firm, or by the chief officer or manager in charge of the corporation, as the case may be, showing the following facts, viz. : The name of the proprietor, or of the members of the firm or corporation owning and operating the establishment; the place where the establishment is located within the city; the kind of manufacturing engaged in, and when begun at such location; and that the manufacturing establishment is a new one, or has been located or brought within the city limits since the passage of the act authorizing the ordinance; that it has been thus located or brought within the city in good faith, with the intention of being continued permanently, or for a longer period than five years."

The question presented for adjudication is one of great moment to the municipalities of the Commonwealth, and it is, therefore, of paramount importance that we should establish a principle which will not unduly diminish their revenue on the one hand, by allowing corporations to escape a fair share of the public burdens, through a construction so broad and lax as to permit the transfer of established plants, under the specious pretense of locating new manufactories; nor, on the other hand, drive away new capital by a rule so narrow and technical that the spirit of the law will be killed by its letter, and the very end sought to be attained defeated.

The cardinal rule for the construction of laws is the ascertainment of their reason and spirit, as against the mere letter of the enactment. Taking this as a guide, it will be profitable to recur to the history of the subject of such exemptions pending the formation of the Constitution. When it had been determined by the convention to adopt the ad valorem system of taxation as the uniform rule of the fiscal scheme of the Commonwealth, it was urgently brought to the attention of that body that, in the intensely competitive struggle between cities of the country to secure the location of manufacturing plants, the heavy burden of the ad valorem system was calculated to drive manufactories from the cities of our own State to those of States having a more favorable system. In recognition of the soundness of this apprehension, the convention adopted section 170, by which cities are enabled to offer five years' exemption from all taxation as a bonus for the location of new manufactories within their corporate limits, it being assumed that after the exemption period has expired they will not be likely to incur the great loss incident to removal in order to escape future taxation; and the cities will thereby secure this additional capital to tax after the expiration of the exemption period, as well as the enjoyment of the immediate fruits of additional employment for its working classes, and that general impulse of prosperity which at once flows from the presence of new capital and enriches every department of municipal vitality.

The purpose, then, of the provision of the Constitution is the attraction of new capital for manufacturing purposes. Applying this principle to the facts before us, we reach these questions: Was the Mengel Box Co. a new plant, and did it locate in Louisville under the inducement of the constitutional provision and the statute and ordinance passed for the purpose of carrying it into effect? Undoubtedly these interrogatories must be answered in the affirmative, if the evidence of C. C. Mengel, who alone testified in the case, can be accepted as true, unless the fact that the new corporation invested a part of its capital in the old plant forbids this conclusion. The undisputed facts show that C. C. Mengel, Jr. & Bro. Co. had gone out of the box-making business before the new corporation was formed. So far as Louisville was concerned it had lost this factory as a business enterprise, as wholly and completely as if it had never existed there. It is true the wheels of the machinery had not actually ceased to revolve, owing to the fact that the old corporation had certain contracts which had not expired, and which it was bound to fulfill; but the determination had been finally and definitely reached to discontinue the enterprise, and as soon as its contracts were all carried out, to sell the property for what it would bring in money, and distribute it among the stockholders. So, then, C. C. Mengel, Jr. & Bro. Co. had gone out of the box-making business. With this state of affairs in hand, C. C. Mengel undertook to organize a new corporation, with new capital, to go into the same business, and to sell to it the old property as a part of its new plant. It will not do to say that this was a mere expansion of the old business. Such an assumption does violence to the only evidence in the case bearing upon the question, and substitutes the arbitrary opinion of the judge for the sworn testimony of the witness. The C. C. Mengel, Jr. & Bro. Co. did not dissolve, or merge into the new corporation; it is, on the contrary, still in existence, carrying on the original business of dealing in lumber. What difference did it make to the city of Louisville whether the new corporation purchased the old plant or not? Or whether a few of the incorporators of the new were members of the old? Did it any the less enjoy the benefit of the added capital? Suppose, instead of buying the old plant, the new corporation had purchased the site and machinery of some third parties' planing mill, would any one contend that this was not a new venture? And yet, so far as the result to the municipality was concerned, would it not have been precisely the same? Just the same amount in value of property, which had theretofore been paying taxes, would thereafter, for five years, be exempted. Or, suppose the C. C. Mengel, Jr. & Bro. Co. had sold out its box plant for money to a third person, and then invested the proceeds in a new plant in connection with the foreign stockholders, would any one contend that because the old stockholders were once members of a box factory they never could be members of a new one? Under the contention of appellee, the old plant of appellant could, under identically the same circumstances, have been turned into any kind of a new plant, except a box factory. This view is not consonant with the reason and spirit of the law. The object was to locate new factories; to attract new capital; this was done. The old factory had ceased to exist; as a business enterprise it was dead; it was to be quickened into new life only by the potent touch of new capital. What matter if this new life was that of a box factory, or a planing mill? It furnished new work for the unemployed; new deposits for the banks; new trade for the merchants, and sent a new and richer current of capital through every artery of trade and commerce. In other words, it brought everything to Louisville which the law was designed to secure; and having done so, it is entitled to the exemption for which it has paid the price.

The fact that the new corporation bought out the old plant is a mere coincidence, which should not be considered in the solution of the question; to do so would be but to confuse the immaterial with the material; to elevate a coincidence into a predominant factor of the problem. If the transaction had only been the enlargement of an old plant, the mere addition of capital to a going concern, the conclusion of the chancellor would have been sound; but the evidence does not disclose this state of facts. The old plant was dead; it was not to be merely enlarged by the transaction, but the property was to go as a small part of the new plant. The question is one of fact, and every case must be determined by its own merits; no inelastic rule can be laid down, lest, on the one hand, fraud be accomplished by undue laxity; or, on the other, the usefulness of the law be minimized by a too narrow and rigid construction.

This record shows the utmost good faith on the part of the new incorporators; they consulted with the city authorities at every step in the establishment of the new venture; secured the favorable opinion of the city attorney on their title to the exemption under the existing facts; and filed the affidavit required by the ordinance with the city assessor, thus showing in advance they had purchased the old plant, and supposing, up to the time this action was instituted, that there was no cloud on their title to the exemption claimed. Their integrity is not challenged, either in the evidence or in the argument; and unless an old plant, which has ceased to be a "going concern" can never be purchased for the establishment of a new one of the same kind, without operating to deprive the investors of the exemption otherwise authorized by the law, they are clearly entitled to exemption from taxation for five years after the establishment of their plant.

There can be no danger to the municipality in a transaction such as this record discloses, and the well wishers of appellee have substantial cause to rejoice when it can exchange the right to tax $150,000 worth of property for a period of five years for the establishment of a new plant with a capital of one and a half million dollars.

Judgment reversed for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

PEARSON v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed March 1, 1904.)

Indictment—Construction of statutes—Section 2106, Kentucky Statutes, provides that a certificate by a parent addressed to the county clerk, consenting that a license to marry shall issue, shall be attested by two subscribing witnesses, and that his signature shall be proved by the oath of one of them; and where a paper purported to be only signed by the father, it was not a certificate of consent within the meaning of the law, and one who signed the name of another to such paper, without its conforming to the statute in the manner pointed out, was not guilty of uttering and publishing a forged writing.

E. E. Hogg for appellant.

N. B. Hays and Lorraine Mix for appellee.

Appeal from Owsley Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

The appellant, Major Pearson, was indicated by the grand jury of Owsley county for the crime of uttering and publishing as true a forged writing.

purporting to have been signed by Job Eavens, consenting that the clerk of the Owsley County Court should issue a license authorizing the marriage of his infant daughter, Fanny P. Eavens, to the appellant, and that the clerk of the Owsley County Court, relying upon the genuineness of the writing, issued a license for the marriage of the appellant, Major Pearson, and the infant, Fanny P. Eavens. A trial before a jury resulted in appellant's conviction and his sentence to the penitentiary for a term of two years. The paper which he is charged to have forged, set out in the indictment, is as follows:

"Green Hall, Ky., January 4, 1904.

"This is to certify that I have given Major Pearson my consent for him and my daughter, Fanny P. Eavens, to marry. You are authorized to issue a license to him.

"JOB EAVENS."

The indictment is under the following sections of the Kentucky Statutes:

"Section 2105. No marriage shall be solemnized without a license therefor, issued by the clerk of the county in which the female resides at the time. But where she is of full age or a widow, and it is issued on her application in person, or by writing signed by her, it may be by any county clerk.

"Section 2106. If either of the parties be under twenty-one years of age, and not before married, no license shall issue without the consent of his or her father or guardian, or, if there is none, or he is absent from the State, without the consent of his or her mother, personally given, or certified in writing to the clerk over his or her signature attested by two subscribing witnesses, and proved by the oath of one of them, administered by the clerk. Where the parties are personally unknown to the clerk, a license shall not issue until bond, with good surety, in the penalty of $100, is given to the Commonwealth, with condition that there is no lawful cause to obstruct the marriage."

A reversal of the judgment of conviction is asked by the appellant on the ground that the writing alleged to have been forged by him, purporting to have been signed by the girl's father, does not purport to be, and is not, a certificate within the meaning of the statute, for the reason that it was not attested by two subscribing witnesses as therein required, and was, therefore, not valid for the purpose for which it purports to have been designed, or sufficient to deceive or mislead the clerk to whom it was directed into the issue of a license to marry. The rule established by the text-writers and the adjudications of this and other States is that a writing invalid on its face can not be the subject of forgery, because it has no legal tendency to effect a fraud. Bishop's New Criminal Law, volume 2, section 538, quoting Cunningham v. People, 4 Hun. N. Y., 455, lays down the rule as follows:

"Subsection 1. A writing affirmatively invalid on its face can not be the subject of forgery, because it has no legal tendency to effect a fraud.

"Subsection 3. Whether a bond or other instrument is valid is a question of law, and if, therefore, a statute authorize a writing of this sort not known to the common law, and so prescribes its form as to render any other null, forgery can not be committed by making a false statutory one in the form thus invalid by the statute, even though it is so like the genuine as to deceive most persons. For example, it is not indictable to forge a will attested by less witnesses than the law requires."

"Legal forgery can not be made out by imputing a possible, or even actual, ignorance of the law to the person intended to be defrauded, however dark may be the moral hue of a transaction, courts of justice can only act upon a legal crime upon criminal breaches of perfect legal operation." (People v. Shall, 9 Cowan, 778.)

"Howsoever clear the fraudulent puprose, unless the writing is sufficient to accomplish that purpose, it is not a forgery, since without a single exception actions only, and no evil intentions, are punishable by the English law." (Hammond Digest, chapter 1, 142, Forgery.)

In the very elaborate note to the case of The People v. Munroe, 100 Cal., 164, 24 L. R. A., 33, the editor has collated a large number of cases in which the question involved in this case is elaborately considered, and the general principle announced that: "A writing void on its face because of the want of the legal requisites to its validity, is not the subject of indictment for forgery in consequence of its incapacity to effect fraud."

It was essential to the validity of the writing, which is the basis of this prosecution, that it should have been attested by two subscribing witnesses, and even then the county court clerk was not authorized to issue the license on the strength of it unless it was identified and proven under oath by one of the subscribing witnesses. We, therefore, conclude that the paper in controversy does not purport to be, and is not, a certificate of consent by the father within the meaning of section 2106 of the Kentucky Statutes; and that the defendant was not guilty of the crime charged in the uttering and publishing of it as alleged.

The judgment of the trial court is, therefore, reversed and cause remanded for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

STROH v. SOUTH COVINGTON AND CINCINNATI STREET RY. CO.

1. Damages—Pleading—A judgment will not be disturbed on account of smallness of damages where the special damages arising by loss of time are not sufficiently pleaded.

2. Same—In an action for damages it was not prejudicial to appellant for the court to refuse to permit her counsel to further cross-examine an expert witness, where such witness had been thoroughly examined and had told all he knew of the subject in hand, where appellant made no avowal as to what a witness would state if permitted to answer a question, the failure to do so renders it impossible for the court to determine whether she was prejudiced by the refusal to permit the witness to answer the question.

B. F. Graziani for appellant.

Ernst, Cassett & McDougall for appellee.

Appeal from Kenton Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

The appellant, in alighting from one of appellee's cars, fell, receiving bodily injuries, to recover damages for which she instituted this action, charging that her mishap was occasioned by the negligence of the employes of appellee in charge of the car. The answer placed in issue the allegations of the petition, and pleaded, affirmatively, the contributory negligence of appellant. Upon the first trial the jury awarded a verdict in the sum of $4,000. An appeal to this court resulted in the reversal of the case, in an opinion contained in 23 Ky. Law Rep., 1807. Upon the return of the case another trial was had, resulting in a verdict in favor of appellant for the sum of $500, of the smallness of which she is now complaining.

Appellant's hope for a reversal because of the smallness of the verdict awarded her is based upon the testimony that she was engaged in the business of cloak-making at the time she received her injuries, for which she was paid the sum of $10 per week; that up to the time of the accident she had always been healthful, and had never missed any time from her work; that, since then she has been unable to work for a period of about three years, and that she has lost, by reason of loss of time occasioned by her injuries, the sum of $1,500. And it is urged that, although section 341 of the Code forbids the reversal of a case for personal injuries because of the smallness of the verdict, as to the amount which she lost in money by her inability to labor for the period named that comes within the principle announced in Taylor v. Howser, 12 Bush, 468, and Ray v. Jeffries, 86 Ky., 367. Conceding this to be sound, as a proposition of law, still appellant is not entitled to a reversal for the reason named, because the special damages arising by loss of time is not sufficiently pleaded. In her petition we find the allegation of the subject of her damages as follows: "Plaintiff says that she has been to great expense for the services of a doctor and medicine; that her expense for medicine, up to the present, has been $100, and will be more; that her expense for doctor, care, nursing and other treatment, up to the present, has been about $200, and will be more; that because of her pain and suffering permanent injury and inability to earn money, and loss of time from June 4, 1899, up to the present, she has been damaged in the sum of $15,000."

It will be observed that appellant's special damages are alleged to consist of the sum of $500—for doctor's bills, medicine, nursing, etc.; but there is no allegation as to the amount of special damages for loss of time; this is included in the lump sum of $15,000, which she claims to have suffered in the way of general damages. This very question arose in the case of Jesse v. Schuck, 11 Ky. Law Rep., 463. In the opinion in that case the court say: "The petition, after averring the assault and battery, says that, by reason thereof, the appellant 'was confined to his bed for — weeks, and suffered greatly in body and mind, and was put to and incurred considerable expense, to wit, in the sum of — dollars, in securing medical attention, nursing and medicine, and, by reason of said assaulting, beating and bruising, this plaintiff lost — weeks from his business, and was damaged greatly, viz., in the sum of — dollars; and he says that, by reason of said acts and doings of said defendant, this plaintiff was damaged in the sum of $5,000.' It is blank as to the time lost, the expense incurred, and the damage resulting therefrom. * * *

"It can not properly be said that the petition in this case states the facts as to the special damage, and that the amount thereof is a matter of inquiry upon the trial. The facts, being material to a recovery, must be so stated as to enable the defendant to plead understandingly as to them, and to determine whether he will or ought to deny them. Any resulting damage not implied by law from the doing of a wrong should be stated with particularity. Any other rule would authorize such a loose mode of pleading as to often lead to surprise and undue advantage."

In the case cited, as in the case at bar, the jury had awarded a small verdict for the plaintiff, thus showing that the injuries received were caused by the wrongdoing of the defendant. In that case, as in this, the loss of time was clearly proved; but the court affirmed the judgment because of the failure of the plaintiff to sufficiently allege the special damages which he claimed. This opinion is conclusive of the question under discussion. The verdict covered all the special damage sufficiently pleaded.

The second and third error complained of may be considered together. These consist in the fact that the court permitted it to be known by the jury that the two physicians who testified in the case as to the extent of appellant's injuries had been appointed by the court; and the misconduct of the attorney for appellee in stating to the jury in his argument that these doctors had been appointed by the court. We do not see how this could have prejudiced appellant's case; the doctors had been appointed by the court, under that large discretion which he possessed, and which is fully recognized in the case of the Belt Electric Line Co. v. Allen, 19 Ky. Law Rep., 1656. The question is not material how they came to know the facts of which they deposed, but rather the truth of their evidence after they were on the stand. Appellant could not have been prejudiced by the knowledge on the part of the jury that these two witnesses came from an entirely impartial appointment. Nor do we think appellant was prejudiced by the refusal of the court to permit her counsel to further cross-examine the expert witness, Dr. Zinke. The doctor has been thoroughly examined, and had told all he knew on the subject in hand; any further cross-examination of him was an unnecessary prolongation of the trial which the court, in its wisdom, had the right to curtail.

The fifth error assigned by appellant is the refusal of the court to permit her to show, on the question of the extent of her injuries, that she would probably be rendered sterile as a result of the accident. The record shows that when the court sustained objections to the questions propounded along this line, appellant made no avowal as to what the witness would state, if permitted to answer the question. The failure so to do renders it impossible for us to say whether or not she was prejudiced by the refusal of the court to permit the witness to answer the question. Brown v. Commonwealth, 14 Bush, 398; Bowler v. Lane, 8 Metcalfe, 311.)

Judgment affirmed.

CINCINNATI, NEW ORLEANS & TEXAS PACIFIC RY. CO. v.
VAUGHT.

(Filed March 1, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Railroads—Damages—Where appellee was in a refrigerator car engaged in cleaning out straw when a servant of appellant coupled it to an engine and hauled it away, when appellee, on going to the door to see where he was being carried, was struck by the door, which slammed against him, after striking the platform of appellant's station, severely injuring him, the evidence authorizing it and the instructions conforming to the law, a judgment in his favor for $500 will not be disturbed.

O. H. Waddle and John Galvin for appellant.

Denton & Robinson for appellee.

Appeal from Pulaski Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

The appellant, Cincinnati, New Orleans & Texas Pacific R. R. Co. is a corporation operating a railroad through the State of Kentucky, a part of its line being in Pulaski county. The appellee, D. F. Vaught, was, at the time of the occurrence which produced this litigation, in the employment of the Somerset Ice Co. The appellant had hauled a refrigerator car loaded with ice to the place of business of the Somerset Ice Co., and left it there to be unloaded. Appellee, by order of his employer, had unloaded the ice from the car, and was engaged in cleaning out the straw from the floor and gathering up the ice hooks for the purpose of turning over the car, unloaded and cleaned, to appellant; but just before he left it an engine in the custody and control of appellant's employes backed down, coupled onto the empty car and hauled it away. The door of the car, which was large and heavy, opened out on hinges, and was swinging open when it started.

After the car started appellee went to the door, in order to look out, and, as he says, to see where he was being carried, at which time the heavy door, which was swinging outwardly, struck against a platform, which constituted a part of appellant's station, with such violence that it was slammed to, striking him on the head, shoulder and abdomen, knocking him senseless and severely injuring him. Appellee's evidence was to the effect that he was not notified of the fact that appellant's servants were about to move the car, and knew nothing of their purpose so to do, until it was started on its journey away from the place where it had been standing; that being a refrigerator car, there was no place from which he could look out except the open door, and that he went to this door to look out and see where he was being carried.

For the appellant John Starkle testified that he was one of the brakemen in charge of the train which moved the car upon which appellee was engaged in working; that before the engine was attached to it he saw appellee and told him he must get out, as they were going to take it away; that appellee answered "all right," and at once threw out some of his implements; whereupon he, supposing appellee had left the car, gave the signal which started it on its destination. The jury returned a verdict of $500 in favor of appellee, of which appellant is now complaining.

The court instructed the jury as follows:

"A. The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that the plaintiff, Vaught, received injuries on the breast, abdomen and legs, by being struck by a car door, while plaintiff was in a car on the side track of the defendant, and said injuries were caused by the negligence and carelessness of the defendant, its agents, servants and employes in pulling or pushing said car, without warning to the plaintiff, and by allowing the car door to remain open and by pulling or pushing said car door against the platform, you will find for the plaintiff such sum as will reasonably compensate him for his suffering and physical agony (if any), and loss of time by reason thereof, and will, if you believe he is permanently disabled, you will find such damages as will reasonably compensate him therefor. Your whole finding, however, not to exceed $1,000.

"B. It was the duty of the defendant in handling its cars to do so in such manner as not to inflict injury upon any person who had a right to be upon or in any of said cars of the defendant, and if the defendant's agents failed to use reasonable care or diligence to ascertain his presence and warn him of danger, they were guilty of negligence.

"No. 1. Unless you believe from the evidence that the employes of the defendant railroad engaged in moving the car causing the injury to plaintiff complained of failed to exercise such care in the movement of said car as an ordinarily prudent person would have exercised under the same or similar circumstances, you will find for the defendant.

"No. 2. If you believe from the evidence that the plaintiff was notified that the car in which he was located was about to be moved, and he was requested to leave the same and he had sufficient time to have left the same in safety before the collision of the car door with the platform of the depot, and failed to do so, such conduct would be contributory neglect on his part; and if the injury complained of would not have occurred but for such contributory neglect, you will find for defendant.

"No. 3. If you shall believe from the evidence that plaintiff knew of the condition of the car and of the door thereto, and after knowing said car was being moved he placed himself and remained where said door could strike him, when it was unnecessary for him to have remained in said car, or to have occupied such position, this would be negligence on his part, and if such negligence so contributed to the injury received by him as that he would not have been injured but for such negligence, you will find for defendant.

"No. 4. Negligence, as used in these instructions, is the want of ordinary care. Ordinary care is such care as would be exercised by an ordinary prudent man under the same or similar circumstances as those under investigation."

These instructions constitute, as we think, the correct rule of law applicable to the case at bar; certainly, taken as a whole, they are not unfavorable to appellant. Appellee was not bound to jump from the car after it started, as is contended for by appellant, although he might think that could be done with safety; and if the car was being hauled off with him in it, without his knowing where he was being taken; it was but natural for him, and he had the right, to go to the door, which afforded the only means of obtaining the information he desired of the situation, although he might have known there was danger attending his so doing; but he was not entitled to unnecessarily place himself in peril, and the question, whether he did or not do so, under all the circumstances of this case, was a question for the jury. His perturbation of mind would necessarily be increased or diminished by the fact as to whether he was being carried far from home, or merely shifted around in appellant's yards, with the opportunity, after a few minutes, of being allowed to leave the car in safety.

For the reason indicated the judgment is affirmed.

MATTHEWS, ASS'EE v. MATTHEWS, ASS'EE.

(Filed March 1, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Limitation of actions—Former judgment—In an action to enforce a lien on land where no defense was interposed that the claim had not been verified, or presented to the assignee for allowance, and where limitation was not relied on, after final judgment had been rendered it was too late to set up the plea of limitation on the ground that the claim had not been proved before the assignee and that fifteen years had then run after maturity of the debt.

2. Jurisdiction of county courts—By section 87, Kentucky Statutes, county courts are authorized to direct assignee to sell land assigned to him for payment of debts.

J. I. Blanton for appellant.

W. S. Cason for appellee.

Appeal from Harrison Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

James Matthews, in the year 1895, made an assignment to T. W. Hardy for the benefit of his creditors, and under section 85, Kentucky Statutes, the county court appointed three persons to lay off to the assignor his homestead in the land assigned. Their report having been filed in the county court, B. B. Petty, as assignee of Jackson Matthews, filed exceptions to the report on the ground that his debt was created before the purchase of the land by James Matthews. The statute referred to provides: "The report setting apart the exempted property may be excepted to by any person in interest. * * * If exceptions are filed they shall be heard by the court and disposed of." The case was heard in the county court, and it was adjudged that the debt set up by Petty had been fully paid, and his exceptions were overruled. Petty appealed from this judgment to the circuit court, making only James Matthews defendant to the appeal. No objection was made in the circuit court before trial that Hardy, as assignee, was not party defendant on the appeal. At the June term, 1896, of the circuit court the case was tried on the merits, and it was adjudged that Petty's debt was contracted before the purchase of the land, and was unpaid. The case was remanded to the county court, "with directions to set aside the order overruling the exceptions taken by B. B. Petty, assignee of Jackson Matthews, to the homestead allotted to James Matthews, and to enter a judgment in said court sustaining said exceptions, and adjudging that James Matthews is not entitled to a homestead as against the debt due to B. B. Petty, assignee of Jackson Matthews." On March 15, 1897, the assignee, under section 90, Kentucky Statutes, filed in the county court his report of claims, rejecting the debt of Petty, as assignee of Jackson Matthews, on the ground that it was barred by limitation. On March 22 the assignee filed his final report, and on the same day Petty, as assignee of Jackson Matthews, filed exceptions to the report of the assignee, Hardy, rejecting his claim. Previous to this, however, on August 24, 1896, Petty had filed in the county court a copy of the judgment of the circuit court above referred to, and the county court had entered an order entering it as the judgment of the county court on the exceptions. Without any action being taken except continuances of the case, on January 28, 1901, the

A proceeding was filed away with leave to reinstate on the docket. On April 21, 1902, Petty gave notice, and had the case reinstated on the docket. His exceptions to the report of the assignee were then sustained, his claim was allowed and the assignee was ordered to sell the land for the payment of the debt. An appeal was taken from this judgment to the circuit court, and in the circuit court the defendants offered to show that Petty's debt was paid, but the court held this matter concluded by the former judgment, and affirmed the judgment of the county court. The appeal before us is prosecuted from this judgment of the circuit court.

As by the statute the county court is authorized to have the homestead laid off, and it is provided that any person in interest may file exceptions to the report of allotment and that these shall be determined by the county court, Petty properly filed his exceptions in the county court when the homestead was allotted. If James Matthews was entitled to a homestead against his other creditors, but not against Petty, the county court had jurisdiction to determine the rights of the parties, for the plain purpose of the statute is to provide a summary mode of settling the assigned estate in the county court; and if the assignor was not entitled to a homestead as against Petty's debt, Petty was entitled to have the assignee directed to sell this land for the payment of his debt; otherwise the proceeding in the county court would not have settled the rights of the parties, and would have been only the starting point for new litigation. This would defeat the purpose of the statute.

When Petty appealed from the judgment of the county court, holding that his debt was paid and rejecting his claim for that reason, he should regularly have made Hardy, as assignee, a party defendant; but as no other creditor had a debt which was superior to the homestead, James Matthews, the claimant of the homestead, was the only defendant really a party in interest, and the case having been tried on the merits in the circuit court, as between them the judgment of the circuit court was valid, for Hardy, as assignee, had no interest in the homestead of James Matthews, none of the other creditors asserting privileged debts.

The statute of limitation could not be pleaded to Petty's claim in the county court after the return of the case from the circuit court, and the county court had entered the judgment of the circuit court as its judgment. The proceeding to settle the assigned estate was pending in the county court when Petty filed his exceptions to the report allotting the homestead. These exceptions made him a party to the proceedings and were the assertion of his claim, which was not then barred by limitation. No objection was then made that his claim had not been verified or presented to the assignee for allowance. The defense of payment was interposed, but limitation was not relied on. After the defendants were defeated on the defense of payment, and a final judgment had been entered in favor of Petty, it was too late to set up the defense of limitation on the ground that the claim had not been proven up before the assignee, and that fifteen years had then run after the maturity of the debt.

The order of the county court struck the proceedings from the docket with leave to reinstate. It was evidently stricken off before the exceptions to the report of the assignee were acted on, and was properly reinstated on notice. Judge Ward, the attorney for Petty, having been taken sick, and died pending the proceeding, no action was taken in the matter until Petty employed new counsel to look after it. When the case was returned the second time to the circuit court he properly refused to hear again the evidence on the question of payment, for this was concluded by the former appeal. By section 37, Kentucky Statutes, the county court is authorized to order the assignee to sell real estate assigned to him for the payment of debts.

Judgment affirmed.

JOSEPH'S ADM'R, &c. v. LAPP'S ADM'R.

(Filed March 1, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Insurance—Construction of statutes—By section 1408 of the Kentucky Statutes the proceeds of policy of insurance in this action became chargeable with the debts of the insured, and the heirs at law took no title in it except subject to the provisions of the statute, and were not authorized to transfer it to another for collection, or to enter into a contract for its collection, and one relying upon such contract will have to look to the heirs for payment and can not recover for services of administrator who collected policy.

2. Attorney and client—It is a well-settled principle that a client may discharge an attorney at any time with or without cause, and may do so even where the fee is contingent, but where the attorney has performed services he may recover for them if the discharge was without cause.

Alfred Seligman for appellants.

W. T. Burch for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Common Pleas Branch, Third Division.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

Margaret Lapp was the beneficiary of a policy of insurance in the Knights of Honor on the life of her son, John Lapp, for $2,000. She died a few days after the death of her son, without having collected the policy. After her death, on the 31st of January, 1899, Carrie Lapp and Lou Meglemary, children, and her grandchildren, George Felix Stranger, Maggie Schwellkert and Desda Cochraon, who were her only heirs at law, transferred and delivered this policy of insurance, or benefit certificate as it is sometimes called, to Armour & Co. for the purpose of collection. The writing provided that after paying the cost of collection and debts due by John Lapp to Armour & Co., the balance to be turned over to the heirs. Armour & Co. employed appellants, attorneys at law, to take such steps as might be necessary to collect the policy and delivered it to them. On the 25th of April, 1899, appellants entered into a written contract with the heirs at law to represent them in the collection of this policy for a fee equal to one-third of the sum realized thereon. Shortly after the execution of this last contract appellee, Carrie Lapp, qualified as administratrix of the estate of her deceased mother, and demanded possession of the policy from appellants, which they refused to deliver. She thereupon instituted a suit for the collection of the policy, and caused a rule to issue against appellants, requiring them to deliver the policy to her. They responded, setting out their contract with Armour & Co. and with the heirs at law, and asked that they be protected in their rights. Their response was held insufficient, and they were compelled to deliver the policy. Appellee prosecuted her suit against the insurance company to judgment, and recovered thereon the sum of $2,958.26, the amount of the policy and interest. Thereupon appellants, upon their own petition, were made parties to this proceeding, and set out their contract with the heirs at law, and asked that they be adjudged $986.09 from the fund collected from the insurance company, subject, however, to the claim in favor of Armour & Co. for $185.87. A general demurrer was interposed and sustained to this pleading, and their petition dismissed, and they have appealed, and ask a reversal upon the ground that they had a valid, enforceable contract with the heirs at law and a lien for their fee under section 107 of the Kentucky Statutes. Section 1403 of the Kentucky Statutes provides that "where any person shall die intestate as to his personal estate, or any part thereof, the surplus, after payment of funeral expenses, charges of administration, debts, shall pass to and be distributed among the same persons as real estate is directed to descend, except, etc."

Under the provisions of this statute the policy of insurance, or the proceeds thereof, became chargeable with the payment of her debts, and her heirs at law took no title thereto except subject to this provision of the statute. They had, therefore, no such interest in the policy of insurance as authorized them to transfer it to Armour & Co., or to enter into a contract with appellants for its collection. An action can not be maintained by the heir for the recovery of a debt due to the ancestor unless the obligation to the ancestor is by its terms payable to the heirs. (Brunks v. Means, 50 Ky., 211; Montgomery v. Commonwealth, 17 Ky., 197; Newman's Code Pleading, 94, and numerous authorities there cited. The trial court, therefore, decided that appellants were not entitled to a judgment to any portion of the fund which had been recovered by the administratrix. It was her duty to apply the money collected by her to the payment of the debts of her intestate in the manner directed by the statute, and the surplus which remained after the payment of such indebtedness became the property of the heirs. Appellants will have to look to their clients individually for anything due to them for their services. Besides, the law is well settled that a client has the right to discharge his attorney at any time with or without cause, even in a case where the fee is contingent. If, however, the discharge is without cause and after the attorney has actually performed services in the line of his employment, he is entitled to recover the value of such services. (Henry v. Vance, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 496.)

For reasons indicated the judgment is affirmed.

DEAN v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed March 2, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Criminal law—Evidence—Where it appears from the record that appellant began the difficulty which resulted in the homicide, and after an altercation with deceased, pursued him, shooting him until he had killed him, deceased attempting all the while to escape, a verdict and judgment of manslaughter, fixing his punishment at confinement in the penitentiary for twenty-one years, will not be disturbed.

2. Same—In a prosecution for murder it was competent to permit the Commonwealth to prove that just before the affray deceased lent another his knife because such evidence was corroborative of that of another witness who testified that the knife with which appellant was cut was in his own hand, and was struck by deceased in attempting to ward it off, thereby cutting appellant.

8. Same—Section 593, Code of Practice, provides that "the court shall exercise a reasonable control over the mode of interrogation," the discretion of the trial court being broad in such matters and it appearing that a witness was fully interrogated by appellant's council, it can not be said there was unnecessary interference on the part of the court in ruling that the witness should tell all he knew before being interrupted by attorneys by questions.

James Andrew Scott for appellant.

N. B. Hays and Loraine Mix for appellee.

Appeal from Franklin Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle.

The appellant, George Dean, was indicted and tried in the Franklin Circuit Court for the murder of Ed. Adams. Notwithstanding his plea of not guilty, he was convicted of voluntary manslaughter and his punishment fixed at confinement in the penitentiary for twenty-one years, and the lower court having overruled his motion for a new trial, he has appealed.

The difficulty which culminated in the homicide began in a bawdy house situated on Gas House alley, in the city of Frankfort. The house was kept by a woman called Jessie Douglass. According to the evidence of the Commonwealth appellant and Adams met at the house of the Douglass woman on the night of December 25, 1902. Jessie Douglass was making eggnog in the kitchen. There were present, besides Jessie, appellant and Adams, her daughter, known as Cecil Howard, Myrtle McQueen, and in the front room at the time the difficulty began were Ape Willis and Wade Morse. The women were all of loose morals, appellant being the apparent favorite of Jessie Douglass, and Adams that of her daughter, Cecil Howard.

Jessie Douglass began to complain at her daughter for having attempted to go that morning to Lexington, and claimed that Adams was to blame for it. The latter said: "Jessie, you needn't to blame me about it because I smacked her for wanting to go." Appellant then interfered by saying to Adams, "If you want to chew the rag, chew it with me," and further remarked that he had had it in for Adams a long time, and now he was going to take it out, and thereupon struck Adams on the head, which was bandaged on account of wounds received in a previous fight with another. Adams said to him: "I have always been a friend of yours, and always want to be; you see I am in no condition to fight." But unmindful of his protestations, appellant struck him again, and was told by Adams, in substance, if he wanted to fight to lay aside his pistol and go out in the alley and he would fight him a fair fight. Appellant then threw his pistol on the bed, saying he would go with Adams anywhere, and again struck him, knocking or forcing him into the front room. They started out of that room toward the alley, when appellant knocked Adams over a washstand in the room, and as he stood over him with a knife in his hand, Adams in knocking off the stroke that appellant seemed about to make with the knife, struck the hand that held it, and caused it to enter appellant's neck, thereby inflicting upon him a dangerous wound." Adams then said: "Take him off, he is killing me." Whereupon Myrtle McQueen opened the door and told Adams to leave, which he did.

Down to this time appellant's pistol had remained on the bed, but when Adams left the house appellant regained possession of the pistol, and following in the direction taken by Adams, caught up with him near the corner of Washington and Clinton streets, just after the latter encountered one Wm. Hayden, of whom he attempted to borrow a pistol, but as Hayden had no pistol he could not comply with the request.

Hayden testified that Adams was running as he approached him, and while they were yet talking about the pistol appellant came upon them with his pistol in hand. Adams jumped behind Hayden, caught him by the arms and held him between his own body and appellant, who was still advancing upon him with his pistol presented as if to shoot. Adams kept pushing the body of Hayden first one way and then another in the effort to shield himself from the pistol of appellant, and Hayden repeatedly asked the appellant not to shoot, telling him that he did not wish to be shot himself. Appellant replied that Adams had cut him, and he intended to kill him.

As appellant got near enough to attempt to reach around Hayden's body to shoot Adams Hayden succeeded in breaking away from Adams, and appellant immediately shot the latter, who exclaimed, "Oh, Lord," and ran toward Griffy's saloon, pursued by appellant, who snapped the pistol at him in the effort to shoot him before he entered the saloon, and then following him into the saloon, shot him again as he fell or crouched near the counter. Adams died immediately after the last shot was fired by appellant. Two wounds were found upon his body, one ball having entered the arm, the other the back, just below one of the shoulder blades, the wound in the back evidently causing Adams' death, but it does not appear from the evidence whether it was from the shot fired by appellant on the street, or the one fired by him in the saloon.

In addition to the facts immediately connected with and surrounding the homicide which were testified to in the main by the two women, Cecil Howard and Myrtle McQueen, and by Wm. Hayden, the Commonwealth introduced evidence of threats made by appellant against Adams shortly before the killing in the presence of divers witnesses, who testified with great particularity as to the times and places of such threats. Upon the other hand, the appellant and Jessie Douglass, who were the only other persons besides Adams, Cecil Howard and Myrtle McQueen in the room when and where the difficulty that led to the killing began, gave a widely different version of the facts to that testified to by the witnesses for the Commonwealth. The appellant testified in regard to the difficulty and subsequent homicide, in substance, as follows: "Ed. Adams came back in there, and he walked over to me and said: 'That day me and Chism had that fight you wouldn't let me have your pistol; I said, go on, I don't want to have any trouble, I have got a crippled arm, and he says, you come out here and I will whip hell out of you; I said, go ahead, I don't want any trouble. He said, lay down your pistol and come out here and I will whip hell out of you. When I started for the door he hit me with a knife. One arm Kelly and I clutched him with one hand, we both fell over the washstand, and he said you son of a bitch, you, I will go and get a gun and come back and finish you, and he went up the alley and asked Innis Clark for a gun; Innis didn't give him one, and he asked Bill for a gun, and he started down towards me, and I shot him. The pistol snapped as he went into Griffy's saloon, and I shot another in there."

Appellant further testified that after he was cut by Adams he started for a doctor, and that Adams turned back on him, and he shot him. He was corroborated in the main by Jessie Douglass as to the difficulty in the house, and in some measure by Ape Willis, who, being in the front room when the difficulty began, failed to hear some of the quarrel preceding the fight. The same is true of the testimony of Morse and Kelly, each of whom saw only the latter part of the fight, and neither of whom saw or heard what led to it. Appellant was also corroborated by one other witness as to Adams asking Innis Clark for a pistol, and several witnesses testified that threats were made against his life by Adams shortly before the homicide. But appellant's statements as to what occurred at the time of the killing of Adams were not only not corroborated, but were flatly contradicted and disproved by Hayden and persons in the saloon.

Much of the evidence introduced by the Commonwealth in rebuttal tended to contradict many of the material statements of appellant's witnesses, and taking the evidence as a whole, we are unable to say that it did not authorize the verdict of the jury. Whatever may be said of the conduct of Adams as a contributing cause to the difficulty in the house, it is apparent that appellant was equally, if not more, at fault, and in respect to the subsequent killing of Adams it is apparent from the evidence that it was wholly without justification, for, according to the testimony of Hayden, who saw Adams shot in the street, and of those who saw him shot in the saloon of Griffy, where he was pursued by appellant, he was then not only without the means or apparent inclination to harm appellant, but was actually fleeing for his life. We can understand how the jury might have found something in what led to the fight in the house that, in their judgment, justified them in reducing the homicide from murder to manslaughter, although they were not authorized by the evidence to say that the killing of Adams was, under the circumstances, excusable.

It is, however, insisted for appellant that the trial court erred in allowing the Commonwealth to prove that the deceased, just before his death, lent Taylor Kinkead his knife, and that the latter had it in his possession when deceased was shot. One of the issues made by the appellant was that he was cut in the fight in the house by a knife in the hands of Adams. Appellant testified that he had no knife, but was cut by Adams.

One other witness introduced for the defense, Jessie Douglass, testified that she saw Adams' hands in his pockets when and before the fight began, and that she saw a knife in his hand when appellant was cut, and that Adams did the cutting. Upon the other hand, Myrtle McQueen positively testified that the knife with which appellant was cut was in his own hand, and that the cutting was done by Adams knocking the hand of appellant so that the knife was thrust into his neck by his own hand. A knife was found by this witness, or Jessie Douglass, behind the door, and given to an officer of the court, by whom it was lost. No knife or other weapon was found on the person of Adams after his death. We are of opinion that the evidence of Kinkead, though by no means conclusive, was competent as tending to corroborate Myrtle McQueen as to the manner of the cutting, and to contradict the appellant and Jessie Douglass, both of whom testified that appellant was cut by a knife in the hands of Adams. In any event, the evidence complained of could not have been prejudicial to appellant, for though Adams may have unlawfully cut him with a knife in his possession, under the evidence appellant was himself in the wrong in pursuing and killing Adams at a time when he had no reason to apprehend danger to his life or person at his hands.

It is also complained by counsel for appellant that the lower court erred in not permitting him to conduct the examination of the witness, Wade Morse, without unnecessary interference from the court. An examination of the testimony of the witness in question found in the bill of evidence will show that after certain questions, mainly preliminary, had been asked the witness, the court, interrupting the examination, ruled that "the witness should tell all about it before being interrupted by the attorneys with questions. After making a full statement, he could then be interrogated."

Section 593, Code of Practice, provides that "the court shall exercise a reasonable control over the mode of interrogation, so as to make it rapid, distinct and as little annoying to the witness and as effective for the extraction of the truth as may be." It must be confessed that no particular reason appears from the record for the ruling complained of, yet many reasons not apparent to one not present at the trial may have existed therefor. The discretion of the trial court in such matters is broad, and in this case it is not perceived that any injury could have resulted to the rights of the appellant, for it appears from the bill of evidence that the witness was subsequently fully interrogated by appellant's counsel touching all matters about which information could have been given by him in regard to the case.

Complaint is also made that the court refused to permit Charles Kelly to testify as to the reputation of the deceased. We are of the opinion that the court did not err in excluding the testimony of the witness on the point indicated; as a whole it shows that his acquaintance with the reputation of the deceased was based more upon his personal knowledge of the latter's escapades and particular acts of wrongdoing than upon what people generally in the community in which he had lived said about him. Moreover, several other witnesses testified as to the bad reputation of the deceased, and at most the testimony of Kelly would have been merely cumulative.

Another alleged error complained of by appellant is that the lower court refused to permit Ben Conway to testify regarding a threat made in his hearing by the deceased shortly before his death. The testimony of this witness as to the threat in question was as follows: "I went down the street and he (deceased) walked up behind me, and he said, 'which way are you going,' and I said, going home, and he walked on down the street; he started to go across the street, and he said, 'which way are you going,' and I said, I am going home; he said, 'I am going down here and kill some God damned son of a bitch,' but he didn't call who it was."

The witness subsequently stated that deceased, after making the threat, started toward the "alley." The record shows that the court, upon objection of the Commonwealth's attorney, expressed the opinion that the testimony of the witness was incompetent, presumably because the statements of deceased detailed by the witness were too general to be pertinent, but they were not in terms excluded by the court from the consideration of the jury. Indeed the bill of evidence shows that the witness subsequently repeated to the jury the threat made by deceased in all its details, without objection from court or counsel, consequently the entire testimony of the witness, including the threat, went to and was obviously considered by the jury, without qualification or restriction. It is further contended for the appellant that the court erred in permitting leading questions to be asked Thomas Rogers, foreman of the grand jury.

Criminal Code, section 113, provides that "a member of the grand jury may, however, be required by a court to disclose the testimony of a witness examined before the grand jury for the purpose of ascertaining its consistency with the testimony of the witness given on the trial." * * *

It appears from the record that Jessie Douglass testified as a witness before the grand jury that found the indictment against appellant. It further appears that her testimony before that body was reduced to writing by the foreman, and was read to and signed by her. If, therefore, her testimony given on the trial of appellant in regard to the difficulty, that resulted in the death of Adams, was contradictory of, or inconsistent with, her statements in regard thereto made to the grand jury, the Commonwealth had the right, after laying the foundation therefor by obtaining her denial of any material statement made by her before the grand jury, to introduce the foreman, or other members of the grand jury, to contradict her, in doing which it was the right and duty of the counsel representing the Commonwealth to ask him leading questions in the same general form used in the cross-examination, on the same points, of the witness thereby sought to be contradicted.

We understand this to have been the course followed by the Commonwealth's attorney on the trial in the court below in the examination of both the Douglass woman and Rogers, therefore, it was not error for the court to permit the asking of Rogers the leading questions complained of. We do not regard as error the action of the lower court in refusing, on appellant's motion, to set aside the swearing of the jury, and continue the case on account of the absence of the witness, Brawner, who was taken sick after the trial began. The affidavit of appellant as to what he expected to prove by Brawner was read to the jury as the latter's deposition. The material matter therein relied on was only an uncommunicated threat alleged to have been made by Adams against appellant. The evidence was only cumulative, as other witnesses introduced for appellant testified as to divers threats of similar import claimed to have been made by Adams, and, besides, it does not appear from the record that Brawner, if personally present, would have testified any more strongly or intelligently in appellant's behalf than he was made to do in the affidavit setting forth his statements.

As a motion for a continuance is a matter that addresses itself to the sound discretion of the court, such discretion will not be interfered with by this court unless it is made manifest that the appellant's substantial rights have been prejudiced by its abuse, which we are unable to say has been done in this case. We are likewise unable to sustain the further contention of appellant's counsel that the trial court erred in refusing to permit so much of the first affidavit for continuance as contained the statement attributed to Innis Clark, George Oliver and Andrew Dougherty to be read to the jury as evidence. No subpoena was issued for George Oliver, nor had he been recognized. No diligence was, therefore, shown as to him. It is true that a subpoena was issued for Innis Clark and Andrew Dougherty, in common with other witnesses of appellant, August 7, 1903, and was executed on all the witnesses named therein except Clark, Dougherty and two others, on September 15, 1903, which was only two days before the trial of appellant began in the lower court.

The state of facts presented by the record fails to show diligence upon the part of the appellant in the effort to procure the attendance of the witnesses named. Though the subpoena seems to have been issued on August 7, 1903, it does not show, nor does it appear from the appellant's affidavit, when it was placed in the sheriff's hands for service. Probably it was not placed in the sheriff's hands until about the time of service on such of the witnesses as are named in the return, else why did he delay its service until almost the calling of the case for trial. It may be that the subpoena was not executed upon Clark and Dougherty for the very reason that the placing of it in the sheriff's hands was delayed too long. Its service upon them would perhaps have been effected by the prompt placing of the subpoena into the officer's hands. Who can tell from the record the reason of the delay? Facts showing diligence must be made to appear affirmatively in order to entitle one to a continuance, or the right to read as a deposition statements that may be put into an affidavit as the testimony of an absent witness. We are further of opinion that the statements attributed to the witnesses, Clark and Dougherty, if read to the jury, would have been in a large measure cumulative, as the same facts were in effect testified to on the trial by other witnesses of appellant. No complaint is made of the instructions given on the trial. A careful consideration of the record convinces us that no error was committed by the lower court that can be said to have operated to the prejudice of the substantial rights of the appellant.

Wherefore, the judgment is affirmed.

THOMPSON v. STARK, &c.

(Filed March 2, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Contracts—Notice—Where the seller of fruit trees had notice that the land belonged to the children of a deceased owner before they delivered trees under a contract by which they were to have certain crops for certain years, and that certain deeds by which the title to the land on which the trees were planted was attempted to be conveyed were void, and, therefore, did not divest the real owners of their title, their contract can not be enforced against a purchaser for value and without notice.

R. C. Kinkead and Montgomery & Montgomery for appellant.

J. P. O'Meara and L. A. Faurest for appellees.

Appeal from Hardin Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

This action was instituted in the Hardin Circuit Court on September 17, 1902, by Stark Bros., a firm engaged in the nursery business in the State of Missouri, against Leo C. Ritchie, wife of W. H. S. Ritchie, W. H. S. Ritchie as guardian and trustee for T. M., Madaline C. and W. C. Ritchie, T. M. Ritchie, Madaline C. Ritchie, W. D. Butler, Ellen R. Bulter and appellant, Annie G. Thompson, seeking to have the court adjudge that appellees are entitled to any two crops of apples and peaches and to any three crops of pears that they may select that may grow on certain apple, peach and pear trees furnished by them, within fifteen years from the time the trees were set out, and also that appellant be enjoined from interfering with their gathering and removing the crops when selected. It is alleged in the petition that the defendant, Leo C. Ritchie, was the owner of the land therein described on which the trees were planted, and while the owner thereof, on September 15, 1894, signed, acknowledged and delivered to them a written contract by which they agreed to furnish her 18,350 apple, peach and pear trees to be set out on the land, and carefully cared for by her. She agreed for herself, her heirs and assigns to deliver to Stark Bros. any two crops of apples and peaches, and any three crops of pears yielded by each of the respective varieties of the trees that Stark Bros. might choose within fifteen years next after the planting of the trees, they to receive the fruit on the trees in the orchard. It is further alleged that the contract was accepted by them and duly recorded in the Hardin County Court clerk's office on October 24, 1894, and that they furnished all of the trees to Leo C. Ritchie, and same were set out on the land and were then growing thereon. It was also alleged that in 1897, while Leo C. Ritchie was still the owner of the land, they entered into another agreement with her by which they furnished her 1,590 apple trees and 1,900 pear trees, to be set out by her on the same terms as those purchased prior thereto, and that these trees were set out and were then growing on the land. They allege that this last contract was not signed by Leo C. Ritchie, but was signed by her agent, T. M. Ritchie, but was never recorded.

Appellant filed her separate answer to this petition, in which she denied that Leo C. Ritchie ever owned or was in the possession of the land described in the petition, and denied knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to whether Leo C. Ritchie made the contract referred to, or whether any of the trees were on the land as claimed by the appellant. She alleged that she bought the land from T. M. Ritchie, who was the owner thereof, for value and with no notice of the claim of Stark Bros. The issues were made, the case tried, and on final hearing the appellees were granted the relief they sought, and from that judgment the appellant, Annie G. Thompson, has appealed.

The facts leading up to this litigation are complicated, but, in substance, are as follows: Sarah J. Ritchie was the first wife of W. H. S. Ritchie, and she owned in her own right four tracts of land adjoining and forming one body, one tract containing 212 acres, one containing 60 acres, one containing 25 acres and one containing $5\frac{1}{4}$ acres. At her death she left a will from which we quote two provisions which have application to the questions herein involved:

"2d. I give and bequeath and devise to my children, sharè and share alike, all the estate, real and personal and mixed, of which I may die seized or possessed.

"4th. I hereby nominate and appoint my husband, W. H. S. Ritchie, the trustee and guardian of all our children and their issue and survivors, and invest him as such trustee with the legal title to all my said estate and personality of whatsoever kind and wheresoever situate, and desire that during his natural life he manage and control the same for the sole and exclusive use or benefit of all our said children, their issues and survivors; and for that purpose I authorize him to sell and dispose of my said estate and property and reinvest the proceeds, which proceeds are to be held and invested for the sole and exclusive use of our said children, their issue and survivors."

This will was recorded January 17, 1893. At her death she left three children, viz.: T. M., Madaline C. and W. C. Ritchie. About twelve months after her death her husband, W. H. S. Ritchie, married again, his second wife being one of the defendants, Leo C. Ritchie. Soon after this marriage W. H. S. Ritchie made a conveyance by which he conveyed to one Prewitt the three smallest tracts of land, viz., the 60 acre, the 25 acre and the $5\frac{1}{4}$ acre tract, for the recited consideration of \$550, \$200 of which was cash and the balance on time. This deed was signed "W. H. S. Ritchie, executor of the will of Sarah J. Ritchie, deceased." On the same day Prewitt conveyed these same three tracts to Leo C. Ritchie for the same recited consideration. About this time W. H. S. Ritchie, who signed as the executor of the will of Sarah J. Ritchie, deceased, conveyed to his wife, Leo C. Ritchie, the 212 acre tract of land for the recited consideration of \$3,000, \$1,600 cash, the balance on time.

About the latter part of the year 1897 this Prewitt became uneasy about being a warrantor in the deed to Leo C. Ritchie and brought an action to have both these transactions set aside, and to be relieved as warrantor in this deed. He alleged and proved that no consideration passed from him to W. H. S. Ritchie, nor from Leo C. Ritchie to him, and that they were both without consideration, and the court granted him the relief he asked for. About this time W. H. S. Ritchie and wife, Leo C., reconveyed to him, as executor and guardian of his children, the 212 acre tract, reciting in the deed that the former deed was a mistake, and that no consideration had passed.

About this same time an action was instituted by T. M. Ritchie, for himself and by him as next friend of his infant brother, W. C. Ritchie, against the estate of Sarah J. Ritchie for the collection of a note for $5,000, alleged to have been executed to them by their mother, by which action they sought to subject the real estate to the payment of their note. In defense this note was alleged to be a forgery. In compromise and settlement of this action it was agreed that T. M. Ritchie should take and receive a conveyance of the 60 and 25 acre tracts of land in full satisfaction of his interest in his mother's real estate which he recieved under the will, and also in satisfaction of his claim in the note sued on, and he in turn was to release to the estate all his claim to the 212 acre and the 5½ acre tracts. The conveyances were executed.

On September 11, 1899, T. M. Ritchie sold and conveyed these two parcels, the 60 acre and the 25 acre tracts, to appellant, Annie G. Thompson, for the price of $2,000, which was all paid before the institution of this action. The counsel for appellant and appellees discuss at length in their briefs whether this contract executed by Leo C. Ritchie to appellees, and which was recorded in 1894, was a contract with reference to personal property or real estate. Under our view of this case we deem it unnecessary to settle this question because if it was a contract pertaining to personal estate, it was not a recordable instrument, and was not notice to any one. If it pertained to an interest in real estate, it did not have any effect to create any lien thereon for the reason that her husband did not join with her in the execution of it, and in addition Leo C. Ritchie did not own the real estate upon which to execute a lien.

Appellees contend that Leo C. Ritchie, under section 2128 of the Kentucky Statutes, had the power to make contracts for the improvement of her real estate without her husband joining in such contracts. If a contract for the setting out of fruit trees upon land is such an improvement of real estate as is contemplated by section 2128 of the statute, which we do not decide, this can not avail the appellee for the reason that Leo C. Ritchie did not own any real estate to improve. It appears from this record that appellees had notice of the fact that these lands belonged to the children of Sarah J. Ritchie before they delivered any fruit trees under their alleged contract with Leo C. Ritchie. It also appears that any reasonable investigation on the part of appellees would have disclosed the fact that these lands belonged to the children of Sarah J. Ritchie, and that these deeds from Ritchie to Prewitt and from Prewitt to Leo C. Ritchie were executed without any consideration, and were void, and did not have the effect to divest the children of their interest in the land.

Appellant's proof shows that she did not have any knowledge or information as to the contract between Leo C. Ritchie and the appellees when she bought and paid for this land; that she paid a fair cash value for it and that she did so without any notice whatever of any legal or equitable claim of appellees against this land or to the fruit from any of the trees thereon. Appellees do not controvert this evidence, but claim that because her vendor, T. M. Ritchie, had knowledge of appellees' claim, that she is bound thereby. In this appellees are mistaken. It is shown that she was an innocent purchaser for value, without any notice of appellees' rights or equities, or without any notice of any fraudulent purpose on the part of her vendor.

For these reasons the judgment of the lower court is reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings consistent herewith.

BUTLER, &c. v. STARK, &c.

(Filed March 2, 1904—Not to be reported.)

The syllabus in the preceding case of Thompson v. Stark, &c. applies to this case as they were heard together, and the facts in both cases are substantially the same.

R. C. Kinkad and Montgomery & Montgomery for appellants.

J. P. O'Meara and L. A. Faurest for appellees.

Appeal from Hardin Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

The appellees brought this action in the lower court against these appellants, together with Annie G. Thompson. Their cause of action is as stated in the opinion this day filed in the case of Annie G. Thompson v. C. M. Stark, &c., ante, 1882. While one action was brought against the appellants in this and in that appeal, Annie G. Thompson made her separate defense, and the case was tried as if there were two actions, and they appealed separately.

The facts in this case are the same as those stated in that opinion except the additional facts as stated herein. When Sarah J. Ritchie bought the 212 acre tract of land from Sophia Wobbe she did not pay all the purchase price, and at her death there was still due about the sum of $1,300.

The Fidelity Trust and Safety Deposit Co., of Louisville, Ky., became the owner of these unpaid notes, and was charging from 7 per cent. to 8 per cent. interest thereon. The Ritchies were hard pressed for money, and Ellen Butler, a sister of W. H. S. Ritchie, purchased these notes from the deposit company, with an agreement with her brother that she would exact only 6 per cent. interest and would give him all the time he wanted, provided he would pay the interest annually. When the trouble arose in the Ritchie family over the presentation of the $5,000 note professed to have been executed by Sarah J. Ritchie to her sons, T. M. and W. C. Ritchie, Ellen Butler was informed that they would no longer pay the interest on her notes. The Butlers then brought suit on their notes and sought to enforce their lien on the land. A judgment was rendered for the sale thereof, and W. D. Butler, as agent for his wife, attended the sale and became the purchaser of the whole of the 212 acres at the price of about $1,450. The land was appraised on that day at the price of $3,800. The proof shows that Sarah J. Ritchie paid more than $3,800 for it, and that it was worth on that day from $5,000 to $7,000. It also appears that when Butler bid the amount of his wife's debt, interest and cost the commissioner did not offer or give an opportunity for any one to take a less number of acres and pay the debt, interest and cost. W. H. S. Ritchie was present at the sale. Soon thereafter he and his sister entered into a written lease, whereby he was to have the land for the term of ten years at the price of $125 per year. It was further stated in substance in the writing that Ritchie should have the privilege of repurchasing the land from his sister by paying her her debt and for any valuable and lasting improvements made on the land by Mrs. Butler.

While on this question we think it proper to say that, from all the facts and surrounding circumstances appearing in the record, we do not believe that Mrs. Butler, by this purchase, intended to deprive her brother, niece and nephews of all their rights and interest in this land, and in good conscience she ought not to be allowed to deprive them of it. In our opinion it was her intention to protect them, rather than deprive them of it. There is a contest as to whether or not the Butlers had notice of the existence of these fruit tree contracts, but under our view of this case we deem that question immaterial, as their lien is not affected in any way by reason of the contract sued on. It appears that at the time the first contract with reference to the fruit trees was executed that the children and devisees of Sarah J. Ritchie were all under the age of twenty-one years. T. M. Ritchie, being the oldest, was about twenty years of age at that time. It appears that Madeline C. and W. C. Ritchie were under age at the time all the contracts with reference to the fruit trees were made, and at that time could not have made a contract themselves with reference to these trees, or give a lien on their land by which they would have been bound, and they are not bound by any attempted contract made by their stepmother, Leo C. Ritchie. Appellees attempt to plead an estoppel as against Madeline C. and W. C. Ritchie, alleging and proving that although under age, they knew of and approved the contract, and aided in setting out the trees on the land. Whatever work they performed was under the direction of their father and stepmother, and they did not say or do anything to induce appellees to enter into these contracts or part with their trees, and the interest of these children was not affected in any way by reason of these contracts. Their father and stepmother and the appellees had no power to make and enter into a contract by which they were to be improved out of their interest in this real estate. The judgment of the lower court, in so far as it affected the interest of Madeline C. Ritchie in this land, was error.

It appears that W. C. Ritchie, the youngest child, is dead. But it does not appear from the record, or at least we have been unable to find from the record the exact date of his death, nor whether he died under the age of twenty-one years or afterward. If he died in infancy his interest in the land would pass, under section 1401 of the Kentucky Statutes, to his brother, T. M., and his sister, Madeline C. Ritchie, in equal portions. If he died after arriving at the age of twenty-one years, his interest in the land would pass, under section 1393 of the Kentucky Statutes, to his father, W. H. S. Ritchie. If W. C. Ritchie died under the age of twenty-one years, his one-half interest in the 212 acre and the 5¼ acre tracts passed in equal portions to T. M. and Madeline C. Ritchie, thereby making T. M. Ritchie own one-fourth of the two tracts. If W. C. Ritchie died after arriving at the age of twenty-one years, then his one-half interest in the two tracts passed to his father. In either state of case the appellees are entitled to enforce their contract upon that part of these two tracts which passed to either the father or the brother. The appellees' plea of estoppel as against them should prevail, for it is shown by the proof that they both, notwithstanding they had full knowledge of all the facts with reference to the title to this land, used all the power they possessed to induce the appellees to enter into these contracts, and they ought not to be allowed to defeat the appellees in their contracts in so far as either of them may have an interest in the land. They induced appellees to believe that the title to this land was in Leo C. Ritchie.

Although T. M. Ritchie began this while under age, yet he continued it until 1897, the date of the last contract.

Appellees, under their contract, have no lien on this land which they can enforce and recover money, but under their contract they have a right to the fruit as stipulated in their contract from that portion of the land owned either by T. M. Ritchie or W. H. S. Ritchie, as their interest may appear, under the facts as to the age of W. C. Ritchie at the date of his death.

For these reasons the judgment of the lower court is reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings consistent herewith.

Whole court sitting.

CARROLL'S ADM'R v. CITY OF LOUISVILLE.

(Filed March 2, 1904.)

1. Damages—Negligence—Peremptory instruction—Where one was riding his horse at a rapid pace along a public street at a railroad crossing when the horse stumbled and fell, throwing him and injuring him to the extent that he soon died, the fact that the crossing was made of improved street construction did not render it of itself unsafe, and it appearing that the deceased met his death by his own negligence, a peremptory instruction to find for the city was proper.

2. Construction of statutes—By the provisions of section 2825, Kentucky Statutes, the board of public works of the city of Louisville has control over the construction of its streets, and it has the power to prescribe a plan for a railroad crossing, and it is the duty of a railway company to conform to such requirement.

3. Evidence—In an action to recover for the death of one who was killed by being thrown from a horse at a crossing of a railroad in a city, where the testimony fails to show any defect in the construction of the crossing, or that, all things considered, it was not the most suitable design at that point, it follows that the accident was not due to defective construction.

Pryor & Sapinsky, Matt O'Doherty and Thos. Walsh for appellant.

Helm, Bruce & Helm and Henry L. Stone for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery Branch, First Division.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

The appellant, who was the plaintiff below, brought this action to recover damages for the death of his intestate which he alleges resulted from the negligence of the appellees, the city of Louisville and the Louisville & Nashville R. R. Co., in the construction of the railroad crossing at the intersection of Third and A streets in the city of Louisville. The allegation of negligence recited in plaintiff's petition is as follows: "On or about April 1, 1901, the defendants arranged the crossing at Third and A streets in the following manner, to wit: That beginning with the extreme northern rail of the track to the extreme southern rail thereof there was placed the entire length of said crossing, running parallel with said tracks, iron or steel rails about three inches apart, and between these rails was placed cement, or some concrete substance; that it was the duty of said defendants, and each of them, to keep said intersection or crossing of said public highway in a reasonably safe condition for the use thereof by the public, but that the manner of said crossing as above set forth, was not reasonably, or at all, safe, but was, on the contrary, highly dangerous, unsafe and insecure; that said rails became, and were at all time, dangerously smooth and slippery, so that a horse stepping thereon would slip and fall; that said dangerous, insecure and unsafe condition of said crossing was well known to the defendants, and each of them, or could have been known to them, and each of them, by the exercise of ordinary care, for such a period of time preceding the happening of the accident hereinafter mentioned to have permitted and allowed said defendants to have remedied same, and make said crossing safe and secure, but that notwithstanding all of the above the said defendants permitted said crossing to remain and continue in said dangerous and unsafe condition; and that on August 8, 1901, plaintiff's decedent, Pat Carroll, while riding horseback over and along Third street, going in a southerly direction, approached said crossing, and while proceeding across same his horse, because of the said dangerous, unsafe and insecure condition of said crossing, and especially the iron or steel rails which composed same, slipped and fell, with the result that said Pat Carroll was thrown violently to the ground, occasioning him such severe injuries that his death occurred therefrom within a few hours thereafter. Plaintiff says that the death of his son was brought and occasioned solely and altogether by the negligence and carelessness on the part of the defendants, and each of them, in the matters aforementioned."

The allegations of negligence were traversed by separate answers, and the contributory negligence of the plaintiff's intestate was relied on. No issue was made as to the description of the construction of the crossing between the rails of the railroad track. Upon these issues the case went to trial, and at the conclusion of the testimony of the plaintiff the circuit court directed a verdict for the defendant. To this ruling of the trial court plaintiff excepted, and a judgment having been rendered on the verdict he has appealed.

It appears from the bill of evidence that two tracks of the Louisville & Nashville R. R. Co., about eight or ten feet apart, occupy A street at its intersection with Third, and have so occupied it for many years; that Third street is paved with asphalt, and is one of the most generally used streets of the city, both for light and heavy hauling; that about the 1st of April, 1901, a little over four months before the accident which resulted in the death of appellant's intestate, the Louisville & Nashville R. R. Co. constructed the crossing across their railroad tracks at the intersection of the two streets in strict conformity with the plan therefor which had been prescribed by the board of public works of the city of Louisville; and that a similar design for railroad crossing had been prescribed and followed by the railroads at many points in the city. The gist of the complaint is that the plan or design of the crossing was imperfect and dangerous. There is no allegation that there had been any substantial change or deterioration in the crossing subsequent to its construction and previous to the accident. During the progress of the trial the plaintiff attempted to show by a witness that the original design of the crossing required that the filler rails should be covered over by cement to the depth of about an inch; and that the defendants had permitted this coat to wear off and to expose the surface of the iron rails,

The defendants objected to the admission of this testimony, on the ground that the alleged negligence charged went only to the design of construction, and not that it had been permitted to become out of repair. This objection was overruled by the trial court on the ground that the plaintiff had a right to so amend his cause of action that the pleadings would conform to the proof. But no such amendment was ever offered, and it is apparent from the general design of the crossing that it would have been practically impossible to have covered the iron rails with a cement coat which would have withstood for any length of time the pressure of heavily loaded wagons passing over it. To show that the design was dangerous, plaintiff introduced a witness who testified that he was a surveyor; that a crossing constructed in the manner of this one presented a smoother surface than a crossing constructed of oak planks; and that horses were more liable to slip upon such a crossing than upon a wooden one. He admitted, however, upon cross-examination, that there was no question that the design of this crossing was more durable and permanent in its character than wooden crossings, and less liable to get out of repair. Several other witnesses, living in the immediate vicinity of the crossing, were permitted over the objection of the defendants to prove that they had seen horses at various times stumble and slip upon this crossing. It does not clearly appear from their testimony when these accidents occurred, but we think it fairly inferable that they were so close in point of time to the accident which resulted in the death of plaintiff's intestate as to make the testimony competent, although there is decided conflict in the authorities as to the competency of this kind of evidence for any purpose except to bring home to the city and railroad company notice of the dangerous character of the crossing. That was immaterial, however. In this case, as it is admitted that the railroad company constructed the crossing under the direction and in accordance with the design prepared by the city, and both were chargeable with knowledge of the plan. It also appears from the testimony that decedent was riding at a very rapid pace on horse back out Third street, about 9:30 o'clock on the night of August 8, 1901, and that while crossing the railroad tracks his horse stumbled or slipped and fell, and that he was thrown to the street, receiving the injuries which caused his death. There is some discrepancy in the testimony as to whether the horse fell while on the track of the railroad or in the street between the two tracks.

While it is the duty of the city to keep its streets in a reasonably safe condition for ordinary travel, a corresponding duty rests on those who legitimately use the streets to avoid being injured. The rule is admirably stated in Dillon on Municipal Corporations, section 1015, as follows: "The liability is not that of a guarantor of the safety of the traveler. The corporate authorities are only bound to use reasonable skill and diligence in making the streets and sidewalks safe and convenient for travel. It is under no obligation to provide for everything that may happen upon them, but only for such things as ordinarily exist, or such as may be reasonably expected to occur."

Section 2825 of the Kentucky Statutes, which is a provision of the charter of the city of Louisville, vests in the board of public works exclusive control over the construction of its streets. They had the right, and it was their duty, to prescribe a plan for the crossing of railroad tracks at the intersection of the public streets of the city, and it was the duty of the railway company to conform to such requirements in this respect as the board of public works might prescribe. It is difficult for the most competent engineers to devise a plan for such a crossing that will meet the requirements of safety, durability and convenience. In passing upon the liability of a city growing out of an alleged defective design or plan of construction, this court, in Teager v. City of Flemingsburg, 32 Ky. Law Rep., 1443, used this language: "It is argued for the city in this case that the plan of street improvements is one within the discretion of the council, and not to be interfered with by the courts. Some authority is cited from other States supporting this contention, but we rather incline to the view that while the city governing body may exercise its discretion in the selection of a plan of street improvement, if the plan adopted is one palpably unsafe to travelers, the city would be liable. But when the plan is one that many prudent men might approve, or where it would be so doubtful upon the facts whether the street, as planned or ordered by the city governing board, was dangerous or unsafe or not, that different minds might entertain different opinions with respect thereto, the benefit of the doubt should be given the city, and it should not be held liable."

While there is testimony that a horse is more likely to slip upon a crossing of the character complained of than a wooden one, the testimony fails to show any defect in its construction, or that it was not, all things being considered, of the best and most suitable design at that point. Undoubtedly horses are more liable to slip on asphalt than on macadam streets, and more liable to slip upon macadam than upon the ordinary country dirt road, but this is no ground or reason for the condemnation of asphalt streets. The necessities of modern city life require, next to safety, permanence and durability in the construction of the streets and crossings. The testimony in this case conduces to show that the unfortunate accident which resulted in the death of plaintiff's intestate was attributable to the rapid and negligent rate at which he was traveling when he attempted to pass the railroad crossing, rather than any defect in the crossing itself. It, therefore, follows, in the absence of testimony conducing to show that the accident complained of was attributable to the defective construction of the crossing, that the peremptory instruction should have gone.

Judgment affirmed.

NALL v. COULTER, AUDITOR.

(Filed March 2, 1904.)

1. Office and officer—Salary—Where one was elected to an office, as shown by the face of the returns, assumed the duties of the office, and received the salary until he was ousted in a contest proceeding, the remedy in an action by the one who was adjudged to be the duly elected officer for the recovery of salary paid the wrongful holder lies against such wrongful holder and not against the State.

2. Same—Where one assumed the duties of an office upon receiving a certificate of election from the canvassing board, he can not be said to be a mere intruder while a contest is pending, and the auditor who paid his salary had the right to believe that he was the legal officer until he was ousted by the contest proceeding, and it was not required of the auditor before paying the salary to go behind the claimant's commission and investigate his title to the office and right to the salary.

Hazelrigg, Chenault & Hazelrigg for appellant.

N. B. Hays for appellee.

Appeal from Franklin Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

In the election of State officers in the month of November, 1889, the appellant, Nall, was a candidate for the office of commissioner of agriculture, one Throckmorton being the opposing candidate.

On the face of the returns Throckmorton was declared elected by the canvassing board, a board duly created by and under the laws of the Commonwealth, whose duty it was to count the vote and determine for whom the greater number of votes were cast. It was not the duty of this board to pass upon the legality of the votes cast.

On January 1, 1900, Throckmorton took the oath of office and entered upon the duties thereof. But after the canvassing board had declared Throckmorton duly elected on the face of the returns, the appellant, Nall, instituted a contest, claiming that because of irregular acts done, whereby the votes counted for Throckmorton were procured, and by reason of illegal votes cast at the election, he was entitled to the office. The contest board decided that Nall was the person elected. Upon this finding Nall instituted a proceeding to oust Throckmorton, who refused to give up the office. After this court decided that Nall was entitled to the office, Throckmorton vacated, and appellant entered and assumed the duties of the office.

It appears that the then auditor, Sweeney, paid Throckmorton his salary for the months of January and February. The present suit was brought by appellant against Auditor Coulter to compel him to issue his warrant on the treasurer of the Commonwealth for the sum of $383.25, the amount of the salary due him from the 1st day of January to the 25th of February, 1900, the date when the contest board declared appellant entitled to the office. In other words, appellant claims that by reason of his being entitled to the office on the 25th of February that he is entitled to the salary due from the State, beginning January 1, 1900. The appellee claims that the State paid this salary to Throckmorton, who was in the office attending to the duties thereof, and who had been duly declared elected by the board of election commissioners, and held the apparent legal title to the office; that if the appellant is entitled to this salary, he must look to Throckmorton for it, who received it, and contested with him the right to the office.

We are of the opinion that appellee's contention is the correct one. We have not been referred to, nor have we been able to find, any case decided by this court directly in point, but the courts of many States, as well as the English courts, have passed upon the question. The decided weight of authority, both in numbers and reason, uphold the principles contended for by appellee. We have been referred to many cases apparently holding the opposite rule, but upon a close examination of them it appears that many are not in conflict; some few of them apply to usurpers, having no color of right or title to the office; some few have reference to cases where the appointment or election of the person who held the office and performed its duties was void. The cases of Caufield v. Auditor, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 1641, Gorley v. City of Louisville, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 1606, also same case reported on first appeal, 20 Ky. Law Rep., 602, are cited by appellant.

The right of Caufield to compel the auditor to issue to him a warrant for his salary as clerk of the penitentiary was upon the idea that his removal from office by the acts of the State's officials was a nullity. This precise principle was involved in the Gorley case, supra. In these cases the State and city officials professing to act for and on account of the State and city, committed illegal and void acts in the removal of Caufield and Gorley. At least it appears that it was upon these principles that they might be permitted to recover their salaries from the State and city. The case at bar is different. Throckmorton was at least a de facto officer, and not an usurper, and it is not charged that the State board of canvassers committed any illegal or void act with reference to granting Throckmorton a certificate.

In 2d edition, Am. and Eng. Ency. of Law, volume 8, 783, it is said: "To constitute a person an officer de facto there must be some facts, circumstances or conditions which would reasonably lead persons who have relations or business with the office to recognize and treat him as the lawful incumbent, and submit to or invoke his official action without inquiry as to his title."

Again, on page 794: "Color of title to an office is defined to be 'that which in appearance is title, but which in reality is no title.' It is this color of title, or, it has been said, color of authority, which distinguishes the de facto officer from a mere intruder or usurper, whose acts are absolutely void."

It can not be said that Throckmorton was a mere intruder or usurper, but, on the contrary, he assumed the duties of the office with the legal certificate of the board of canvassers, and so remained in office until February 25, 1900, when the board of contest declared appellant elected and entitled to the office. The then auditor, Sweeney, had the right to believe that Throckmorton was then the legal officer. Upon what principle of reasoning can it be required of the auditor to investigate and determine at his peril whether or not a person has been legally elected to an office before he draws his warrant upon the treasurer for his salary? To require the auditor to pay at his peril, or withhold salaries until all contests were finally settled, would in many cases leave the State without officials to perform its service. In the same volume of the Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, page 813, it is said: "The general rule is that a State, county or municipality which, before judgment of ouster against a de facto officer, has paid him the salary of the office due at the time of payment, is protected against any liability to the de jure officer for such salary."

In the case of Dolan v. New York, 63 N. Y., 274, the court said: "If fiscal officers, upon whom the duty is imposed to pay official salaries, are only justified in paying them to the officer de jure, they must act at the peril of being held accountable in case it turns out that the de facto officer has not the true title; or, if they are not made responsible, the department of the government they represent is exposed to the danger of being compelled to pay the salary a second time. It would be unreasonable, we think, to require them, before making payment, to go behind the commission and investigate and ascertain the real right and title. This, in many cases, as we have said, would be impracticable. Disbursing officers, charged with the payment of salaries, have, we think, a right to rely upon the apparent title, and treat the officer who is clothed with it as the officer de jure, without inquiring whether another has the better right. Public policy accords with this view. Public offices are created in the interest and for the benefit of the public; such, at least, is the theory upon which statutes creating them are enacted and justified. Public and individual rights are, to a great extent, protected and enforced through official agencies, and the State and individual citizens are interested in having official functions regularly and continuously discharged. The services of persons clothed with an official character are constantly needed. They are called upon to execute the processes of the court and to perform a great variety of acts affecting the public and individuals. It is important that the public offices should be filled, and that at all times persons may be found ready and competent to exercise official powers and duties. If, on a controversy arising as to the right of an officer in possession, and upon notice that another claims the office, the public authorities could not pay the salary and compensation of the office to the de facto officer, except at the peril of paying it a second time if the title of the contestant should subsequently be established, it is easy to see that the public service would be greatly embarrassed, and its efficiency impaired. Disbursing officers would not pay the salary until the contest was determined, and this, in many cases, would interfere with the discharge of official functions."

A case very similar to the one before us is found in 82 La., 1097, Michel v. The City of New Orleans. The court in that case said: "Sound public policy dictates the wisdom and the necessity of paying the salary of the officer in the possession of the office and performing functions required for the protection of society and the maintenance of peace and order, and after this duty is performed both law and equity forbid that the city or State be compelled to account for the same salary to any other party who may subsequently be decreed as the proper officer. * * * We are clear that under our laws the right of a de jure officer in such a case must be exercised against the intruder for the recovery of fees or of the salary of the office, and no recourse exists against the State or city for such salary as was paid to the de facto officer."

The case of Anderson v. County Commissioners, &c., 20 Kan., 298, was a case which arose over a contest for the county clerk's office. Anderson and one Wildman were opposing candidates. The board of canvassers gave Anderson a certificate of election, and he took the oath and possession of the office. Wildman contested his election. The contest court decided in favor of Wildman, awarding to him the certificate previously issued to Anderson. Wildman immediately qualified, and took possession of the office. Anderson then took the case to the district court on appeal and that court reversed the judgment of the contest court, and awarded the office to Anderson. Wildman then appealed to the Supreme Court, and that court affirmed the district court. Wildman in the meantime held the office, received the salary and fees from January to October. The county commissioners had, during all this time, full knowledge of all this proceeding, but, nevertheless, paid the salary to Wildman. Anderson sued the board of county commissioners for $900, the amount of salary they paid Wildman for the time he held the office while the contest was proceeding in the courts. In that case the court said: "It must be remembered that Wildman was not a mere usurper; but he was an officer de facto, having possession of the office under color of title. What would be the rule if he were a mere usurper, it is not necessary for us to decide in this case. All that we now decide is, that where a person is in possession of the office of county clerk, under color of title, and is the county clerk de facto, and claims to be the county clerk de jure, and the board of county commissioners pays to him the salary due to the right incumbent of such office, the county clerk de jure has no action against the county board for such salary, and this, notwithstanding the fact the county board may have known at the time they paid said salary that the question as to the title to the office was in litigation, and notwithstanding the fact that the county clerk de facto may be insolvent. The remedy of the county clerk de jure in such a case is an action against the county clerk de facto." To the same effect are the cases of Benoit v. Auditors of Wayne County, 20 Mich., 176, 37 N. Y., 518, and other cases which we deem it unnecessary to cite.

Appellant claims that he is protected by section 235 of the State Constitution. This section is as follows: "The salaries of public officers shall not be changed during the terms for which they were elected; but it shall be the duty of the general assembly to regulate, by a general law, in what cases and what deductions shall be made for neglect of official duties."

He contends that if he be not allowed the whole salary for the full term of four years, that this would be a deduction from his salary in the meaning of this provision of the Constitution, and a violation of this provision of the Constitution. In our opinion this section of the Constitution has no application to a case like this. This is not an effort to decrease or change his salary, nor make any deduction therefrom for any neglect of official duty. The appellant had the right to sue the party who litigated with him for this office and recover that part of the salary paid him while in the possession of the office. But it is suggested that in some instances contestants for office are insolvent, and then the officer would lose a part of his salary unless the injured party was permitted to recover from the State, county or municipality. This would be unfortunate, but many persons have suffered loss of claims and costs by being forced to engage in litigation with insolvent persons.

It is also contended "that the State by its officers and agents wrongfully prevented appellant from discharging the duties of his office for a time, and that the State can not now be heard to say that appellant, during that time, neglected his official duty, and, therefore, must not be paid." We do not decide that appellant is not entitled to his salary, or that he was guilty of any neglect of official duty, but conclude that his remedy is against the person who received a part of his salary. It is true that the board of canvassers, board of contest, circuit judge who tried the case, and the Court of Appeals, were officers and agents created by the State, but the creation of them was for the purpose of guarding and protecting the rights and interests of the State and individual. We can not admit that the State should be held responsible for the mistakes or errors of judgment of its officials. To carry such a construction to its logical conclusion would involve the State and make it liable for all losses incurred by the litigant by reason of the errors or mistakes of its officials.

For these reasons the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

PRATT v. COULTER, AUDITOR.

(Filed March 2, 1904—Not to be reported.)

M. C. & G. D. Givens and McKenzie Todd for appellant.

N. B. Hays for appellee.

Appeal from Franklin Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

In the year 1899 the appellant, C. J. Pratt, and one R. J. Breckinridge were opposing candidates for the office of attorney general.

The State Board of Election Commissioners awarded the certificate of election to C. J. Pratt. Breckinridge at once entered into a contest for the office. The board of contest decided that Breckinridge was entitled to the certificate. The circuit court of Franklin county affirmed the action of the board of contest, and Pratt, under protest, surrendered the office to Breckinridge, who assumed the duties of the office. Thus matters stood without a supersedeas or appeal for about a year, when Pratt appealed from the decision of the circuit court to the Court of Appeals, which reversed the circuit court and adjudged that appellant Pratt was entitled to the office. Breckinridge surrendered the office to Pratt, who assumed the duties of the same. Appellant brought this action to require the auditor to issue a warrant upon the treasurer for the amount of his salary from the time Breckinridge went into the office, under the judgment of the circuit court, to the time he was ousted by the Court of Appeals.

It is admitted that the State paid Breckinridge the salary during this time. We are of the opinion that the opinion in the case of Nall v. Coulter, Auditor, ante, 1891, this day filed, applies to the facts in this case, and for the reason therein given the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

BROWN v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed March 2, 1904.)

Criminal law—Instructions—In a prosecution for murder, where the evidence is circumstantial, it is the duty of the court to instruct the jury upon voluntary manslaughter and self-defense, and a failure to so instruct is an error prejudicial to the substantial rights of the accused.

Ford & Ford for appellant.

N. B. Hays and Loraine Mix for appellee.

Appeal from Scott Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

This case was before this court on a former appeal, and was reversed because there was not anything with which to connect the accused with the death of Lair, nor was there evidence that Lair came to his death as the result of violence on the part of any one. (See opinion for history of the case in 24 Ky. Law Rep., 737.)

On the return of the case to the lower court another trial was had, and resulted in appellant's conviction and a life sentence was imposed, and the case is here again on appeal. It appears from this record that the Commonwealth on the last trial strengthened its evidence to some extent. We can not say that there was no evidence to sustain a conviction. The record shows that there was not a witness who professed to be an eye-witness to the homicide or any part of the transaction by which Lair lost his life. Under this state of case the lower court only gave to the jury two instructions, one in proper form, on the question of murder, the other on reasonable doubt. The court did not give, nor was it requested to give, instructions on the question on voluntary manslaughter and self-defense. This, under the law as it exists, as decided by this court, was an error prejudicial to the substantial rights of the appellant.

In the case of Buckles v. Commonwealth, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 572, after discussing the question as to whether there is such a substantial difference between error in giving or failing to give the law of the case in instructions and error in what may be called the practice of the case, in admitting or rejecting testimony and the like, as would justify this court in taking cognizance of an error in the one case, though not excepted to when this court would refuse it in the other, the court said: "But when we come to the question on instruction a different rule obtains. The trial court is required without request to give the law, the correct law, and the whole law of the case. It is not necessary to call the judge's attention to an error; the law requires his attention. It is not only necessary to specify the error which he has committed, but it is not required that he be requested to give all the law of the case."

This court has decided in at least three cases that when the evidence of the homicide is entirely circumstantial, the whole law applicable to any state of case that might have existed should be given. In the case at bar the whole of the evidence produced against appellant was entirely circumstantial. He testified that he did not take the life of Lair, nor did he have any knowledge nor information as to how, or by what means, he lost his life. If appellant committed the homicide, either by murder, voluntary manslaughter or in self-defense, and as there was no person present and saw the act, he may have concluded the best thing for his safety and preservation was to deny all knowledge of the transaction. In such state of case, if his crime, in fact, had only been manslaughter, yet under the instructions given he must be hung or confined in the penitentiary for life, not because he was guilty of murder, but for the reason he told a falsehood, when he denied any part in or knowledge of the homicide.

In McDowell v. Commonwealth, 4 Ky. Law Rep., 354, opinion by Judge Hines, the court said: "In cases depending entirely upon circumstantial evidence it is the duty of the court to give the whole law applicable to any state of case that might have existed."

In the case of Rutherford v. Commonwealth, 18 Bush, 608, the court said: "When no witness introduced on the trial saw the homicide committed, or saw the parties after they met on the occasion when the killing occurred, the law applicable to murder, manslaughter and self-defense should be given. In order to meet any state of fact the jury may find from the circumstances in evidence to have existed."

In the case of Justice v. Commonwealth, 20 Ky. Law Rep., 390, the court said: "While it was the duty of the court to give the whole law of the case, this does not extend to giving the law of apparent necessity, unless there was some proof of that fact, or an entire absence of proof as to how death was produced and only circumstantial evidence relied on to show the cause. But this court has repeatedly held that if there be an eyewitness to the homicide the case is taken outside of circumstantial evidence, and the court is relieved from giving instructions as to all degrees of homicide and self-defense, but will only give those warranted by the proof." (Section 993 of Roberson's work on Criminal Law.)

For these reasons the judgment of the lower court is reversed and cause remanded for proceedings consistent herewith.

CITY OF LEXINGTON V. CROSTHWAIT.

(Filed March 2, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Street improvements—Limitation—In an action involving the right of a city to collect the cost of street improvements from abutting property, done in 1892 under an act adopting the ten-year plan of payment, the action to enforce the lien having been brought in 1901, the plea of limitation is good as a bar to it. The city could not enlarge the liability of the lot owner by extending the time of payment without his consent, and an attempt to do so was void.

Allen & Duncan for appellant.

Forman & Forman for appellee.

Appeal from Fayette Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

This action involves the right of appellant city of Lexington to collect the cost of a certain street improvement from an abutting property on South Broadway street, done in 1892. The work was done, not under the present statute, but under the act of April 19, 1890. There is a material difference between the two statutes. By the 3d section of the act of April 19, 1890, when such an improvement was properly ordered, its cost was to be borne two-thirds by the owner of the abutting property and one-third by the city, unless, upon request of the property holder, the ten-year plan was adopted.

In the latter event the property holder paid the whole of the cost of improvement in ten equal installments, for which the city issued its bonds, the interest upon which was paid by the city. In this case there was not a request by the abutting property holder to the city to permit the adoption of the ten-year plan of payment, notwithstanding the city did adopt that plan and issued installment warrants against the property accordingly. This suit brought in 1901 seeks to enforce the lien for the several years' installments which had accrued, some owing to the city and others claimed to have been sold by the city to appellant, Irvine H. Forbing, appellee interposed, among other defenses, the plea of limitation. Having concluded that that plea is good as a bar to the suit, we do not find it necessary to pass upon the other defenses presented. Unless the property owner requested the city to extend the ten-year credit and to issue its bonds for the cost of the improvement, the statute of 1890 made two-thirds of the cost, and no more, a charge against the abutting property, and made it due when the work was completed and accepted. The right to enforce the payment then accrued to the contractor.

The city could not, without the request of the lot owner, enlarge his liability by increasing it and extending the time of its payment for ten years. Its action in attempting to do so in this case was void. The liability to pay for street improvements is one created by statute, and is barred unless enforced within five years from its accrual. (Section 2515, Kentucky Statutes.) The act of 1890 provided for the collection of the assessments by distraint. There was no provision for an action. The present statute, the act of March 19, 1894, allows suit to enforce the liens. The limitation applies alike to both remedies. (L. & J. Ferry Co. v. Commonwealth, 22 Ky. Law Rep., 480; Chicago, & Co., Ry. Co. v. Commonwealth, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 2124; Commonwealth v. Nute, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 2188; Kirwin v. Nevin, 28 Ky. Law Rep., 947; Gleason v. Stone Co., 23 Ky. Law Rep., 1740; Stengel v. Preston, 80 Ky., 816.)

The judgment of the circuit court dismissing the petition of appellant, Forbing and the cross petition of the appellant, city of Lexington, is affirmed.

ILLINOIS CENTRAL R. R. CO. v. HIBBS.

(Filed March 2, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Railroads—Construction of statutes—A railroad company incorporated under the laws of a foreign State, by complying with section 841, Kentucky Statutes, does not become a domestic corporation so as to prevent it from having the right to remove a cause to the Federal court.

Robbins & Thomas, J. M. Dickinson, J. E. Budgewater and Pirtle & Traub for appellant.

J. M. Nichols & Son for appellee.

Appeal from Carlisle Circuit Court.

By this action in the Carlisle Circuit Court appellee sought to recover of the appellant $10,000 in damages for personal injuries sustained by collision with one of its trains, resulting from the alleged negligence of those in charge of the train. The answer denied the negligence complained of, and in the usual form averred that the injuries received by the appellee were caused by his contributory negligence. The trial resulted in a verdict for appellee for $1,600. At the appearance term of the court, and before answering the petition, appellant filed a petition in due form, accompanied by an approved bond, and entered motion to transfer the cause to the circuit court of the United States for the Western District of Kentucky, which petition and motion were overruled and refused by the lower court, to which the appellant excepted and the case is now before this court by appeal. It is insisted that the lower court erred in refusing appellant a new trial, and also in overruling the petition and motion for the transfer of the cause to the Federal court. If the last contention is sustained the consideration of the other questions raised by the appeal will be unnecessary.

The grounds upon which the motion to transfer was overruled were the same upon which this court in an opinion by Judge White, in Davis' Adm'r v. C. & O. R. R. Co., 24 Ky. Law Rep., 1125, decided that when a foreign railroad company, such as the appellant, had complied with section 841, Kentucky Statutes, such compliance, ipso facto, made it a domestic corporation, and it could not, therefore, remove a cause from a State to a Federal court on the ground of diverse citizenship. We are of opinion, however, that the action of the lower court in refusing to transfer this case to the Federal court can not be justified on the grounds upon which Judge White bottomed his opinion in the case supra, for when the petition of appellant was filed and its motion to transfer the case was entered, there was nothing in the record showing that it had complied with section 841 of the Statutes, thereby placing itself upon the footing of a domestic corporation, hence the motion for removal should have been sustained notwithstanding the opinion in the Davis case supra. But since the decision of the Davis case the petition for a rehearing therein, which was pending at the time appellant's motion for a transfer of the case at bar was overruled by the lower court, was sustained by this court and the former opinion withdrawn, and in lieu thereof it was held by this court, in an opinion by Judge Paynter, that a railroad company incorporated under the laws of a foreign State did not, because of a compliance with section 841, Kentucky Statutes, become a domestic corporation so as to prevent it from having the right to remove a cause to the Federal court. (Davis' Adm'r v. C. & O. R. R. Co., 25 Ky. Law Rep., 342.)

The doctrine announced in the last opinion in the case of Davis' Adm'r v. C. & O. R. R. Co., 25 Ky. Law Rep., 342, has since been reaffirmed by this court in Swice's Adm'r v. Maysville & Big Sandy R. R. Co., 25 Ky. Law Rep., 436.

The lower court erred, therefore, in overruling appellant's petition and motion for the transfer. Wherefore, the judgment is reversed and cause remanded, with directions to the lower court to set aside the verdict and judgment and grant appellant a new trial, and to sustain its motion to transfer the case to the Federal court, to the end that such new trial may take place there.

BARDSTOWN & LOUISVILLE TURNPIKE CO. v. NELSON COUNTY.

(Filed February 19, 1904.)

1. Turnpike—Purchase by county—Consideration of contract—Burden of proof—Where a turnpike company suing a county on a contract for the purchase of its road, alleges as a consideration of the agreement the transfer of the road to the county a plea of "no consideration," merely raises an issue as to the validity of the vote under which the county contracted, but does not inject an issue of fact, or shift from the plaintiff the burden proving a consideration.

2. Payment of indebtedness—Bond issue—Effect of sale—The law requiring a two-thirds majority of the votes cast upon a proposition to incur an indebtedness and issue bonds to pay the purchase price of the turnpike bought by the county, the proposition to buy the road received 1,370 affirmative votes to 563 negative; the proposition for a bond issue submitted at the same time received 826 votes for and 612 against it. Held—That this was authority for the county to incur an indebtedness for the purchase of the road, but was not authority to issue and sell bonds therefor.

3. Conditional proposition—Acceptance—Where the turnpike company conditionally accepted a written proposition submitted by the fiscal court to purchase its road, but which conditions the county rejected and thereupon the company turned the road over to the county under the original proposition, there was an acceptance by the county of the proposition.

4. Abandonment—A county having contracted with the turnpike company for the purchase of its road and appointed commissioners in condemnation proceedings to fix its value pursuant to the statute, and thereafter the county dismissed the proceedings, did not constitute an abandonment of the road by the company, although more than four months had elapsed since it was turned over to the county.

5. Fiscal court—Jurisdiction—A county fiscal court had no jurisdiction to try a litigated question as to whether a turnpike company had abandoned its road, and its judgment that it had done so was void.

6. Valuation of road—Admissibility of evidence—Under the law the company could not sell its road to any one but the county, and it having no market value, by reason of the action of the "raiders" in destroying the toll-gates and terrorizing the gatekeepers, it was the duty of the commissioners appointed under the statute to require the owners to produce books and other evidence showing receipts and expenditures on the portion sold, and the amount of net earnings for each year for six years, and to hear any other evidence conducing to show the value of the property and to award the "actual value" of the property taken.

7. Market value of road and stock—Neither the market value of the road or of the stock can be considered in the sale of a turnpike road to a county which, by law, is made the exclusive purchaser.

8. Instructions—In an action by a turnpike company against a county on its agreement to purchase the company's road, it appearing that for at least six years the company had paid six per cent. dividends on its stock; that the right of way was sixty feet wide, the grade twenty or twenty-two feet wide; metal about twenty feet wide, macadamized and covered with broken rock and gravel from four to six inches; connected with the largest city in the State and passing through a rich agricultural community, enterprising towns and villages, and costing over $200,000, it was error to give instructions permitting the jury to find that it had no value.

Appeal from Nelson Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

Nelson county, by vote in 1897, adopted the provisions of the statute known as the "Free Turnpike Act" (section 4748b, Kentucky Statutes). In the following March the owners of the Bardstown and Louisville Turnpike road and Nelson county, the latter acting through its fiscal court, entered into a contract by which the county was to acquire that part of appellant's road in Nelson county, about thirteen miles, and fixing the compensation to be paid by the county for the use of the road pending the fixing of its value by commissioners or a jury, according to the provisions of the statute. The county was permitted to and did take charge of the road under that contract, and has continuously since used and maintained it as a public road by virtue of that agreement. On a former appeal (109 Ky., 800) it was held that the contract in question amounted to an agreement by the turnpike company to sell, and by the fiscal court to buy, the road; that the price was left to be determined in the condemnation proceedings which had been instituted by the county; and that for the use of the road until the price was thus fixed the county was to pay the turnpike company a sum equal to 6 per cent. per annum on the amount finally fixed as the value and price of the road. Instead of prosecuting the condemnation proceeding already instituted under the statute, and which, as was held on the last appeal, was the one the parties had in contemplation in entering into the contract, the county abandoned it. The commissioners had, by their report, fixed the value of the road at $18,356. The condemnation proceeding was dismissed before the commissioners' report was acted on. The county claimed that the statute subsection 15 of section 4748b expressly provided that the county might, by paying the expenses incurred, abandon the condemnation proceedings begun by it. While that is true, it does not at all follow that the county could abandon the contract made by it with the road owner. On the former appeal it was held that under the statute the county could acquire the turnpike road by contract, lease, purchase or by condemnation, and that the paper exhibited in that suit was both a contract for purchase and lease. By it the county agreed, so it was held, to pay for the road as purchase price the sum to be fixed in the pending condemnation proceeding; and as the county had wrongfully abandoned and dismissed that condemnation proceeding, an action would lie to recover the value of the road at the time it was taken under the contract; that such was the implied undertaking of that agreement. All the foregoing matters were settled on the former appeal between these two litigants. In this action to recover the value of the road the county has attempted to relitigate those questions. But that can not be done. They are res adjudicata. In addition the county pleads as a defense that the contract attempted to be made between it and the road company was void because ultra vires. There was also a plea that the road had been abandoned by the company for more than six months, and had been taken charge of by the county on that account. There was also a plea of no consideration made by the county.

A trial before a jury in the circuit court resulted in a verdict fixing the value of the road as of the date when taken by the county at $5,000. This appeal by the road company raises the correctness of the jury's verdict, and of the instructions given the jury by the trial court, as well as its rulings in admitting and rejecting evidence. Inasmuch as appellant's petition sets out the consideration of the agreement sued on, to wit, the transfer of the thirteen miles of road to the county by the company, the plea of no consideration simply raises the validity of the vote under which the contract was entered into. As those matters were fully set forth in the petition, their sufficiency was as well presented by the demurrer to the petition as by the plea of no consideration. Under the pleadings, as formed, this plea was really only the pleader's conclusion of the legal effect of the contract, under appellee's version of the vote by which it was authorized. It neither shifted the burden or proof not presented an issue of fact in the case. (Chaplin and Bloomfield T. P. Co. v. Nelson County, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 1154.)

Every writing evidencing an indebtedness imports a consideration under our statute. (Section 470, Kentucky Statutes; Andrews v. Haydon, 88 Kentucky, 455.) A petition upon such writing, where the consideration is not named in it, need not aver the consideration. If the defendant plead no consideration, he would have the burden of proof. But where the writing states its consideration and the petition also declares upon it, if denied, the burden of proving it is upon the plaintiff; and that is so whether the form of the denial is a traverse or an affirmative denial. The trial court should have awarded the burden in this case to appellant.

When the proposition was submitted to the voters of Nelson county whether they would adopt free turnpike and gravel roads, there was also submitted the question whether they were in favor of issuing bonds to pay for the roads. The first proposition received 1,370 votes in the affirmative, and 563 against it. But on the second proposition there were cast only 826 votes in favor of it, and 612 against it. From this it is argued that no authority was given to incur an indebtedness to be paid out of the revenues of future years; that section 157 of the Constitution prohibits the incurring of a liability by a county beyond the revenues of the year in which it is incurred, unless the proposition is submitted to a vote of the people of the county, and receives in its favor two-thirds of the votes cast on that question.

When the voters of Nelson county, by 1,370 votes to 563, voted to acquire the turnpike roads, that necessarily involved the incurring of such indebtedness as might be required to pay for them. Merely voting for free turnpikes could not make them free. The voters must have known that they would have to pay for the roads; and their value was such that that could not possibly be done out of the revenues of any one year. The vote in favor of free turnpikes would be meaningless unless it was construed to mean that if it prevailed by the constitutional majority, the necessary indebtedness was also provided for, in order to carry the vote into effect; that is the precise point decided in Whaley v. Commonwealth, For Use, &c., 110 Ky., 154, 28 Ky. Law Rep., 1292.

But in this case there is this additional fact, not in the Whaley case: The bond question was also submitted at the same time, and failed of the two-thirds majority required by subsection 9 of section 474b, Kentucky Statutes. This can not mean, though, that 612 votes could annul 1,370 votes in favor of acquiring all the roads at once. Assuming that these voters knew the effect of their action, and intended it, the situation is this: By more than the constitutional majority the voters of the county decided to acquire all the turnpike roads in the county and to make them free to all travel; and they, by virtue of that majority, invested the fiscal court with the power to incur an indebtedness beyond the revenues of the current year in order to carry the will of the voters into effect. But, at the same time, the voters refused to issue and sell bonds on the public market to meet the indebtedness. They seemed to prefer that the county should arrange to carry this debt by its notes, or contracts, and not by bonds. A vote to incur an indebtedness and a vote to issue and sell bonds to meet it are not necessarily the same thing. We are of opinion that the county was authorized by the vote to incur the indebtedness; but it could not issue and sell bonds on the market as provided in subsection 9 of the statute. (Section 4748b.)

Counsel for appellee cite the case of Maysville and Lexington, &c., Co. v. Wiggins, 20 Ky. Law Rep., 727, as sustaining a contrary doctrine. But the fact is overlooked that that case is discredited on that point, and declared not to be authority in Whaley v. Commonwealth, supra. The proposition submitted to the turnpike company by the fiscal court, which was in writing, was accepted by the company, but it added certain conditions to its acceptance. The county by a written order rejected the conditions. It is now argued that a proposition can not be accepted conditionally, so as to impose them upon the other party, and that such an acceptance is no acceptance. Admitting this to be so, yet in this matter when the county rejected the conditions imposed by the company, the latter turned over to the county the possession of the road under the original proposition, which was an abandonment of the condition which it had sought to impose, and left the original proposition accepted without other conditions than were contained in it.

Section 4732, Kentucky Statutes, provides: "When any turnpike company abandons its road and ceases to charge toll thereon it shall be the duty of the fiscal court in the county in which any such road lies to take charge and control of same, and keep it in a safe and proper condition for public travel, and alter or discontinue same as other public roads. The failure on the part of any turnpike company for the period of four months to keep its road in a condition safe for public travel, and their failure to charge toll thereon for such length of time, shall be deemed and held to be an abandonment within the meaning of this section."

After the execution of the contract first named, and after the commissioners appointed in the proceeding to condemn appellant's road as a free turnpike had reported, but before the report was acted on, the fiscal court decided to abandon the proceeding under section 15 of the act. (Section 4748b.) It therefore, dismissed the condemnation proceedings in the county court. It had been more than four months since the turnpike company had turned over the road to the county, and had failed to collect tolls on it, and had likewise during that time failed to keep the road in repair. Assuming that the county's contract with the road company was not binding, and indeed had not been accepted for the reasons above stated, the fiscal court caused a notice to be served upon the road company to show cause before that court on a day named why the fiscal court should not take charge of the turnpike in question as an abandoned turnpike under section 4732 of the Statutes above quoted. The company resisted the motion, but the fiscal court adjudged its defense insufficient and declared and adjudged the road an abandoned road, and ordered it to be taken in charge and kept up as a county road. The turnpike company prayed and was granted an appeal to the circuit court from that judgment, but never prosecuted it. Now the county pleads that proceeding in bar of this action as an estoppel by judgment. This seems to be the principal contention made in the brief for appellee. We are of opinion that the matter is not a good estoppel. In the first place, there was no abandonment by the turnpike company in any sense of the word, and in the next place, if there was a question about that, the fiscal court was utterly without jurisdiction to try the title to the property, or to adjudge an abandonment or forfeiture. The Constitution does not define the jurisdiction of the fiscal courts. But section 1840 of the Statutes does. In no event is it authorized to try any litigated question, or to adjudge the rights to property. Its attempted proceeding was a nullity. Its judgment was void.

On the trial of the case a number of witnesses introduced by the county testified that, in their opinion, the road was valueless. On cross-examination they gave as their reason for this that tollgate raiders, a species of felons who in the night time went armed and in bands, destroying the tollgates and terrorizing the gatekeepers, had by their action made the property so undesirable as a marketable property that it could not be sold, therefore, they thought it had no market value. Again, some thought as the people of the county had voted for free turnpikes, that meant that all toll roads must be relinquished, and that destroyed their future value. Others yet suggested that the effect of these matters, and of the free turnpike sentiment, took away all market value from the stock of the turnpike companies; that investors would no longer buy it. The only value of that class of evidence was to show that the witnesses giving it were utterly incompetent to judge of the matter about which they were attempting to testify, the actual value of the turnpike road. It was the duty of the county to have protected the gates and property of the road company from the depredations of the marauders. If it failed to do it, and if their strength overcame that of the owners temporarily, that fact should not, and in law does not, detract in the least from the actual value of the properties in the condemnation proceedings by the county, nor has the market value of the road anything to do with the question. There was no market value, and from the very nature of things could not be. Under the law the road company could not sell its road at all except to the county. There was but one purchaser in existence. Manifestly, then, the criterion of a market value could have no application. Where a commodity or species of property can be sold, and there is a market for it, with opportunity for any number of bidders, and where such sales are made, it is thought that condition affords the best test of value, because by reason of the competitive bidding in a free and open market, the value so established is most likely to be the actual value of the thing. Nor did the market value of the stock enter into the question. The stock wasn't being condemned. The company may have been overcapitalized, or may have paid unnecessarily large salaries to useless officers, all of which would have affected the market value of this stock, yet have had no just effect whatever upon the value of its road. While the value of the road would likely have affected the value of the stock, the market value of the stock could not possibly have affected the actual value of the road, except to show its dividend-paying capacity.

The statute governing condemnation proceedings in the county court, as to how the value of the road was to be ascertained, should have been applied in the circuit court. Section 18 of the act regulates that. These are declared to be probative evidence: First, a view of the road; second, the books and other evidences showing receipts and expenditures on the part of the road to be sold, and showing net earnings for past six years; and, third, "any other evidence conducing to show the value of the property sought to be taken." The commissioners are then required from all that evidence to "award to the owner or owners thereof the actual value of the property taken."

This provision of the statutes speaks of proceedings before the commissioners appointed to find the value of the property to be taken. It must be remembered that in this case because appellee, Nelson county, wrongfully dismissed its proceedings in the county court, the circuit court, as the only court of general original jurisdiction, is undertaking to carry into effect the original contract between these parties. Besides, that section and provision is the legislative test of value. In the trial of a similar case before a chancellor, without a jury, it was said that it applied. (Richmond, &c., T. P. R. Co. v. Madison County Fiscal Court, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 1260.)

In this connection it is well to notice the instructions of the court guiding the jury to a verdict upon the value of this property. The instructions given were as follows:

"Instruction 'R.' The court instructs the jury that they should find for the plaintiff the actual value, from the evidence, of its road in controversy, being that portion of plaintiff's road between Bardstown and the Spencer county line, including bridges, in the condition in which it was on March 7, 1898, unless they shall believe from the evidence said property was of no value on said date.

"Instruction 'S.' By actual value is meant such price or value as could have been obtained at a fair, voluntary sale.

"Instruction 'T.' If they believe from the evidence that the property in controversy was of no value March 7, 1898, they should find for defendant. ;

"Instruction 'U.' The vote in Nelson county November 7, 1897, only authorized said county to obtain the turnpike road in said county, by gift, lease, purchase or contract, for the purpose of making said roads free.

"Instruction 'M.' The court instructs the jury that they are not authorized to consider any failure or cessation of plaintiff to collect tolls at its gates, which they may believe from the evidence was caused by the acts of mobs and tollgate raiders prior to March 7, 1898, as an abandonment of its road or franchise privileges.

"Instruction 'F.' The court instructs the jury that the plaintiff was not required to expend any other portion of its tolls and revenues in the repair and maintenance of its road than was required to keep its road and bridges in a fit condition for public travel, and if the receipts of the road were more than sufficient to so keep it, it was the duty of plaintiff company to declare dividends and pay the surplus earnings and profits each year to the stockholders."

There should have been omitted from the first instruction the last sentence, "unless they shall believe from the evidence said property was of no value on said date."

Instruction "S" and instruction "T" should have been omitted; nor do we see any occasion for instruction "U."

It is true certain witnesses, basing their opinions upon erroneous bases as has been shown, stated that the road was valueless. But that could not have been so in this case. It was a manifest fact from the record, and one of which the court was bound to take notice, that property of this character and quantity had some value. It had for many years, certainly for the six years previous to its being taken, paid dividends to its stockholders on a basis of 6 per cent. per annum on the valuation of about $28,000 for the thirteen miles of road in suit. The right of way was sixty feet wide. The road was built about 1839. The grade was twenty or twenty-two feet wide, metal about twenty feet wide. The road was a macadam. The base was built of limestone rock set on edge, six inches deep, making what is known as paving. This was covered or napped with small broken rock and gravel, four to six inches deep. The section of country traversed by the road was a rich agricultural community. The road connected the largest city in the State, only about thirty miles distant, with an enterprising and thrifty county town, passing through a number of villages. Two expensive covered wooden bridges, with substantial stone abutments, the bridges about 180 feet long, were a part of the road in this county. The road is an historic one. It was one of the first attempts of the Commonwealth at internal improvements. It was projected and built before the introduction of steam railroads, and was expected to be an interstate thoroughfare. It cost over $200,000 to build it, of which the State of Kentucky took in stock $100,000. (Collins' History of Kentucky, volume 1, page 641.) The road was in good condition when taken by the county a dividend-paying investment to its stockholders. The country it traversed, and the cities it afforded a highway between, had grown considerably, and are yet growing, in population and commercial importance, and the use of the road in the future as a highway must necessarily have been increased, and, therefore, been more profitable to its owners. To say, or to submit, whether such property was without value is utterly unjustifiable. The error of the trial court must have been based upon the theory of market value referred to in instruction "S." But even if it had no market value, yet it had a very substantial value to its owner. It is not material, under the Constitution, whether the citizens' property had a market value or not, whether there is such general demand for it as to create a market, if the State or public need it and proposes to take it for public use, they must pay for it; must make the owner whole; must give him in money an equivalent of that value to him, which has been taken for the public. If the thing taken has a market value, then that value is the thing to be restored, for he can go into the market and get the equivalent of what he has been compelled to yield to the public. But if it has not a market value, nevertheless he must be compensated for its actual value to him, in this case to be ascertained in the manner pointed out by the statute.

The finding of the jury of $5,000 as the value of this thirteen miles of road was flagrantly against the evidence. The court erred in placing the burden of proof. The instructions were erroneous as indicated. The admission of evidence may be regulated by what has been said. The judgment is reversed and cause remanded for a new trial consistent herewith.

The judgment of the circuit court should add 6 per cent. per annum from March 7, 1898, to whatever sum is found and adjudged to be the value of the road for the use of the road under the contract since that date.

WATTS v. PARKS.

1. Mortgage—Sufficiency of pleading—In an action to enforce a mortgage lien, an answer to which no reply was filed setting out and pleading a settlement between the parties as to the amount of debt and interest, did not limit the right of plaintiff to a personal judgment, for the reason that a promise to pay the debt did not release the lien, and if such an agreement had been made it would have been without consideration.

2. Same—Description—Where a farm was described in a mortgage as "the farm conveyed by Draughn to Watts," the latter executing the mortgage, such language fully identifies it. The rule is that "that is certain which may be made certain," and parol evidence may be received to show what body of land was known and designated by the name given in the mortgage.

J. M. Bailey for appellant.

Appeal from Knox Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

J. M. Bailey filed this suit against J. T. Watts, setting up a debt secured by mortgage on a tract of land known as the A. H. Draughn place, the property of Watts, seeking the enforcement of the mortgage. W. C. Parks, who was made a defendant to the action and alleged to hold a lien on it, answered, setting up a note of $300 and a mortgage to secure it. He made his answer a cross petition against Watts, but no process seems to have been then issued.

This was at the June term, 1898. After this Watts settled with Bailey, and at the November term, 1901, an order was made that the action should thereafter proceed in the name of W. C. Parks v. J. T. Watts, and process was awarded on the cross petition. At the next term of the court Watts filed an answer, pleading "that after the note sued upon was executed he made several small payments on same, and on the 18th day of March, 1902, they made a full and complete settlement on the note sued upon and the cost and interest on same, and that the defendant, Watts, was due the said Parks the sum of $261.19, for which amount he is willing for Parks to have judgment, as the mortgage lien was released and settled up, and the said amount is all that was due upon the note sued upon on date of settlement, and that said Parks agreed to have the case dismissed without prejudice, judgment for $261.19, which defendant Watts agreed to pay."

No reply was filed to this answer, and the case being submitted the court gave judgment in favor of Parks for $261.19, with interest from the date of the settlement, and ordered the sale of so much of the land as was necessary to pay the debt and costs. Watts complains that anything more than a personal judgment was rendered against him under the allegations of his answer.

At the date of the settlement Watts was indebted to Parks, on the allegations of the answer, in the sum of $261.19. His promise to pay this debt, which was then due, was only a promise to pay what he owed. Such a promise was no consideration for an agreement by Parks to release his mortgage lien on the land, and if the answer can be construed as averring that Parks agreed to release his mortgage, such agreement by him was without consideration; but as the pleading must be taken rather against the pleader, we think it properly means no more than that there was a settlement on March 18, 1903, which fixed the amount of the debt at $261.19. The judgment was not entered until the March term, 1903. Watts had failed to pay the debt, and it is not disputed that a personal judgment was properly entered against him. The plea is insufficient to show that the mortgage lien was released.

It is also urged that Parks' mortgage does not sufficiently describe the property. The description in the mortgage is as follows: "A certain tract or parcel of land known as the A. H. Draughn farm, on left hand fork of Troublesome creek."

The rule is that that is certain which may be made certain, and that parol evidence may be received to show what body of land was known and designated by the name given in the mortgage. The A. H. Draughn farm, as shown by the record, is the farm conveyed by Draughn to Watts; it is fully identified in the record.

The mortgage also contains these words: "This mortgage is just to include a sufficient amount of said farm to secure said debt."

It is urged that these words render the mortgage bad; but this would be the legal effect of the instrument if the words were omitted. They add nothing to it and take nothing from it.

Judgment affirmed.

MARKS & STIX v. HARDY'S ADM'R.

(Filed March 8, 1904.)

W. B. Pugh, S. J. Pugh and Robt. D. Wilson for appellants.

W. C. Halbert and T. R. Phister for appellee.

Appeal from Lewis Circuit Court.

Judge Barker delivered the following extended opinion:

Our attention has been called by counsel for appellants to the use of the following language in the opinion: "William Hardy was an old man, and lived from fifty to seventy-five miles from Willard. There is no evidence in the record to show that he knew his son was carrying on a general merchandise store under his name, or that he ever heard any of the rumors that he was a member of the firm;" and it is suggested, that this might be construed, when the case comes on for trial, into meaning that the admissions of Hardy, that he was a member of the firm, were incompetent evidence. We think the context shows that the language of the opinion is confined to the want of knowledge on the part of William Hardy as to the evidence upon which the general reputation, that he was a member of the firm, was based, and had no reference to any other evidence in the case.

However, in deference to the apprehension of counsel the opinion is extended as indicated.

FRANKLIN V. TRACEY, &c.

(Filed March 8, 1904—Not to be reported.)

H. J. Tilford and P. C. Beckley for appellant.

Huston Quinn for appellees.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court.

Judge Hobson delivered the following response to petition for rehearing:

In the petition for rehearing our attention is called to the fact that it is averred in her petition that the plaintiff rented the lower floor of the house; but it is not averred in the petition that the owner retained control of any part of the house, or that the fall of the house was due to defects in other parts of the building than those held by the plaintiff under her lease. The allegations of the petition are, therefore, insufficient to bring the case within the authorities relied on for appellant.

Petition overruled.

ORTH, &c. v. PARK & CO.

PARK & CO. v. CITY OF LOUISVILLE.

LOUISVILLE & NASHVILLE R. R. CO. v. PARK & CO.

(Filed March 3, 1904.)

1. Street Improvement—In an action to enforce apportionment warrants for street construction, the court holding that the apportionment had been made on the wrong basis, but ordered a new apportionment, which new apportionment was made on the basis set out in the order of court, and judgment entered against the owners for the amount of the apportionment, the judgment appearing to do justice to all the parties concerned, it will not be disturbed.

2. Same—Interest—The property owner is not liable for interest upon the cost of street improvements until an apportionment is made according to the statute, and until this is done he is not in default for not paying.

Lane & Harrison for Orth, &c.

H. L. Stone for City of Louisville.

Hardin H. Herr, Tyler Barnett and R. L. Greene for Park & Co.

Helm, Bruce & Helm and B. D. Warfield for L. & N. R. R. Co.

Appeals from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery Branch, First Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

These three appeals are prosecuted on the same record.

In the year 1900 an ordinance was enacted directing the improvement of the carriage way of Frankfort avenue from the former city boundary line to Cavewood avenue extended, the cost of the improvement to be assessed against the property fronting on Frankfort avenue and extending back to a depth of 195 feet. A contract was made with appellees, Park & Co., for the improvement. The work was done and was apportioned to the property owners on the basis set out in the ordinance. Suit was then filed against the property owners to enforce the apportionment warrants. The court held that the apportionment had been made on the wrong basis, and ordered a new apportionment, dismissing the action as to certain of the defendants. An appeal was taken from this judgment, and it was affirmed. (Park & Co. v. Orth, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 2209.)

The reason the apportionment was held bad was that it was held that the territory contiguous to the street was defined into squares by principal streets. Section 2883, Kentucky Statutes, provides: "When the improvement is the original construction of any street, road, lane, alley or avenue, such improvement shall be made at the exclusive cost of the owners of lots in each fourth of a square, to be equally apportioned by the board of public works, according to the number of feet owned by them respectively, and in such improvements the cost of curbing shall constitute a part of the cost of the construction of the street or avenue, and not of the sidewalk. Each subdivision of the territory bounded on all sides by principal streets shall be deemed a square. When the territory contiguous to any public way is not defined into squares by principal streets, the ordinance providing for the improvement of such public ways shall state the depth on both sides fronting said improvement to be assessed for the cost of making the same according to the number of square feet owned by the parties respectively within the depth, as set out in the ordinance."

The new apportionment was made on the basis set out in the order of the court, and judgment was entered in favor of the contractors against the property owners respectively for the amount apportioned to them, with interest from the date of the second apportionment. From this judgment the appeals before us are prosecuted. The appeal of the Louisville & Nashville R. R. Co. questions the liability of its right of way for any part of the cost of the improvement. Since the appeal was taken the question so raised was decided adversely to the railroad company in Figg v. L. & N. R. R. Co., 25 Ky. Law Rep., 350, and L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Barber Asphalt Co., 25 Ky. Law Rep., 1024. The court adheres to the rule laid down in those cases, which are conclusive here.

The appeal of the contractors questions the correctness of so much of the judgment as held the city of Louisville not liable for the interest on the contractors' claim from the date of the first apportionment to the date of the second, the contractor having failed to recover this interest against the property owners by reason of the fault of the city in making a wrong apportionment. It is true a loss will be thrown upon the contractors by reason of the error in the proceedings of the council unless judgment is given against the city for this interest, and whether the contractors must bear the loss or it must fall upon the city depends on the proper construction of section 2884, Kentucky Statutes, which is as follows: "A lien shall exist for the cost of original improvement of public ways, for the construction and the reconstruction of sidewalks, and for the digging and walling of public wells and cisterns, for the apportionment and interest thereon at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum against the respective lots. Payments may be enforced upon the property bound therefor by proceedings in court; and no error in the proceedings of the general council shall exempt from payment after the work has been done as required by either the ordinance or contract; but the general council, or the courts in which suits may be pending, shall make all corrections, rules and orders to do justice to all parties concerned; and in no event, if such improvement be made as is provided for, either by ordinance or contract, shall the city be liable for such improvement, without the right to enforce it against the property receiving the benefit thereof; but no ordinance for any original improvement mentioned in this act shall pass both boards of the general council at the same meeting, and at least two weeks shall elapse between the passage of any such ordinance from one board to the other."

Under this provision it has been held that when by taking the proper steps the general council can make any improvements at the cost of the owners of adjacent property, the city can in no event be made liable unless it will have the right to enforce the lien against the property; but that if the adjacent property is such that no steps could be taken by the city to render it liable for the improvement, then the city must pay for it; and that all persons dealing with the city must take notice of its power, and if they fail to do so must suffer the consequences. (Louisville v. Nevin, 73 Ky., 549; Craycraft v. Selvage, 73 Ky., 696; Louisville v. Leatherman, 99 Ky., 213; Louisville v. Bitzer, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 2263.) In the case before us, if proper steps had been taken and an apportionment had been made on the proper basis at the outset, the property would have been liable for the cost of the improvement, with interest from the time the first apportionment was made. The failure to make a correct apportionment was the mistake of the general council. The property owner is not liable for interest until an apportionment is made according to the statute, for until this is done he is not in default for not paying; and as by the terms of the statute the city shall not be liable without the right to enforce the liability against the property receiving the benefit, no judgment can be entered against the city for the interest in question. In determining this very question in Gosnell v. Louisville, 104 Ky., 209, the court said: "Neither interest nor costs should have been allowed against the property holder, except from the time the amount he was required to pay was so fixed that he could discharge it. Nor should interest upon the whole amount of the contract price be allowed against the city, for, while the rule may seem harsh, the contractor must be assumed to have entered into the contract with his eyes open as to its provisions and their enforceability. The contract was not made by the property holder, but for him. As to that portion of the contract price for which he is responsible, his debt was not matured by reason of an erroneous apportionment, and was not payable until maturity. But for that portion which was properly assessable against the property holder the contractor must look to him alone."

This rule was followed and approved in Louisville v. Selvage, 106 Ky., 730, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 917. The circuit court correctly followed the rule laid down in these cases, which can not now be departed from. The other questions made arise on the appeal of the property owners. It is insisted for them that the court has no power to make a new apportionment on a new basis fixed by it; that the power to levy taxes and to define the territory on which they are levied is legislative, and can not be exercised by the court. It will be observed, however, that the statute above quoted prescribes how the cost of the improvement shall be apportioned where the territory is defined by principal streets. The court having held that the territory in question was defined by principal streets, simply carried into execution the mandate of the statute as the council should have done. This the court was authorized to do under the provision quoted, requiring that "the courts in which suits may be pending shall make all corrections, rules and orders to do justice to all parties concerned." When the territory is defined by principal streets the statute determines on whom the burden of the tax shall be laid, and this being fixed, there is no reason why the court may not be authorized to ascertain how much of the burden will fall on each piece of property. The council has no power to determine the territory on which the burden of the improvement must fall where it is defined by principal streets, and if it attempts to do so its action is to this extent void. The court, therefore, properly disregarded the provisions of the ordinance that the cost of the improvement should be laid upon the property fronting Frankfort avenue and extending back 195 feet, and made the assessment on the basis that the territory was defined by principal streets, this being the effect of the opinion rendered by this court when the case was here on a former appeal. The court, in making the apportionment, followed the rule laid down in the statute.

It is also insisted for appellant that there was a deviation from the contract. The facts about the matter are these: Frankfort avenue crosses the tracks of the Louisville & Nashville R. R. at an acute angle. The board of public works thought it unwise to construct the improvement across the railroad tracks at an acute angle.¹ The railroad company proposed to build a crossing if it was made across the tracks at something like a right angle. The board of public works accepted the proposition of the railroad company, and it made the crossing as proposed and the contractors then constructed the street to the crossing on both sides of it. In order to reach the crossing on the west side a slight deflection was made to the north. At this point Clifton avenue runs into Frankfort avenue and whether the improvement, as made, lies altogether on what should be called Frankfort avenue, or in part on Clifton avenue, is not very clear from the maps as it is just at the intersection of the streets. Before its annexation to the city of Louisville this part of Frankfort avenue was a turnpike leading out of the city, and from an inspection of the map it rather seems that the entire improvement is within the limits of the old pike. In any event the ground was practically a part of Frankfort avenue. It was necessary for the safety of the traveling public that the crossing over the railroad track should be as direct as possible, for the danger of collision with cars was thus made less than it would have been if the crossing had been for some distance along and on the tracks of the railroad. No additional burden was by this placed upon the property owners, but, on the contrary, they were relieved from paying anything for part of the improvement for which otherwise they would have been liable. Section 2380, Kentucky Statutes, provides as to the power of the board of public works: "When, in the opinion of the board, it shall become necessary in the construction of any work to make any alterations or modifications in the specifications or plans of a contract, such alteration or modification shall be made only by the order of the board, and such order shall be of no effect until the price to be paid for the same shall be agreed upon in writing and signed by the contractor and approved by the board."

There was no written contract signed by the contractor and approved by the board for the reason that no change was made in the price to be paid. This clause of the statute applies only to changes which are to be paid for. The change to be made here was not of that character as the railroad company made the crossing, and the only change in the contractors' work was in the slight deflection of the carriage way from a straight line. It is also shown that although the board went out to the ground and looked at it, and made the change after full deliberation, the clerk of the board in some way failed to enter the order on his record, and this fact is also relied on. But the order of the board was carried into effect by the railroad company and the contractors, and the mere failure of the clerk to record the order at the time, as he should have done, will not be allowed, under the statute, considering all its provisions, to defeat the lien on the property where no additional burden was thus placed upon the property holders. The purpose of the statute is that the court shall do justice between the parties, and make such orders as may be necessary for this purpose. If an additional burden was placed on the property holder without a compliance with section 2830, and the property holder was insisting that he was not liable for the additional burden without a compliance with the terms of the statute, a different question would be presented. The authorities relied on for appellant were under statutes materially different from that before us. In Gleason v. Barnett, 106 Ky., 133, the court, referring to the statute cited, said: "The manifest purpose of the legislature in the use of the language quoted was to modify the rule of strict construction with reference to the statutes and proceedings thereunder imposing burdens upon the taxpayer for the improvement of public ways, and to establish a rule which would authorize the general council or the courts in which suits might be brought to enforce claims against property owners, to make all corrections and rules and orders so as to do justice to all parties concerned, where it appeared the improvement had been made as required by either the ordinance or contract."

In Elliott on Streets and Roads, section 567, it is said: "The cardinal rule is that nothing shall be permitted that will tend to do harm to the property owners, but this salutary rule is obeyed rather than violated in permitting a change that is beneficial, and it is not infringed by permitting changes that work no harm to citizens."

Again, in section 585, it is said: "It is beyond the authority of the highway officer to do any act that will materially prejudice the rights of citizens, but they may make amendments and changes which do not substantially impair the rights of citizens. This must be so upon principle, for, having once lawfully acquired jurisdiction, those officers may do what is for the best interests of the public, provided, always, that they do not infringe the rights of those who must pay the assessment." (Barber Asphalt Co. v. Garr, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 2231.)

On the whole case the judgment of the circuit court seems to do justice to all parties concerned, and it is, therefore, affirmed.

ROBINSON, &c. v. TALBOT, &c.

(Filed March 3, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Guardian—Next friend—Where one assumed to sue for an infant as next friend, who was neither a guardian, nor had an interest in the infant, and had instituted the action without authority, and where there was no reason for the assumption of such duties, the action of the chancellor in dismissing the action was proper.

W. Buckler and S. Holmes for appellants.

W. S. Cason for appellees.

Two cases, one appealed from Bourbon and the other from the Harrison Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

These actions are submitted upon a motion by the statutory guardian of the infant appellants to dismiss the appeals prosecuted in the name of Winfield Buckler, as next friend, on the ground that he has no authority to prosecute them. It appears from the pleadings that George H. Talbot died a resident of Harrison county in the fall of 1896, the owner of a considerable personal and landed estate, a part of the latter being in Bourbon county. By his will, which was duly probated in the Harrison County Court, he devised all of his estate to his surviving widow during her natural life, with the provision that at her death her brothers and sisters were to have $3,000 out of the estate; and that the balance was to be divided equally among the brothers and sisters of the testator, seven in number, or their descendants. The interest of one of these brothers, Daniel by name, was represented at the death of testator by his granddaughter, Mrs Mollie Robinson, who died after George H. Talbot, leaving as her heirs the infant appellants, whom Buckler assumed to represent in both of these suits as next friend. Mary F. Talbot, the wife of George H. Talbot and the life tenant, died on the 15th day of April, 1903. Two days thereafter the appellant, Buckler, volunteered to institute the suit in the Harrison Circuit Court, as next friend of the infant children of Mollie Robinson, who were at that time residing with their brother, Harry, in Maysville, Ky., for a sale of all the landed estate devised by George H. Talbot, and for a distribution of the proceeds among the devisees of George Talbot, or their descendants, one-seventh of which he alleges belonged to the descendants of Mollie Robinson, making the descendants of the other devisees defendants, who he alleged resided in various counties of this State and in various States of the Union. On the 27th of April, 1903, Harry Robinson, the brother of the infant plaintiffs, filed his affidavit in this suit in the Harrison Circuit Court, in which he stated that Winfield Buckler, who assumed to sue as next friend for the infants, was not their guardian, had no interest in any of them, and had instituted the action without authority, and asked that it be dismissed. He subsequently qualified as the statutory guardian of all of the infant plaintiffs, and filed their affidavits to the same effect, and asked that a rule issue against Buckler to show cause why the suit instituted by him in the Harrison Circuit Court should not be dismissed for want of authority on his part to institute the action. Buckler in his response to this rule admitted that he had instituted the suit as next friend without authority, either express or implied, from either the infants or their brothers, who were of full age; but claimed that as they were without statutory guardians at the date of the institution of the suit, he had the right to do so. The response was held insufficient and the suit dismissed. Shortly after the institution of the suit in the Harrison Circuit Court he instituted a similar suit in the Bourbon Circuit Court. The same proceedings were had in the Bourbon court and the case dismissed. And he prosecutes an appeal from the judgment entered in both cases, and the statutory guardian of the infant appellants has entered a motion in this court to dismiss the appeals in both cases on the ground of lack of authority in Buckler to prosecute them.

Subsection 1 of section 85 of the Civil Code provides that an action of an infant must be brought primarily by his statutory guardian, if he has one residing in the State. Section 87 provides that "no person shall sue as next friend unless he reside in this State and be free from disability. Nor unless he file his own affidavit showing his right to sue as next friend according to the provisions of this chapter."

It does not appear from the record that Mr. Buckler complied with this section of the Code at the institution of the suits. He is not related to them by blood or marriage, he does not reside in the same county, and the record entirely fails to disclose any special reason why he should have so hastily, without consultation with them or their natural friends, have assumed the duties which the law primarily imposed upon their statutory guardian. It certainly can not be assumed that he has their interest more at heart than their brother and statutory guardian with whom they reside.

It is the duty of the chancellor to protect the infants and to see that they are not prejudiced by any act or omission of the next friend; and to this end may, if he deem it necessary, revoke the authority of the next friend and substitute another, or dismiss suits instituted for the ostensible but not real, interest of the infants. (Longnacker v. Greenwade, 85 Ky., 516; 14 Ency. of Pl. and Pr., 1041.)

After a careful consideration of the records we have reached the conclusion that the lower courts did not abuse their discretion in the dismissal of these actions, and that the best interest of the infant appellants required that the motion to dismiss the appeal prosecuted by the "prochein ami," should be sustained by this court, as they seem to have been prosecuted wholly without authority and against the advice and wishes of the statutory guardian, and it is so ordered.

ILLINOIS CENTRAL R. R. CO. v. BURTON.

1. Railroads—Where appellee was injured by running over a torpedo which a servant of appellant had placed on the track it was such negligence as entitled appellee to recover, and the fact that the torpedo was placed near a flag station does not alter the rule.

2. Verdict and judgment—Where a jury was composed of a number less than the required number, and no objection was made during the progress of the trial, nor was made the subject of ground for a new trial, this court will not disturb the verdict and judgment.

J. M. Dickinson, Pirtle & Trabue and N. P. Moss for appellant.

Joe W. Bennett and John R. Evans for appellee.

Appeal from Hickman Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

The appellee was an employe of the appellant, and his business required him to approach a station known as Krebs on a hand car. "Within the line where passengers get off and on trains" the hand car ran over a torpedo which had been placed there by an employe of the appellant; it exploded, and a piece of the covering penetrated the calf of appellee's leg, which resulted in an injury from which he did not recover for several weeks, and from which he suffered physical pain and mental anguish. The appellee based his right to recover upon the ground that it was against the rules of the company to place torpedoes at or near stations which might explode and injure persons getting on and off of trains and employes of appellant, whose business might call them at and about the station. The case was tried upon the theory that if the torpedo was so placed within the limits where passengers got on and off at Krebs, the plaintiff was entitled to recover. While the appellant objected to an instruction given by the court which was predicated upon that theory, still it offered instruction A, which is substantially the same as the court gave. It reads as follows: "The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence the defendant, the Illinois Central R. R. Co.'s, agents or servants placed the torpedoes, which exploded and injured plaintiff, if they believe he was injured on the railroad track near the station Krebs, in violation of the rules of said company, they will find for plaintiff whatever sum they think he has sustained, not to exceed $1,000.00, by the reason of the explosion of said torpedoes."

This instruction was equivalent to the one which the court gave. However, before this instruction was offered the appellant offered instruction B., which reads as follows: "The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that Krebs is not a town or a railroad station where passenger tickets are sold, but is only a railroad passing, or place where trains pass each other, and where only the section boss of defendant railroad lives, they will find for defendant, notwithstanding they may believe from the evidence that certain accommodation trains of defendant to stop there occasionally upon being flagged, and take on passengers, and upon request to let passengers off."

This instruction is based upon the theory that because Krebs was only a flag station the appellee was not entitled to recover. A flag station is a station in the meaning of the rule the same as it would be if all the passenger trains stopped there. Presumably at a flag station fewer passengers get off and on trains than at a station where all the trains stop, hence the percentage of danger to passengers would be less at a flag than at regular stations. It seems to us, however, the rule is violated if a torpedo is placed at a flag station the same as it would be at a regular station. So the appellant tried the case upon the theory that it would have been liable if a torpedo had been placed within the limits of a regular station and had exploded and injured appellee. Had the court been in error (and we do not think it was) in allowing a recovery upon appellee's theory the appellant did not on the trial of the case endeavor to extricate the court from its error in assuming there could be a recovery for the infraction of the rule which resulted in appellee's injury. The court was of the opinion that it was per se negligence to place the torpedo where it exploded, and in this view we concur.

The bill of exceptions shows that the parties appeared by their attorneys and thereupon a jury was sworn, and their names are given. From the statement in the bill of exceptions the jury which tried the case was composed of only eleven men. It is quite certain that the parties agreed to try the case with eleven jurors (although it is not so recited in the record), or the clerk omitted the name of the twelfth juror in making the transcript. However, it is not proper, and we do not assume that either of these theories is correct. The record fails to show that the appellant assented to a trial with eleven jurors. Of course it was entitled to have its case tried by twelve jurors. In the grounds for a new trial no objection was made to the verdict because it had been returned by eleven jurors. In Ayers v. Barr, 5 J. J. M., 286, it appeared that there were only eleven jurors, and that the plaintiff in error was not present in court, and, therefore, did not waive the objection to the number. In Oldham v. Hill, ibid., 300, it appeared that only nine jurors were sworn, and the court held that as there was no waiver on the record, express or implied, of the objection to the number of the jury, the case should be reversed. It does not appear in either case that the verdict was objected to in the lower court. Presumably an exception was reserved so as to give this court the right to review the action of the lower court. In Ross v. Neal, 7 Monroe, 408, thirteen jurors were sworn and tried the case. It appeared in that case that no exception to the verdict had been taken in the lower court, and that the appellant was silent until he reached this court. The court held that it was not proper to permit him to attack the verdict here for the first time. Under the numerous adjudications of this court, if the error complained of occurred during the progress of the trial, and was not made the subject of an objection in the grounds for a new trial, this court will not consider it. Our opinion is that the appellant is not entitled to have its attack upon the verdict sustained, because it failed to complain in its grounds for a new trial that the jury was composed of eleven men.

The judgment is affirmed.

BOTTO'S EX'OR V. CITY OF LOUISVILLE.

(Filed March 8, 1904.)

1. Taxation—Situs of property—Personal property may be assessed at the domicile of the equitable or beneficial owner.

2. Same—Where there is nothing in a statute authorizing the assessment of personal property negating the right to assess it retrospectively, omitted property may be assessed. The omission to make the assessment is no excuse for the refusal of the taxpayer to share in the burdens of government.

Grubbs & Grubbs for appellant.

H. L. Stone for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery Branch, First Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

Under the will of James F. Irvin, who died in 1883, domiciled in the city of Louisville, J. H. Lindemberger, as trustee, held the devised estate. The testator left a widow and son, Guy Irvin, who lived in the city of Louisville until their deaths in 1900 and 1895, respectively. The trustee lived at Crescent Hill and outside of the corporate limits of the city of Louisville. The taxes sought to be collected were for the years of 1893 and 1897. The record conduces to show that the widow and son were the beneficiaries of the income of the estate for the year of 1893. The son died in 1895, and the widow was entitled to the whole income from the estate in 1897.

The first question to be determined is whether the personal property in the hands of the trustee was taxable at his domicile or at the domicile of the beneficiaries of the estate. The general doctrine is that such property is taxable at the domicile of the trustee. It is competent for the legislature to provide otherwise for its taxation. This court in City of Lexington v. Fishback's Trustee, 109 Ky., 770, held that the property should be assessed at the domicile of the equitable or beneficial owner. The facts of this case do not distinguish it from that case. It is sufficient to say that the court without further elaboration adheres to the doctrine of the Fishback case.

The remaining question in the case is, has the city assessor the right to retrospectively assess personal property? It was not assessed during the period prescribed by the statute for making the assessment. The statute seems to be silent as to the right of the assessor to retrospectively assess personal property which was omitted at the time of the regular assessments. There are no words in the statute which negative the right of the assessor to so assess omitted property. The statute prescribing the time in which assessments shall be made are directory in the absence of words showing that the officer or officers shall not act at any other time. The neglect of the officer to assess the property within the time prescribed by law is no excuse for the taxpayer's refusal to share the burdens of the government. When the assessment is made at a later time than prescribed by law, but within such time as the right to assess and collect the taxes is not barred by the statute of limitation, the proceeding is not void, and the taxpayer is not relieved from the payment of his taxes.

Cooley on Taxation, 2d edition, 281, says "But the negligence of officers, their mistakes of fact or of law, and many other causes, will sometimes prevent a strict obedience, and when the provisions which have been disregarded constitute parts of an important and perhaps complicated system, it becomes of highest importance to ascertain the effect the failure to obey them shall have on the other proceedings with which they are associated in the law. * * * The municipalities, it has been seen, levy and collect taxes not only for their own purposes, but also under State apportionment for the State at large. The power to levy taxes for local uses is usually conferred upon them in merely promissory terms; terms implying a discretion to levy them or not at the will of the local majority or the local board."

On page 283 he says: "If, by the use of negative words, it requires a particular proceeding to be taken in a particular time or manner, and makes it void if not so done, or gives it effect, provided it is so done, or declares that unless it is taken subsequent proceedings shall not be had, or prohibits its being done except at the time the statute prescribes, or if any terms plainly imperative are employed, the intent is clear, and no discretion can be permitted in construction. It is not often, however, that these, or similar, words are met with in the statutes which define official duties under the revenue laws, and the construction of particular provisions must be left for determination in such light as the obvious purpose they were intended to accomplish may afford. * * * No one should be at liberty to plant himself upon the nonfeasanoees or misfeasanoees of officers, under the revenue laws, which in no way concern himself, and make them the excuse for a failure on his own part to perform his own duty. * * * In one of the most recent cases in which this has been attempted the general doctrine is stated as follows: 'There are undoubtedly many statutory requisitions intended for the guide of officers in the conduct of business devolved upon them which do not limit their power, or render its exercise in disregard of the requisition ineffectual. Such generally are regulations designed to secure order, system and dispatch in proceedings, and by a disregard of which the rights of parties interested can not be injuriously affected. Provisions of this character are not usually regarded as mandatory unless accompanied by negative words, importing that the act required shall not be done in any other manner or time than that designated.' "

On page 284 he says: "All legislation must be supposed to take into account the possible, if not probable, mistakes and irregularities of officers in executing the provisions of the law, and it is hardly reasonable to infer an intent, on the part of a legislative body, that a failure of administrative officers to comply with any provision made for the benefit of the State exclusively, or merely as a guide in orderly proceedings, should deprive the State of all benefit to be derived from a compliance with other provisions that embody the main purpose and object of the law."

The correctness of the doctrine announced by Cooley is approved by Anderson v. City of Mayfield, 93 Ky., 230. There is no express statute authorizing the board of valuation and assessment to make retrospective assessments, but this court, in Louisville and Jeffersonville Ferry Co. v. Commonwealth, 22 Ky. Law Rep., 464, held it could be done. In Stone, Auditor v. City of Louisville, 22 Ky. Law Rep., 423, the court required the board of valuation and assessment to make a retrospective assessment. It is insisted that because there is a provision of the statute governing cities of the first class, which authorizes the assessor to retrospectively assess real property, thereby the right to retrospectively assess personal property is denied. Under the Anderson case this right existed, therefore, we must conclude that the provision of the statute which authorizes the retrospective assessment of real property is simply declaratory of the right which previously existed. That taxpayers may be protected, section 2095, Kentucky Statutes, authorizes the mayor to reconvene the board of equalization, thus enabling it to hear the complaints of taxpayers as to excessive assessments, etc.

The judgment is affirmed.

MONEHAN, &c. v. SOUTH COVINGTON AND CINCINNATI STREET RY. CO.

(Filed March 8, 1904.)

1. Railroads—Damages—Where a child six or seven years old, who got on the steps of a street car at the intersection of two streets where it had stopped to discharge and receive passengers, was jolted off the car after it had reached a rapid rate and was injured, in an action for damages against the company for the injury a peremptory instruction was proper, the child being a trespasser and the conductor of the car not being aware of his presence on the car.

2. Same—Evidence—In an action to recover for injuries to a child which was injured in being thrown from a street car by the rapid motion of the car, it was not error to exclude testimony conducing to show that the point where the child got on the car was in a thickly settle portion of the city and that many children congregated thereabouts, and had often trespassed upon the cars with the knowledge of the employes thereof.

C. L. Raison, Jr., Geo. H. Ahlering and A. M. Caldwell for appellants..

L. J. Crawford for appellee.

Appeal from Campbell Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

The appellee is a corporation operating an electric railway over the street of the city of Newport, Ky. The appellant, at the time of the injury of which he complains, was between six and seven years of age. At the intersection of Eleventh and Patterson streets, in the city named, one of appellee's cars had stopped for the purpose of receiving and discharging passengers. On the rear platform of the car were steps so arranged that passengers could get on or off from either side; but appellee only permitted this to be done on one side at a time, and for the purpose of preventing ingress and egress to and from the car on more than one side, it had a small iron wicket gate across the side not in use. This was moveable, so that it could be transferred from one side to the other, as the necessities of the case required.

Appellant, and a companion about the same age, while the car was standing at the intersection mentioned, got upon the lower step of the side of the rear platform which was not being used for the purpose of taking on or letting off passengers, and taking hold of the iron gate with their hands, stood on the step until the car started. The car seems to have soon attained a rapid rate of speed, and appellant was jolted off, falling into the street, receiving injuries about the head, to recover damages for which this action was instituted. Upon the trial of the case, after the close of appellant's (plaintiff's) testimony, the court, on motion, awarded appellee (defendant) a peremptory instruction to the jury to find for it, which was done; and of this appellant is here complaining.

The question involved is whether or not, under appellant's own testimony, appellee owed him any duty other than to avoid injuring him, if that could have been done by the exercise of ordinary care, after his danger was discovered. It is not pretended that appellant was a passenger upon the car; nor can it be denied that he was a trespasser. The evidence does not show that the conductor, who was appellee's agent in charge of the car, saw him; but it is contended that the officer, by the exercise of ordinary diligence, could, and should, have seen him before he received his injury, and have prevented it; and this question, he claims, should have been submitted to the jury. Upon this claim arises the crucial question of this case, whether or not appellee owed appellant any active duty, in order to discover his peril; if so, then the peremptory instruction should not have been granted. In favor of this proposition appellant's counsel cites two cases: Thornton v. L. & N. R. R. Co., 22 Ky. Law Rep., 778, and Vanarsdal v. L. & N. R. R. Co., 23 Ky. Law Rep., 1666.

In the first of these the court said: "The theory upon which this case is based, and the recovery had, for it is carried into the instruction given supra, is that appellant owed to appellee a duty to prevent him getting off the moving train after those agents knew or had reasonable grounds to believe he was about to jump from the moving train. We are of opinion that the instruction supra given is erroneous. There can be no negligence in failing to do, unless there was a duty to do."

"Appellee, a boy seventeen years of age, and of reasonable intelligence, as shown by his testimony, is on a freight train by invitation of the fireman; he is not a passenger; the appellant owed him no contract duty; the train is not engaged in carrying passengers. Under these circumstances, it is clear that appellee was a mere licensee, if not a trespasser; and appellant owed him no duty unless his danger was discovered in time to have prevented an injury by some agent of appellant. (Dalton's Adm'r v. L. & N. R. R. Co., 23 Ky. Law Rep., 97, and cases cited.)"

In the second of these cases the facts were these: The decedent, Mary Vanarsdal, was a little girl, twelve years of age; at the time of the accident she was walking over one of appellee's railroad bridges; before she could get off she was run over and killed. In the opinion this court said: "It must be conceded that the intestate was a technical trespasser; or, in other words, she had no lawful right to use the bridge as a passway, and that appellee was under no obligations to look out to see if she was upon the bridge. But it is also a well-settled rule of law that if the defendant, its agents or employees in charge of the train, discovered the peril or danger of the intestate, it was its duty to use all reasonable efforts to avoid injuring her, and if they failed so to do the plaintiff would be entitled to recovery. If, however, the defendant used all reasonable efforts to avoid injury, after discovering her peril, the verdict should have been for the defendant."

We are not able to recall any opinion of this court wherein the opposite principle to that contended for by appellant has been more clearly or definitely decided than in these two cases. The question of appellant's infancy is immaterial until it has been established that appellee owed him an active duty, as opposed to the passive duty of not injuring him after his peril was discovered. An infant of tender years may not be able to be guilty of contributory negligence, and in that respect his position is superior to that of one who has reached years of discretion. But contributory negligence presupposes the existence of negligence, and never becomes a factor in the problem until the defendant's duty, and his breach of it, has been established. If the defendant owed the appellant no duty, then the question of his infancy is immaterial.

Appellant was a mere trespasser upon the rear steps of appellee's car, and those in charge of it did not owe him any duty of discovering his peril. In the case of Jackson's Adm'r v. L. & N. R. R. Co., 20 Ky. Law Rep., 809, the decedent was a boy seven years of age, who was trespassing in the yard of the railroad corporation, where he was run over and killed. It was held that the corporation owed the decedent no active duty, and the judgment of the lower court, awarding the peremptory instruction, was affirmed. In the case of Brown's Adm'r v. L. & N. R. R. Co., 97 Ky., 238, the doctrine that the corporation owed a trespasser upon its tracks no lookout duty is fully maintained. (Kentucky Central R. R. Co. v. Gastineau, 83 Ky., 119; Conley

We do not think the court erred in excluding the proffered testimony that the intersection of Eleventh and Patterson streets was in a thickly settled portion of the city of Newport; that many children congregated thereabouts, and theretofore they had often trespassed upon appellee's cars, with the knowledge of the employes in charge thereof; and the cases of Shelby's Adm'r v. Cincinnati, New Orleans & Texas Pacific R. R. Co., 85 Ky., 224, and Louisville & Nashville R. R. Co. v. Popp, 96 Ky., 99, do not support this proposition.

In the first of these cases the infant decedent was killed by a backing car, while he was on the defendant's switch, where he had the right to be; and the court found, as a matter of fact, that he was not a trespasser, but, on the contrary, said: "In our opinion, therefore, he had a lawful right to go upon the track at that place, and the company owed to him a duty of active vigilance."

In the second case there is some general language which seems to give color to appellant's position with reference to the admissibility of this evidence; but an analysis of the opinion shows that the servants of the defendant corporation knew the appellee and his companions were in its switch yard and about its cars; and the case, after all, was made to turn upon the knowledge that the injured boy and his companions were in and about the cars, by the backing of which, without notice, the plaintiff was injured.

In the action of the Louisville & Nashville R. R. Co. v. Webb, 99 Ky., 385, on the subject of testimony of this character, it was said: "Over the objections of the counsel for appellant testimony was admitted to prove what was said by the conductor to the boys, including the infant appellee, about helping to take freight from the train, and riding from the tank on days previous to the day on which the accident happened. This testimony ought to have been rejected. The case was between the infant appellee and appellant, and the subject of the investigation was what occurred on the day the injury was inflicted, and what occurred on previous days had no necessary connection with, and was in no sense a part of, the transactions of that day. For this reason, also, the court properly refused to allow proof to be made in behalf of the appellee of what it was alleged the conductor and trainmen said to the boys on the occasion before that day about swinging on the ladders attached to the side of the car, and telling them to do this in order to learn to be 'hoppers' and the like, and that the boys were in the habit of practicing in that way on previous occasions when they rode to the tank." This, we think, states the sound rule on this subject.

Appellee, although it was a common carrier of passengers, owed the infant appellant no different duty than was owed him by the owner of any other vehicle plying the streets of Newport. As he had a right, in common with the general public, to use the public highways, appellee, in common with all other owners of vehicles, owed him the active duty of exercising ordinary diligence not to run over him; but neither it, nor they, were under any duty of anticipating his trespassing on the rear end of the vehicle while they were being driven or propelled along the streets. Suppose a private carriage is being driven along the street; must the driver maintain a lookout to see that small boys are not stealing a ride by climbing up in the rear of the vehicle, and thereby placing themselves in positions of danger? Surely not; and yet it will be difficult to draw a distinction between the case at bar and that supposed. The fact that there was a conductor on appellee's car would not alter the case; the conductor's duty is, primarily, to attend to his passengers—not to lookout for trespassers; and while the presence of the conductor would necessarily increase the chances of the actual discovery of the infantile trespasser, it would not add the duty of an active vigilance to make the discovery of his presence and danger.

Judgment affirmed.

CITY OF LOUISVILLE v. WEHMHOF, &c.

SAME v. ALVEY, &c.

SAME v. PIRTLE, AGENT.

SAME v. SMITH, MANAGER.

(Filed March 4, 1904.)

Henry L. Stone for appellant..

Kohn, Baird & Spindle, Fred Forcht and Richard & Ronald for appellees.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Criminal Division.

Judge O'Rear delivered the following response to petition for rehearing:

Aside from repetitions of arguments made on the original hearing of the case, and which we deem to have been disposed of by the opinion heretofore delivered in these cases, appellees have presented certain criticisms of the opinion, and additional reasons against the reversal, which ought to be noticed.

It is complained that the ordinance being considered is void because it violates section 168 of the Constitution in this, that it provides less penalties than is fixed by statute for the same offense. It was argued before that the offense created by the ordinance was not an offense at all, either at the common law or by statute. The apparent inconsistency of the arguments will not estop counsel from relying on the true one, if either is sound. It is claimed that pool selling is a game such as is embraced by section 1860, Kentucky Statutes, for which a penalty of $500 fine and confinement in the penitentiary, and disqualification from suffrage and office holding, is fixed. That section applies alone to the setting up and operation of a faro bank, keno bank, "or other machine and contrivance used in betting, whereby money or other thing may be won or lost," and to whoever shall for commission or compensation set up, operate, or conduct a game of cards, oontz or craps, whereby money or other thing may be won or lost, and to aiders and assistants.

This argument is based upon the claim that the ordinance is broad enough in terms to include what is known as French pools; and that as it was decided by this court in Commonwealth v. Simonds, 79 Ky., 618, that the selling of French pools or Paris mutuels on horse races is a felony under section 1860, Kentucky Statutes, that, therefore, the ordinance fixes a less penalty for selling French pools than the statute does. French pool or Paris mutual is a "machine or contrivance used in betting," as is shown by its description in Commonwealth v. Simonds, supra. Furthermore, section 1961, Kentucky Statutes, indicates that it was so regarded by the legislature, for in that section it is said that the change of the name of the games or contrivances "mentioned or included in the preceding section shall not prevent the conviction of any person violating the provisions thereof. * * * Nor shall its provisions apply 'to persons who sell combination or French pools on any regular race track during the races thereon.'"

In French pool the operator of the machine does not bet at all. He merely conducts a game, which is played by the use of a certain machine, the effect of which is that all who buy pools on a given race bet as among themselves, the wagers of all constituting a pool going to the winner or winners. The operator receives 5 per cent. of the wagers as his commission. But in selling ordinary pools on horse races the seller does not operate a "machine or contrivance used in betting." Neither does he bet on a horse race. Such was the express decision of this court in Cheek v. Commonwealth, 79 Ky., 359. Therefore, as said by the court in that opinion, "there is no express statutory penalty against the specific act of selling pools." In that opinion the other statute referred to by counsel, what is now section 1960, was referred to, and held not to include pool selling, while French pool was held by the court in the Simonds case, supra, to be under that statute. But even if the ordinance was broad enough to include French pools, it would be void only as to that class of pool selling, leaving it valid in all other particulars, including the penalties affixed to the acts of having tickets in possession, and knowingly furnishing telegraphic or telephone messages to the operators, etc., with the intention, or knowledge, that they are to be used to further the business of pool selling in the city of Louisville.

Section 1978, Kentucky Statutes, fixes a penalty of $200 to $500 against "whoever shall suffer any game whatever, at which money or property is bet, won or lost, in any house or on premises in his occupation." It is claimed that the act of pool selling, or at least the betting by the buyers of the pools, is a game. Both these contentions were decided adversely to appellees' present version in Cheek's case, supra, where the court said: "Appellant could not be convicted under an indictment for the statutory offense of betting at a game or wager, first, because he did not bet or wager anything; and, second, because betting on a horse race, although punishable under a statute against wagering, is not 'gaming.'"

The other criticism of appellees other than the Western Union Telegraph Co.'s manager do not appear to us to be material as affecting their rights under the ordinance. The very earnest petition for rehearing filed by the Western Union Telegraph Co. for its manager, Smith, relies as new matter upon the argument that the ordinance must be held void because it is regulation of interstate commerce, and is, therefore, repugnant to the Federal Constitution.

We are not aware that the congress has ever legislated upon the subject-matter covered by this ordinance. It is conceded that the business of the Western Union Telegraph Co. in carrying messages between persons of different States is interstate commerce. While the Supreme Court has frequently had before it the question of the power of a State to enact legislation regulating, or having the effect to regulate, commerce between the States, it has not decided the precise point here presented. Nor can any general rule be deduced from the numerous decisions of that court that can be said to be conclusive to the question now presented. It is not for a moment thought that the ordinance in question was intended as a regulation of commerce between the States, or as a regulation of commerce at all. If it operates in that way, it is merely incidentally. The ordinance is an exercise of the State's police power; that the States may, in the exercise of that power, in certain instances, pass laws that incidentally affect commerce among the States, has been upheld. (Plumley v. Massachusetts, 155 U. S., 461; Austin v. Tennessee, 179 U. S., 348; Western Union Tel. Co. v. James, 168 U. S., 650; Patterson v. Kentucky, 97 U. S., 501; Stone v. Mississippi, 101 U. S., 314.) It would be an extraordinarily unfortunate condition if it were wise. We should imagine that a rightful exercise of this power would be found in State laws prohibiting the importation from another State of diseased or infected cattle, or persons, or impure food, and the like. Here the thing prohibited is the transmission to a pool room operator in the city of Louisville messages intended for use to be used in a vicious enterprise. Their use is that of gambling, and is universally held in this country to be immoral, degrading and injurious to society. Such use can not have any legitimate purpose. The business of furnishing such messages, known to be intended solely for such use, makes the carrier essentially a participator in that offense. Its part of the profits of the business is its tolls for carrying the messages; the pool room operator's part is a toll or percentage on the volume of business. It must be profitable to both, or it would not be kept up. The carrier wants us to say that its part in this unlawful partnership to violate the moral and statute laws of a community is protected by the Federal Constitution. As was said by one of the courts, the Constitution at most gives the congress exclusive jurisdiction to regulate interstate commerce, not interstate crime. The liquor cases are cited by appellees as holding a contrary doctrine to this court's position. We do not understand that they do. Traffic in liquor is not illegal, nor immoral per se. On the contrary it is generally recognized as being a legal business, and is licensed as such. Consequently the transmission of such commodities by freight from one State to another has been held to be a matter not subject to the prohibitive control of any of the States. But wagering bets on horse races can not be an article of commerce no more than could be a lottery business. Both are per se immoral and deleterious to society, and clearly within the power of the States to prohibit. It could never have been contemplated by the framers of the Federal Constitution that the hands of the States were to be tied so that they could not protect themselves from such vices, if one of the participants chanced to use an interstate vehicle of commerce for carrying on the business.

The petitions are overruled.

COMMONWEALTH v. MOREHEAD.

(Filed March 4, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Taxation—Jurisdiction of circuit court—In an action by the auditor's agent against appellee, seeking to collect taxes on certain personal property, a judgment of the lower court dismissing the proceeding will not be disturbed where the inference from the judgment is that the county court found that appellee did not omit to assess any property owned by him in the years mentioned in the statement. By statute the appeal from the judgment of the county court to the circuit court is limited to cases where the county court has decided whether or not the property set out in the statement of the auditor's agent is liable to assessment, the circuit court has no original jurisdiction to assess property.

James B. Clark, M. R. Todd and C. J. Pratt for appellant.

Miller & Todd for appellee.

Appeal from Daviess Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

On February 1, 1903, James B. Clark, as auditor's agent for Daviess county, filed a statement in the Daviess County Court, charging that the appellee, Morehead, had failed to list for taxation for the years 1897, 1898, 1899, 1900 and 1901 notes, bonds, judgments, cash and other choses in action of the aggregate value of $80,000, of which he was the owner on the 15th days of September of each of said years. The defendant, Morehead, filed an answer, in which he denied that he was the owner of personal property of the character described in the statement of the auditor's agent of the value of $80,000, which he had failed to list for taxation for the years named; and alleged that he had regularly listed for taxation all the personal property owned by him with the assessor of Daviess county for the years named, and denied that he had omitted any property owned by him for either of the years named, except certain worthless judgments against the county of Muhlenberg in the year 1901. At the June term of the Daviess County Court the proceeding instituted by James B. Clark, Auditor's Agent v. Morehead, and a similar proceeding instituted by the sheriff of Daviess county against the same defendant, were heard together, and the following judgment was entered in the county court: "By consent of parties the two foregoing proceedings are to be heard together. Same coming on to be heard, on motion of plaintiff, R. E. Berry is ordered to make report of proceedings as stenographer. And the court having heard the evidence and being sufficiently advised, it is adjudged by the court that the two foregoing proceedings be, and the same are hereby, dismissed."

From this judgment an appeal was prosecuted to the Daviess Circuit Court by James B. Clark, auditor's agent, and on the 28th of June, 1903, the following judgment was entered in the proceeding: "This action coming on for trial, the defendant moved the court to dismiss the appeal herein, to which the plaintiff objects. Argument of counsel was heard on said motion, and he court being advised, sustained the motion, and it is adjudged that the appeal herein be, and it is now, dismissed."

From this judgment Clark has appealed to this court. The statement filed by appellant in the county court was under the provisions of section 4241 of the Kentucky Statutes, which provides: "If it shall appear to the court that the property is liable for taxation and has not been assessed, the court shall enter an order fixing the value thereof at its fair cash value, estimated as required by law; if not liable, he shall make an order to that effect. From so much of the order of the court deciding whether or not the property is liable to assessment either party may appeal, as in other civil cases.

The judgment rendered in the county court is not in conformity with the statute, as it does not in terms decide whether appellee, Morehead, was or was not the owner of any personal property of the nature set out in the statement, which he had omitted to list for taxation for the years named. The record does not contain any transcript of the evidence heard by the county court upon the trial of the motion, and the inference from the judgment is that the county court found that the appellee did not omit to assess any property owned by him in the years mentioned in the statement. By the express provision of the statute the appeal from the judgment of the county court to the circuit court is limited to cases where the county court has decided whether or not the property set out in the statement of the auditor's agent is liable to assessment. The circuit court simply passes upon the legal question as to whether the county court has erred in its decision as to whether certain definite property was liable to taxation or not; it has no original jurisdiction to assess or value omitted property. On the case presented by the appeal we think the circuit judge properly dismissed the proceeding.

Judgment affirmed.

MARTIN v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed March 4, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Criminal law—Dying declaration—The statement of deceased that "I do not believe that there is any chance for me to get well, and I make all the aforesaid statements, believing that I am going to die from the effects of said wounds," was competent as a dying declaration in a prosecution against his slayer.

2. Same—Instructions—Where the elements of affray, sudden heat and passion and provocation, ordinarily calculated to excite passion beyond control were omitted in an instruction in a prosecution for murder, the instruction was misleading and improper.

3. Same—In a prosecution for murder an instruction was prejudicial to the accused which omitted the words "either real or apparent," as the danger which authorizes one to act in self-defense may be real or it may only be apparent.

C. W. Lester for appellant.

N. B. Hays and Loraine Mix for appellee.

Appeal from Whitley Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

The appellant was indicted by the grand jury of Whitley county in the month of August, 1903, charged with the offense of murder of one Wesley Woods by shooting him with a pistol. A trial was had at the January term, 1904, which resulted in the conviction of appellant for the crime of voluntary manslaughter and he was sentenced to a term of ten years in the penitentiary, from which judgment this appeal is prosecuted.

The appellant relies upon several errors committed by the lower court to his prejudice. He claims, first, that the lower court erred in permitting a statement to be read to the jury purporting to be the dying declaration of the deceased, Wesley Woods; second, that the court erred to his prejudice in giving instructions to the jury; third, it erred in permitting, on behalf of the Commonwealth, incompetent testimony and rejecting competent testimony offered by him.

As to the first error the appellant claims that the proof did not show that the professed dying declaration was made under a solemn sense of impending dissolution. The proof showed that he was shot in the stomach, thigh and arm; that the wound in his stomach produced his death within five days. In his dying declaration the deceased used this language: "He says that he believes that he is going to die from the effects of said wounds, and desires to make a statement as to how and why he was shot," and then proceeded with his statement, and closed with the following words: "I do not believe that there is any chance for me to get well, and I make all the aforesaid statements, believing that I am going to die from the effects of said wounds." His mother made the following statement: "Before he made his dying declaration he said he believed he was going to die, and never said anything else, but said all the time that he was going to die."

While the question is a close one, and doubtful as to whether the declaration was made in extremis, we do not feel inclined to decide that it was incompetent as evidence. This court, in the case of Baker v. Commonwealth, 20 Ky. Law Rep., 1788, used this language: "It may be possible that we should have reached a different conclusion from the trial court as to the admissibility of these statements of the deceased as dying declarations, but it was necessary for the judge of that court to first determine the question of fact, viz., whether at the time the declarations were made they were made under a sense of impending dissolution, and when all hope of this world was gone, before he could decide the legal question of their admissibility. The question of fact is bound up in, and is a part of, the question of law. We should, therefore, give some weight to the finding of the trial judge upon this question as he heard the witnesses testify, and was perhaps in a better position to estimate the value of their testimony than this court can be from the bald record of the words they used; and as the question in the case at bar seems to us to be a close one, we are not inclined to disturb his ruling upon this point."

In the case of Green v. Commonwealth, 13 Ky. Law Rep., 897, the court said: "The character of the wound and the attending circumstances may be sufficient to show that the declarant had no hope of recovery."

We are of the opinion that the court erred in its instructions to the jury. The first instruction given by the court is as follows: "If you believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant, Len Martin, in Whitley county, Ky., before the 28th day of August, 1908, unlawfully feloniously, willfully, that is, intentionally, either with or without this malice aforethought, and not in his necessary, or apparently necessary, self-defense, discharged a pistol loaded with powder, leaden balls, or other explosive and hard substance, against the body of Wesley Woods, thereby inflicting a wound from which the said Woods died within a year and a day thereafter, you will find him guilty of murder if the shooting was done with malice aforethought; guilty of voluntary manslaughter if done without such malice."

This was the only instruction given which had any application to the definition of murder or manslaughter, and was calculated to mislead the jury. It would have been better to have given an instruction on the question of murder and another instruction on the question of voluntary manslaughter. The words "that is, intentionally" interpolated in this instruction were improper and calculated to mislead the jury, and the only definition of manslaughter as used in this instruction was given in the last sentence, namely, "manslaughter, if done without such malice." The elements of "affray," "sudden heat and passion," and "provocation ordinarily calculated to excite passion beyond control," necessary to make it a proper instruction, were entirely omitted.

Instruction No. 2, or self-defense, was also prejudicial. It was erroneous in this: "Defendant believed, and had reasonable grounds to believe, that he was in danger, etc." The court should have used in substance these words: Defendant had reasonable grounds to believe, either real or apparent, and did believe that he was then in imminent danger of losing his life or suffering great bodily harm at the hands of Woods, and shot to protect himself from such danger, then in such case you will find him not guilty. The danger to one's life or great bodily harm to his person, which authorizes a person to act in his defense, may be real or only apparent danger.

As to the third error in permitting incompetent evidence on behalf of the Commonwealth, and rejecting competent evidence offered by appellant, the facts as they appear of record are as follows: The appellant, to impeach the credit and lessen the effect of the dying declaration of the deceased, introduced, among other evidence, the records of the Whitley Circuit Court showing that the deceased had been convicted of the crime of grand larceny and had been sent to the penitentiary. The Commonwealth then introduced and had read a pardon to the deceased for this crime. The court should not have permitted this pardon to have been introduced as evidence. The appellant offered to prove from the records, by the circuit clerk of Whitley county and the police judge of Williamsburg, that the deceased was guilty of committing many breaches of the peace and much disorderly conduct, for which he had been tried and fined in the two courts. The court refused to permit appellant to introduce this proof. In this the court was right. The Code of Practice permits a witness to be impeached, but not by evidence of particular wrongful acts, except that it may be shown by the examination of a witness or record or judgment that he has been convicted of a felony, but not of misdemeanors.

For these reasons the judgment of the lower court is reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings consistent herewith.

MILLER v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed March 4, 1904.)

Chas. J. Bronston for appellant.

Clifton J. Pratt and M. R. Todd for appellee.

Appeal from Fayette Circuit Court.

Judge O'Rear delivered the following response to petition for rehearing:

The very earnest and able petition for rehearing in this case complains especially that the opinion ignores and is in conflict with a number of previous opinions of this court, as well as conflicts with section 126, Criminal Code, in holding the indictment not bad for duplicity. Commonwealth v. Perrigo, 8 Met., 5; Huff v. Commonwealth, 19 Ky. Law Rep., 1065, and Ellis v. Commonwealth, 78 Ky., 130, are cited and relied on. Whether or not the indictment may have been bad for the reason stated, under section 126 of the Criminal Code, does not appear to us to be material in this case. Section 1960 of the statute (Kentucky Statutes, 1903) denounces the offenses of setting up, keeping, carrying on and managing, or assisting therein, a keno bank, faro bank, "or other machine or contrivance used in betting, whereby money or other thing may be won or lost." Section 1961 provides: "An indictment for a violation of the preceding section may charge the accused in one count with any or all of the offenses mentioned or included therein."

These sections were enacted in their present form April 8, 1893. As to the offenses therein created section 126 of the Criminal Code can not apply. It was certainly competent for the legislature to provide that two or more offenses might be joined in one indictment. Having so provided subsequent to the enactment of the section of the Code relied on, the provisions of that section are manifestly inapplicable. For the same reason the decisions cited can not be authority against the sufficiency of this indictment. The Commonwealth might have charged in the indictment the commission of all the offenses named in section 1960, and upon proof of any one of them the defendant should have been found guilty; that the circuit court restricted the proof to the inquiry whether the accused conducted a faro bank can not be prejudicial to any legal right of his.

The position that uncontradicted affidavits filed in support of a ground for a new trial become a part of the record as if the facts therein stated had been recited in the bill of exceptions is clearly untenable. The office of the bill of exceptions is to make a veritable record of the proceedings in court had upon the trial. It particularly shows the rulings of the trial judge upon the motions and objections to evidence as therein recited. It is confessedly the truth as to what occurred, and is the judge's certificate of it.

If after the trial a party by his ex parte affidavit could enlarge the bill so as to incorporate new matter not appearing therein, including the action of the trial judge thereon, it would be to make the party's certificate supersede the judge's. It might as well be allowed that a party by such practice could diminish the bill by showing by his affidavit that what was certified to by the judge did not occur. The fact that the affidavit is uncontradicted we deem immaterial; that the bill of exceptions does not contain the matter is the judge's certificate that it didn't occur, for his certificate implies that.

the bill shows all that did occur, and is conclusive, except that a bystander's bill may be made as to evidence. (Sections 333-340, Civil Code; Patterson v. Commonwealth, 86 Ky., 313; Patterson v. Commonwealth, 99 Ky., 610.) The question has been frequently passed upon by this court contrary to appellant's contention.

It would have been sufficient to say as to the occurrence when the witness, Oder, was on the stand, that appellant did not move to exclude or withdraw the objectionable statement from the jury. His motion was to discharge the jury. In view of the fact that other witnesses had proven the same fact, that is, that appellant was the dealer in a game of faro at the place and time stated in the indictment, the motion to set aside the swearing of the jury was properly overruled. If appellant had moved to have the remark objected to withdrawn from the jury's consideration, it would doubtless have been sustained, and the jury admonished properly to disregard it. It is not every lapse in the course of a criminal trial that justifies the withdrawal of the case from the jury. There may be instances where the prejudicial effect of an objectionable proceeding is such that it can not be removed from the jury's mind, and, therefore, it would be improper to let that jury conclude the case. But here the witness, Oder, denied that he had seen the accused dealing the game of faro, though he was in the room at the time. The effect of this witness' statement, so far as connecting the accused with the game, was probably nil. The Commonwealth's attorney, in endeavoring to have him go further, essayed the statement to the court in the hearing of the jury that the witness had, in his examination before the grand jury, given different evidence. The sole effect of that statement, if testified to by a competent witness, would have been to impeach the witness, Oder. However, if there had been no other evidence of appellant's guilt, the jury might have inferred that the Commonwealth's attorney was correctly stating what the witness had said under oath, when not confronted by the accused, and that his statements were then true, and from that circumstance alone found that appellant was in fact the dealer in the game. But in fact other witnesses had testified that appellant was the dealer in that game, therefore, there was competent evidence of the main fact before the jury. The trial court, at most, should have excluded the Commonwealth's attorney's statement of what occurred before the grand jury, with proper admonition, and proceeded with the trial. But instead of asking for what he was entitled to, appellant asked for what he was not entitled to. His motion was properly overruled. This conclusion is reached independent of the statement in appellant's affidavit in support of motion for new trial, that the trial judge did exclude the objectionable matter. Nor is it based upon the fact that appellant subsequently testified in his own behalf that he was the dealer in the game, but relied on the claim that it was not faro, but baccarat. What was said in the opinion as to the statements of appellant in his affidavit, and when a witness for himself, was to show that by his own admissions in the record his substantial rights had not been prejudiced by the matter complained of.

The petition is overruled.

LOUISVILLE RAILWAY CO. v. COLSTON.

(Filed March 4, 1904.)

Railroads—Instructions—In an action for damages for injuries sustained by being run over by a street car, an instruction was erroneous which told the jury they should find for defendant, except as they believed from the evidence that defendant knew of the peril of appellee, or could have discovered it in time to have avoided injuring her, by the use of ordinary care, when it appeared from the record that the conductor believed that she was only waiting by the track to get on the car instead of her purpose to cross the track, because in the mind of the motorman she was not in peril.

Fairleigh, Straus & Fairleigh for appellant.

O'Neal & O'Neal, A. E. Willson and R. T. Colston for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Common Pleas Branch, Second Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

Appellee was injured while crossing the intersection of Bismark and Twenty-Eighth streets by one of appellant's cars running against her. She was crossing the intersection diagonally so as to reach the opposite side and corner to take passage on the car. She had seen the car approaching, and had motioned to the motorman that she wanted to get on it. The motorman saw her and understood her signal. There were other passengers waiting at the corner for the car. Without looking back, or paying further heed to the approaching car, appellee continued her course. As she stepped upon the track the car struck her. The motorman saw her plainly. But although she was going at an angle intersecting the track at a point in advance of the car, he thought that she would pause long enough to let the car pass, and then cross behind it, as is usual. Instead, she stepped upon the track too late for him to stop the car before striking her.

It is complained that he neither sounded his gong nor gave other signal of his approach. The purpose of sounding gongs on street cars is to notify persons on or about to cross the track that the car is approaching, so that they may govern their actions with safety. Where, however, the pedestrian sees the car and knows of its approach, every purpose of the rule for sounding the gong has been fulfilled. The failure, therefore, of the motorman to sound the gong is not negligence to such pedestrian if the latter sees or knows of the proximity and approach of the car.

The instructions fairly state the law of the case, except in qualifying the defendant's right to rely on plaintiff's contributory negligence. The jury were told that if the plaintiff was herself negligent in going upon the track, and that but for her negligence she would not have been injured, the jury should find for the defendant, although defendant's servant in charge was negligent as charged, unless they further found from the evidence that defendant knew of her peril, or by ordinary care might have discovered it, in time to have avoided injuring her by the use of ordinary care. This rule of qualification has been approved and applied in certain cases where it was the duty of the railway company to be on the lookout for persons rightfully using its tracks at the point of injury. But we are of opinion that the instruction had no place in this case. Plaintiff was not in apparent peril until the moment she stepped upon the track, or showed her intention to do so. Being close to the track did not alone constitute peril. It was impossible for the motorman to know what was in her mind, or that she intended doing such an unusual and hazardous thing as to step in front of a car which she had just seen, and which he knew she had seen, and which she knew was passing over the track to the usual and known stopping place at the corner. It is common, and very common, for persons to cross the street railway tracks at other points than regular crossings, especially in crossing street intersections diagonally. The motorman's duty is then to warn the pedestrians of the car's approach. If every time a motorman sees a pedestrian leave the sidewalk and approach the track he must stop his car, such traffic would have to yield to the pedestrians entirely. While pedestrians have an equal right with others to use the streets in the ordinary manner, yet they must do so with respect to the rights of other travelers, including the street cars. As the latter are bound to go on their tracks alone, and can not give way, nor stop so easily as the pedestrian, the latter reasonably should yield the right of way along the track. This is both customary and necessary, and must be known alike to the motorman and pedestrian. Each should govern his actions accordingly unless he has notice that the other is about to disregard the rule and his own safety. In that event, however unjustifiable the other maybe every care then within the motorman's power to avoid injuring the other must be observed.

Appellee may have been in peril, in one sense, from the moment she started from the sidewalk toward the track. But aside from her having for the moment lost thought of the danger to herself, and, therefore, determined to continue her course across the track ahead of the approaching car, she was not apparently in peril. To the mind of the motorman she was not in peril unless by her actions he could see that she was oblivious of the nearness of the car, and intended to continue her course without regard to it. But there was nothing in the evidence in this case that would reasonably indicate that to the motorman. The qualification of the instruction as given was misleading.

Reversed and remanded for a new trial under proceedings not inconsistent herewith.

COX v. COX'S EX'OR.

(Filed March 4, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Evidence—Burden of proof—Where the payee in a note had various settlements with the maker, and the settlements were admitted by the maker, a note executed by her will be upheld because to every written obligation the statute imports a consideration, and the note in this action being supported by circumstances material to the controversy, the judgment of the lower court, that the note was not the act and deed of the maker and that it was without consideration, was erroneous.

J. I. Blanton for appellant.

W. S. Cason for appellee.

Appeal from Harrison Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

A. A. Cox was the mother of appellant, W. H. Cox. She was a widow for many years before her death. She had a large body of farming land and other property, which appellant managed, or helped her to manage. A short while before her death she brought this suit against appellant, alleging that he was claiming that she was indebted to him because of certain notes and checks held by him, and which he was asserting she had executed. The suit seems to have been instigated by other members of her family. She averred that the notes and drafts were without consideration, and that she had not executed them. Appellant was called upon to assert his demands in this action so that she could plead specifically to them. Without objection to the form or nature of the action appellant filed his answer, and made it a counterclaim against appellant, setting up a certain note for $3,784, dated April 16, 1892, with several credits endorsed, which he alleged she had executed and delivered to him. By reply she denied the execution of the note, and pleaded that it was wholly without consideration. The issue being joined, a large volume of proof was taken by the parties, upon which the circuit court found that the note was not the act and deed of Mrs. Cox, and also found that there was no consideration for it. Upon the issue of non est factum appellant had the burden of proof; and, in our opinion, he clearly sustained it. Mrs. Cox gave her deposition in the case, and testified concerning the transaction. The sum of her testimony is that she did not remember the execution of the paper, but rather admits that the signature is hers. It is abundantly proven by appellant, and otherwise.

Upon the plea of no consideration appellee had the burden. Whether it was sustained is the question. The determination of this point has given us a great deal of difficulty. It would not be profitable in this opinion to undertake to minutely array the various facts and circumstances shown in evidence, nor to follow the witnesses in their statements. The very best result of a repeated examination of the evidence is to leave our minds unsatisfied that the plea has been sustained, whatever may be the truth of the matter. Appellant had transacted nearly all of his mother's business for about twenty years, including the winding up of certain of the affairs of her husband's estate. The transactions do not appear to have been kept in any regular or certain form. Appellant during the whole of the time was blind. His mother appears to have been a woman of very limited business experience. Appellant was trusted by her to look after and manage much of her business, and so far as the record shows did it very well, in the main. He failed, though, to keep books, showing his transactions. Yet from time to time he had settlements with his mother, and was constantly in communication with her about her affairs. Others of her children were at home, and had opportunities for knowing what was being done. Appellant claims that all the matters to which he attended for his mother had been settled with her. Writings are shown in evidence signed by her, in which she admits as much. It is the contention of appellant that the note in suit is the balance found to be owing him by his mother on one of these settlements. Appellee asserts that he has failed to show wherein and how the note represents any balance at any time owing by Mrs. Cox to appellant; that appellant did furnish money to his mother, and that she applied to him for loans from time to time, and that there were settlements between them is clearly proven in this record. But the money advanced and accounts paid and put into the record are not enough to account for the note. Besides, appellant was collecting money for his mother, and placed some of it to his own credit in bank. He then paid out for her numerous merchandise bills and other debts. From the fragmentary transactions brought forward in the record it is impossible to say, with any feeling of accuracy, that appellant has shown that the alleged consideration for the note actually passed. From this it is argued appellant has failed. If the burden on this branch of the case was on appellant, we should say, too, that he has failed. But to every written obligation under our statute there is imported a consideration, and the burden of showing the contrary is upon the maker. In some instances it may be so that the payee may be called as a witness against himself, and when he claims a certain consideration for the paper, yet fails to satisfactorily establish it, the maker has sustained his plea of no consideration. But here the payee of the note shows that there had been numerous transactions between him and his mother, in which he had advanced her money, and that they had had settlements covering these transactions at times when the recollection of all the parties was better, because nearer to them, and when the accessibility of the evidence affecting the various items was presumably within reach of all. Now, after the evidences of many of the transactions have been turned over to the other party, who has since died, after forgetfulness had obliterated many of them from the minds of the actors, it is sought to defeat the note given upon the settlement because the payee can not show the exact consideration for it. Another rule of law here intervenes, which is, that he who would seek to surcharge a settlement made with him must show wherein it is erroneous. The party holding the note, and showing that it was given many years ago upon a settlement of complicated accounts, is entitled to the benefit of all presumptions as to the sufficiency of the consideration until the maker of the note shows that it embraces items not properly chargeable therein. Else settlements are of no value; and the reduction of running accounts to a note, upon a full settlement, leaves the payee of the note in no better position than he was before.

The evidence on behalf of appellees leaves the mind in great doubt whether the note was executed for a fair and full consideration or not. It is utterly impossible to now state the accounts of these parties as of the date of the note. Yet it is not shown at all that any item embraced in the note was improperly charged against the maker, or that she failed to receive credit for any sum that she was entitled to. To support the judgment below necessarily involves our finding from the evidence that the note is a forgery; that it is a purposeful attempt of appellant to commit fraud against his mother, having all the moral ingredients of theft, and that appellant, his wife and his son have, to accomplish these ends, added perjury to the main offenses. We are unwilling to impose such a finding in the absence of evidence clearly establishing it. Mere suspicion, isolated transactions, unexplained and unsatisfactory, are not enough. No witness for appellees, nor all of them together, say enough to justify such a grave conclusion. The circuit court must have proceeded upon the theory that appellant had failed to satisfactorily explain or show the consideration of the note. He did testify it was for money advanced to his mother at her request from time to time, and was the result of a settlement between them; that he did not keep books of account to verify his statements is not enough to condemn the transaction as unbelievable. There is not enough evidence to support appellee's plea of no consideration, and the circuit court should have adjudged accordingly.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded, with directions to enter a judgment in conformity herewith.

SPARKS v. WALDEN, &c.

(Filed March 4, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Attorney's fee—In an action by appellant to enforce a mortgage lien for a balance of $270 for an alleged attorney's fee and for furnishing a bail bond, where it appears from the evidence that the appellees were ignorant people, one of them being barely able to write his name, the other unable to do so, and that the mortgage was procured by fraud, it being the belief of appellees that its only purpose was to secure appellant upon his making a bail bond, the judgment of the lower court in favor of appellant for $20 will not be disturbed, it appearing that $100 was a reasonable fee, and that $80 had been paid the attorney.

D. K. Rawlings for appellant.

Parker, Johnson & Evans for appellees.

Appeal from Laurel Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle.

The appellant, James Sparks, sued in the Laurel Circuit Court to recover of the appellee, W. C. B. Walden, $270, alleged balance claimed by him as an attorney's fee for furnishing the appellee bail and defending him in the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Kentucky against the charge of defrauding the United States government, of which offense appellee stood indicted in that court.

The petition sets forth the employment of appellant by the appellee and the undertaking of the former to render the services mentioned for a fee of $350, of which amount $80 was paid at the time of appellant's employment, and that as security for the remaining $270, and to indemnify appellant against loss upon the bail bond to be furnished by him for the appearance of appellee to answer the indictment in the Federal court, appellee, together with his wife, Qumi Walden, executed and delivered to appellant a mortgage upon certain lands and personal property therein described, which was acknowledged and recorded as required by law. It is also averred in the petition that appellant obtained a transfer of the indictment and prosecution of appellee from Catlettsburg to Lebanon, after which he furnished for him the bail bond as agreed, and thereby secured his release from prison, and finally that he made defense for him upon the trial had under the indictment, but that, notwithstanding appellant's full compliance with his contract with the appellee, the latter had wholly failed to pay him the $270, balance of the fee due him. Wherefore, he prayed judgment against appellee for that sum, for the enforcement of the mortgage given as alleged to secure its payment, and for a specific attachment against the personal property conveyed by the mortgage as authorized by section 249, Civil Code.

The specific attachment was issued and certain of the personal property described in the mortgage was taken by the sheriff under it, and thereafter placed in the hands of a receiver, by whom it was sold under an order of court. Answer was filed to the petition by the appellee, W. C. B. Walden, and Qumi Walden, his wife (she having been made a party to the action by appellant), wherein it was denied that the appellee, W. C. B. Walden, agreed to pay appellant $350 as a fee for the alleged services to be performed for him, or that he was indebted to appellant in the sum of $270, or any other sum exceeding $30 as a balance due upon such fee.

In addition it is averred in the answer that the appellee, W. C. B. Walden, through his brother-in-law, Alexander Smith, did employ appellant to make for him a bail bond, and assist in his defense in the prosecution against him in the Federal court, for which he was to be paid $100, and this sum appellant agreed to accept in full payment of his services, and $50 thereof was then and there paid him by Alexander Smith for appellee, leaving only $50 of the agreed fee unpaid. It is further averred in the answer that the mortgage was executed by the appellee for the sole purpose of indemnifying appellant against loss by reason of his suretyship upon, and the furnishing of, the bail bond, and that appellees executed the mortgage without any knowledge of the fact that it contained the provision that it was also given to secure the appellant in the attorney's fee; that appellees are both illiterate, the appellee, W. C. B. Walden, being barely able to write his name, and his wife wholly unable to do so, and that in obtaining their signatures to and acknowledgment of the mortgage, the appellant practiced upon them a fraud, in that he falsely represented to them that the only purpose of the mortgage was to secure him against loss as to the bail bond, and to prevent the Federal government from levying on and selling the property of the appellee, W. C. B. Walden, in satisfaction of a judgment which it had obtained against him on a forfeited bail bond; and further, that there were no exemption allowed a housekeeper with a family under the laws of the United States. It is also averred in the answer that appellees were induced to execute the mortgage by the foregoing alleged false and fraudulent representations of appellant, and that they would not have done so if they had known that it gave a lien upon their property to secure a fee to the appellant.

It is denied in the answer that appellant was present or rendered any assistance to the appellee, W. C. B. Walden, in the trial of his case in the Federal court, or that he rendered him any service as an attorney except to provide him a bond to secure his release from jail pending the trial of the indictment. Upon the contrary, it is averred by appellees that the appellee, W. C. B. Walden, employed the law firm of O'Neal, Parker & Trosper to defend him in the trial of his case in the Federal court, and they did perform that service for him under such employment, though there was little for them to do, as appellee pleaded guilty to the charge against him, and by reason thereof received the lowest penalty that could be inflicted under the law, which was confinement for one year in the penitentiary. The material averments of the answer were denied by reply, and after the taking of proof by Both parties the cause was submitted for trial, whereupon the lower court rendered judgment in appellant's favor for $20, the amount remaining unpaid of the $100 admitted by the appellees to have been promised him. Being dissatisfied with the judgment of the lower court, appellant insists that it should be reversed.

Appellant testified in substance that the contract of employment was made with him by Alexander Smith, the brother-in-law of the appellee, W. C. B. Walden, but that Smith was unwilling to agree to the payment of a greater sum than $100, yet did agree that the amount of the fee over and above the $100 should be left for adjustment between appellant and appellee, W. C. B. Walden, when the latter and his wife should execute the mortgage. This statement was denied by Smith, who testified that the $100 was the only fee discussed or agreed upon; that that sum was accepted by appellant in full for the services to be performed by him under the employment, and that he then paid him $80 of the $100 thus agreed upon.

Smith also testified that the mortgage was to be given only for the purpose of affording appellant indemnity against loss as bail for appellee, W. C. B. Walden, and to protect the property of appellees from seizure and sale at the hands of the Federal government in satisfaction of its judgment against appellee, W. C. B. Walden.

The appellee, W. C. B. Walden, was in the penitentiary at Atlanta, Ga., when the depositions were taken in this case, and his deposition does not appear in the record; in fact it was not taken, but that of his wife does appear in the record, and it shows that she did not know that a lien was given by the mortgage to secure an attorney's fee, but, upon the contrary, that she was induced by the appellant to believe that the mortgage was to secure him against loss on the bond, and to protect her husband's property from the officers of the Federal government. The only other person present at the time of the employment of appellant by Smith was one Cris Jackson, who was an occupant of appellant's office. Jackson, at appellant's dictation, wrote the receipt that was given Smith for the $80 paid appellant on the fee. This witness corroborated appellant, but as he was impeached by proof of his conviction of a felony, it is highly probable that the chancellor gave his testimony very little weight.

There are several circumstances of more than ordinary significance connected with the transactions between the parties to this litigation that are apparently corroborative of Smith's version of the contract, and doubtless had some influence upon the conclusions of the chancellor. For example, if, as contended by appellant, he advised Smith, appellee's agent, that his entire fee under his employment by the appellee, W. C. B. Walden, would be $350, that is, $270 in addition to the $80 then paid him by Smith, why did he not, in subsequently preparing the mortgage for appellee's signature and acknowledgment, insert in it the amount of his fee? Or, if the amount of the fee was known to the appellees before, or when they executed the mortgage, why did appellant not require them to execute a note for it? Again, the service performed by appellant under his employment was greatly disproportionate to the amount claimed. The services rendered may have been worth $100. They certainly were not worth $350. Appellant claims, however, that though he was not present at the trial of appellee, W. C. B. Walden, he employed one Bruner to assist him in the case, in some way unexplained, and that at the time of his (appellant's) employment he informed Smith that he would have to employ Bruner, and pay him $100. But he does not contend that Smith or his principal agreed to the employment of Bruner or undertook to pay him. Besides, Smith denies that he was told of the supposed necessity for the employment of Bruner, and even if Bruner was employed by appellant, as claimed, the appellee was not liable for the cost of such employment unless he consented thereto, with knowledge that he would be expected to pay for the services rendered by Bruner.

There is yet to be mentioned a fact which was no doubt all powerful in its influence upon the mind of the chancellor in the determination of this case. We refer to the receipt that was given by appellant to Smith at the time of the payment by the latter of the $30. Its language is as follows:

"Received of Alex. Smith the sum of $30 as part payment of a fee in the representation of W. C. B. Walden, charged with violation of the statute pending in the Catlettsburg United States Court, and I am to furnish a bond for said Walden, and he is to execute to me a mortgage to secure me in doing so on his property. The fee is to be $20, paid in cash, as a fee to represent said Walden.

"This the 5th day of June, 1902.

"JAMES SPARKS."

The receipt is awkwardly expressed, yet it is reasonably clear in its meaning in three respects: It shows the $30 paid appellant by Smith constituted the fee he was to receive, except $20. Also that the one fee was to compensate him for furnishing the bond and representing or defending the appellee, W. C. B. Walden, upon the trial. And finally, that the only purpose of the mortgage, as expressed therein, was to secure him in furnishing or going on the bond. As stated, the language of the receipt was dictated by appellant, who is a lawyer, and it was manifestly his intention that it should recite the agreement entered into between himself and Smith, the agent of appellee, W. C. B. Walden.

A careful examination of the record convinces us that the judgment of the chancellor is sustained by the evidence, and it is, therefore, affirmed.

HARRIS v. GREENLEAF, & Co.

(Filed March 8, 1904.)

Lands—Where appellant bought of appellees lots at the price of $100, they agreeing that upon its payment, on October 1, 1899, they would make him a deed, he paid $10, and paid the taxes for several years while in possession, when appellees forcibly took possession of the lots, in an action by him for a specific execution of the contract, alleging his willingness and ability to pay the balance of the consideration, and that he had afterward got the money and sent it to appellees who would not receive it. It was error for the chancellor to sustain a demurrer to his petition upon those allegations. Such an allegation is not a good legal tender, but it shows such a state of case as in equity should excuse a better tender, leaving the rights of the parties to be adjusted by the chancellor.

Burnam & Moberley for appellant.

J. C. & D. M. Chenault for appellees.

Appeal from Madison Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

Harris bought of Greenleaf three lots at $25 each, and executed his notes, with two of his children as co-obligors, for the purchase price. Greenleaf executed a bond for title, stipulating that "said Greenleaf is and be not required to make said deed until all the $75 is paid in full." Harris was put into possession. Later, he says, he was induced to sign another paper with Greenleaf and Evans, whereby the latter agreed to sell to Harris the same lots at the price of $100 in the aggregate, to be paid October 1, 1899. In that paper it was covenanted that on payment of said sum Greenleaf and Evans were to make Harris a good and sufficient warranty deed. But it was further stipulated that in event Harris failed to pay the $100 as agreed, that he thereby relinquished all rights or claim to the land, and was to "give up his contract and also peaceful possession of said land without any recourse at law or in any other way."

Harris paid $10 of the purchase price, and paid the tax for the two or three years while in possession, but failed to pay as required by the contracts. He avers that thereupon appellees forcibly took, and now keep, the possession of the lots. He brought this suit in equity for a specific execution of the original contract of purchase, alleging his willingness and ability to pay the balance of the consideration, and asking an accounting, and credit for the value of the use of the lots during the time that he was wrongfully kept out of possession by defendants.

A demurrer was sustained to his petition, and, failing to amend, it was dismissed. From the arguments here we assume the ground of the demurrer upon which the court held the petition defective was because of the failure of the plaintiff to allege that he had tendered the balance of the purchase price, and because he failed to tender it with his petition. Appellees contend that before the vendee in a contract for the sale of land can maintain an action for its specific execution he must show not only that it is fair and reasonable, but that he has been duly diligent, and has performed, or has offered to perform, the conditions imposed on him by the contract, and that in the matter of the payment of the consideration the only sufficient offer of performance is a legal tender of the balance of the purchase price.

While it is true that where a right is made dependent upon the payment of money the general rule is that an action can not be maintained to enforce such right without allegation of a tender of the money, yet in equity this fundamental rule is subject to modifications and exceptions. If the party suing avers that he is ready and willing to do all the acts required of him in the specific execution of the contract according to its terms, it may be enforced, other equitable requirements being satisfied. In general, the rules of equity governing an actual tender are not so stringent as those of the law. In discussing the necessity of an actual tender in contracts in which time is not essential it is admitted in the note to section 1407, Pomeroy's Eq. Jur., that the American decisions are conflicting on the subject. But the author declares that a certain "group of decisions adopts a rule more in accordance with the principles of equity, viz., that in such contracts an actual tender or demand by the plaintiff prior to the suit is not essential. It is enough that he was ready and willing, and offered at the time specified, and even that he is ready and willing at the time of bringing the suit, unless his rights have been lost by laches, and that he offers to perform in his pleading. The plaintiff's performance will be provided for in the decree and his previous neglect will only affect his right to costs."

Among the numerous decisions cited as supporting the text is the case from this court of Woodson v. Scott, 1 Dana, 470. The author adds, in which we concur: "This is unquestionably the true equitable doctrine."

The case of Hart v. Brand, 1 Mar., 159, is enough like this one to make its principles applicable. Hart covenanted to convey to Brand a certain tract of land at $25 per acre, payable in installments. The land was to be conveyed upon payment of the first installment, the purchaser to give a deed of trust to secure the deferred payments. The circuit court decreed the execution of the contract, and Hart appealed. There was not a tender by the vendee of the purchase money, that is, there was not a legal tender, though the vendee having the money at deposit with a banker offered a check upon the latter, which the vendor refused, and would not wait till the specie could be got from the bank so as to make the tender good. The vendor at the same time tendered his deed. In fine, there was an apparent technical compliance by the vendor and noncompliance by the vendee, from which the vendor assumed that he was absolved from the contract. It does not appear that any other tender was attempted, and the vendee brought his suit for specific execution. The absence of the tender was relied on in defense. The court said: "Whether equity ought to give the relief sought surely depends on the circumstances of the case."

And we may add that this is the universal rule. After showing a vain effort by the vendee to make a valid tender, and the vendor's leaving without giving him further chance to complete it, the court went on to say: "But the agreement did not depend on the payment of the money as a condition precedent, whereby the mere casual failure to make payment on the precise day should render it invalid. It is sufficient to justify the aid of a court of chancery that the purchaser has, with good faith, shown a willingness and readiness, without injury to the vendor, to perform substantially the agreement."

The court lays some stress on the fact of the vendor's having been instrumental in a measure in producing the delay, "giving countenance thereto by lying back." In Hunter v. Daniel, 4 Hare, 420, 30 Eng. Ch. Rep., 420, a case very much like this one in lacking a tender by the plaintiff before suit brought for specific performance, the argument was submitted that payment was a condition precedent to the right of the plaintiff to call for the execution of the agreement, and it was argued that the bill could not properly be filed before the plaintiff had, out of court, fully performed his agreement. The court responded: "The general rule in equity certainly is not of that strict character. A party filing a bill submits to do everything that is required of him; and the practice of the court is not to require the party to make a formal tender where, as in this case, from the facts stated in the bill, or from the evidence, it appears that the tender would have been a mere form, and that the party to whom it was made would have refused to accept the money."

The case of Webster v. French, 11 Ill., 254-279, contains a very full and interesting discussion of this question. A number of cases are examined and applied, some of which were thought to be, though in fact were not, opposed to the conclusion reached by the court, among the number being Jarboe v. McAlle's Heirs, 7 Ben. Mon., 279. The court, speaking through Mr. Justice Catron, thus announced its conclusion: "The result of my examination of this subject clearly shows that the court of chancery is not bound down by any fixed rules on this subject, by which it will allow the substantial ends of justice to be perverted or defeated by the omission of an unimportant or useless act, which nothing but the merest technicality could require. The money may, at any time, be ordered to be brought into court, whenever the rights of the opposite party may require it; but while he is insisting that the money is not his, and that he is not bound to accept it, it would seem to be a matter of no great consequence to him whether it is in the custody of the court or not. The court possesses a liberal and enlarged discretion on this subject, by the proper exercise of which the rights of all parties may be protected." To the same effect are Brock v. Hidy, 13 Ohio St., 306, and Deichmann v. Deichmann, 49 Mo., 107.

The following allegations of the petition in the case at bar bear on the question being considered: "Plaintiff further states that afterward, and while he was in possession of said lots of ground, to wit, on the 16th of January, 1900, he again saw defendant Greenleaf and paid him $10, for which said Greenleaf executed to him, on the 16th of January, 1900, the receipt filed herewith (marked Z) and signed Evans and Greenleaf, and said defendant Greenleaf then agreed with plaintiff he should have a prolongation of the time in which to pay for this land, and stating that he would not have any wrong done plaintiff, but his deed should be made to him; and the plaintiff remained in possession of his lots of ground until ——— day of ———, 1901, when defendant Evans arbitrarily, and without any legal authority whatsoever, and against the rights and consent of this plaintiff, took forcible possession of same, and by his laborers and employes has been using same and getting the rents and benefits of same, and claiming that under the contract of April 5, 1899, they belong to defendants, and that plaintiff has now no right to said land or to a deed for same. Plaintiff afterward, through a friend, got the money and offered to pay Greenleaf, and defendant Evans would not agree to it. * * * Plaintiff is ready and willing to do what is fair and equitable, and to pay what is justly due defendants, after the deduction of what is reasonable and just for the use of same during the time possession had been withheld from him."

Appellees argue that that is not a good allegation of a legal tender. It is not. Nor do we understand that it was so intended by the pleader. But in our opinion it does show such a state of case as in equity should excuse a better tender, leaving the rights of the parties to be adjusted and enforced by the chancellor by appropriate decree, as was done in Hart v. Brand, supra.

The provision in the last contract, if there be anything to support that instrument, for the vendee to forfeit his contract and all rights under it, including possession of the lots, upon nonpayment of the full purchase price at the time indicated in the paper, was merely a form of additional security. Of a somewhat similar arrangement this court in Kercheval v. Swope, 6

Mon., 367, quoted approvingly the following language of Lord Chance Harwick in Vernon v. Stephens, 2 Pr. Wms., 66: "If the defendant has money and interest and costs, he will have no reason to complain of having suffered; on the contrary, it would be a very great hardship on the plaintiff to lose all the money he has paid; lapse of time in payment may be recompensed with interest and costs. And as to these agreements, they were intended only as a security for payment of the money, which end is answered by the payment of principal, interest and costs."

Of the principal case on this point this court said: "The payment of money, after Swope should enter for default of payment, was contemplated and that Swope's entry and holding the land and improvements was induced as a security and incentive to payment by Kercheval, but was not intended to vacate the agreement. And if it had been, a court of equity would relieve against a hardship and penalty, so grievous to the one party, while the other party, Swope, had received part performance, and held the land for the money, not vacated or released, nor extinguished by such entry on the land." (Page 371.)

True in this case the cash payment was only $10 and taxes of no amount. But that was by no means all that appellant was made to pay by the contract if the averments of this petition be taken as true, as must be, for he says that the lots had increased in value till they are worth $375. So he would lose that enhancement, which was undoubtedly his when he paid the purchase money.

Appellees contend that this enhancement of value alone is an equitable consideration against the enforcement of the contract. Where consideration has so materially altered between the making of a contract and a decision to enforce it that it would be unjust to the resisting party to enforce its execution, a court of chancery may, and should, refuse its aid in enforcing it. But generally mere increase in value of the property sold, before the specific enforcement is sought, but after the vendee has performed and is bound for the purchase price, and where his delay in paying to pay the balance is not unreasonable and not in bad faith, is enough to stay the chancellor's hand. People buy and sell with an expectation of natural increase or fall in values. If the value of the lots had been naturally ever so low it would have constituted no defense to an action brought by the vendors to collect the purchase money. As held by the Court of Appeals of New York in Prospect, &c., R. R. Co. v. Coney Island R. R. Co., 1 Am. & Eng. Decisions in Equity, 888, generally a contract to be judged as of the time at which it was entered into, and if fairly made, the fact that it has become a hard one by force of subsequent circumstances or changing events will not necessarily prevent its specific enforcement. It is stated that the exception to the foregoing rule is where circumstances arising subsequent to the making of the contract are such that enforcement would be a great hardship to the defendant, and be of no benefit to the plaintiff. We are of opinion that the demurrer should have been overruled.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded for proceedings not inconsistent herewith.

BICKEL, &c. v. BICKEL, EXOR, &c.

1. Husband and wife—Insurance—In an action by the wife against the deceased husband's executor, in which she sought to recover the part of an insurance policy which was payable to his deceased former wife, the lower court erred in adjudging that under the "Weissinger Act" he had the right to dispose of his personal property with a view of defrauding his wife in her marital rights, because it was not intended by this statute that either the husband or wife should intentionally commit a fraud upon the other in the disposition of their personal property.

2. Assignment of insurance policy—An assignment of an insurance policy by one on the evening before his death on the next day will not be upheld where the evidence conduced to show that he was not in such condition of mind as to understand the nature and effect of the transaction that he entered into.

3. Attorney's fee—An allowance of $500 to an executor was excessive where it was upon a basis of his collection of $10,000, where it appears that $7,700 of it never passed through his hands, but was paid direct to a trust company.

Burnett & Burnett for appellants.

Wm. Furlong for appellees.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery Branch, First Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

In the month of October, 1900, Jacob Bickel died, leaving a widow, five children and one grandchild, the child of a daughter, Mrs. Haller. He left considerable real estate and some personalty, amounting in all to $40,000 or $50,000. His indebtedness, as shown from the record, amounted to $30,000 or more. There were three policies on his life amounting to $5,000 each. One was payable to his oldest son, Henry, about which there is no dispute. The second one was made payable to his wife, Caroline, and his children. Caroline died several years before his death, and he had married again, his last wife being Louise Haller. She claims that she was entitled to a portion of this policy, the same that Caroline would have received if she had survived her husband, and cites several authorities which she claims supports her contention. The authorities referred to apply to benevolent orders or insurance companies, the charter of which company directs that the amount of the certificate should be paid, at the death of each member, to his family. But the insurance in this case was not in such a company; at least there was nothing in the record showing that there was such a requirement in its charter. When Caroline died her interest in the policy survived to the children. The lower court adjudged this policy to belong to the five boys and Alberta May Haller, his grandchild, in equal portions. The third and last policy was made payable to his executor or administrator. On the evening before the death of Jacob Bickel on the next day he made an assignment of this policy to his five boys. The appellant, his widow, and the Louisville Trust Co., as guardian for Alberta May Haller, contested this assignment, both claiming that at the time the assignment was attempted to be made, by reason of his mental and physical condition, he was incompetent to transact business of any kind, and also that it was attempted to be done in fraud of their rights. The lower court determined that it was done in fraud of the rights of his widow and was so intended, but held that under the statute, known as the "Weissinger Act," of 1894 he had the right to dispose of his personal property with a view and purpose of defrauding his wife in her marital rights; that this statute changed the law in this respect, and that prior to that time he did not have such right.

That part of the statute referred to reads as follows: "Marriage shall give to the husband, during the life of the wife, no estate or interest in the wife's property, real or personal. * * * She shall hold and own all her estate to her separate and exclusive use and free from the debts, liabilities and control of her husband. A married woman may take, acquire and hold property, real or personal, by gift, devise or descent, or by purchase, and she may in her own name, as if she were unmarried, sell and dispose of her personal property."

In our opinion the lower court erred in its construction of this statute. It is true it placed the husband and wife upon an equal footing with respect to their property rights and interests. Under the present statute each has the right to dispose of their personal property without the consent of the other, but it was not intended by this statute, nor can it be implied therefrom, that either or both of them have the right, in the disposition of their personal property, to intentionally commit a fraud upon the other, or upon any one. As to the mental and physical condition of Jacob Bickel at the time of the assignment of the policy we can not concur with the finding of the lower court thereon. While it is true that his five boys, who were present at the time of the assignment, with their lawyer, which occurred at 8 or 9 o'clock on the night before he died, testified that he was not dangerously sick and was rational, and knew perfectly well what he was doing, and was competent to do business, yet, taking into consideration all the evidence as to how they happened to arrive there together on that night with their lawyer, and all of them remaining in the kitchen except one, until his wife went to bed, and all the other attendants had left for home, before mentioning the subject to him, together with the evidence of his incompetency, especially that of the two attending physicians, we are convinced that Jacob Bickel was not in a mental state to understand the nature and effect of the transaction that he entered into.

It appears that his condition was such that the family were not willing to risk the case with the regular family physician, Dr. Kelly, and Dr. Warner was called as consulting physician. They arrived about 6 or 7 o'clock in the evening, a few hours before the assignment was made. It is shown that these physicians have no interest in the result of this litigation. We quote a portion of the deposition of Dr. Warner:

"Q. 12. What was his condition? What did you conclude in that consultation to be his condition?"

"A. I concluded his condition to be a desperate one."

"Q. 13. Tell how he was ill? To what extent was life involved in the illness?"

"A. To start with, he had an extremely weak heart—valvular lesion. He was suffering from an odematous condition, what we call 'odematous lungs,' at the time I saw him. By that we mean a watery condition, serum. Blood had been poured into the air cells. He was about to suffocate, and this weak, debilitated heart was unable to pump the blood through the lung tissues. The odema was constantly increasing. The odema had appeared in the lower extremity, also in the abdomen and in the upper extremity, and I judge from his mental state there was an odematous brain also, what we term a 'wet brain'—odematous brain; the surfaces were cold, pulse rapid and irregular; breathing hard and slow, so much so as to excite my suspicion he had taken, perhaps, too much morphine. On examination of his pulse I found, however, there was no drug, so that the slow, heavy breathing was not due to a drug, but due to his general condition, to pressure upon the brain. He was unconscious except by great effort to arouse him; would speak then only in monosyllables; sometimes sensibly, sometimes incoherently."

"Q. 18. Now, doctor, referring to his condition at the time you had held your consultation on Saturday afternoon or in the evening, you say between 6 and 7 o'clock, was he in a condition to transact business, make a contract, or transact business of any kind?"

"A. He was not. I would not think he was, in my opinion."

Dr. Kelly, the family physician, fully corroborated the statements of Dr. Warner.

The grandchild, Alberta May Haller, is entitled to her interest in this $5,000 policy.

It appears that there was no surplus personal estate after the payment of the debts of Bickel, even including this $5,000 policy, and, therefore, the appellant, Louisa Bickel, in not entitled to one-half of this policy. Her cause for complaint is that Bickel had, in his lifetime, mortgaged a considerable portion of his real estate and she had joined with him in these mortgages, conveying her dower interest therein. It was to her interest, and she had the right to require that this $5,000 policy be applied to the payment of these mortgage debts, thereby releasing $5,000 worth of real estate from the mortgage liens that she might realize dower interest therein.

With reference to the contention of appellant, that the lower court erred in allowing appellee, Henry Bickel, the sum of $500 for his services as such executor, we are of the opinion that the allowance was for too much. This allowance was made upon the basis that he had collected and disbursed about $10,000. It appears from the record that $7,700 of it never passed through his hands. This sum was realized from some brewery company bonds, which bonds were held by the insurance company and a bank or trust company as collateral, and when these bonds were sold or disposed of, under order of court, the purchaser thereof paid the money direct to the insurance company and the bank or trust company, and thus the appellee was relieved of the responsibility thereof. In our opinion, from all the facts appearing in this record, $300 would be a reasonable allowance for his services as such executor.

The appellants also complain that the allowance of $1,200 to the attorneys representing the estate was too large. We are of the opinion that the allowance is too great to be charged against the estate. From the record it appears that the most of their services were rendered in looking after the interest of Henry Bickel, in trying to hold the title to the Payne street property, and all the boys in attempting to sustain the assignment of the life policy and other individual interests of his and theirs. The fee of $1,200 is possibly small for all the services rendered by counsel in this action, but $750 is ample pay for the services they rendered the estate.

For the reasons herein stated the judgment of the lower court is reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings consistent herewith.

MAXEY v. TOWN OF TOMPKINSVILLE.

Office and officer—Salaries—Where the board of trustees of the town of Tompkinsville by ordinance fixed the salary of the town marshal at $15 a month, and subsequently enacted an ordinance providing that the salary of the marshal should be a certain percentum of all fines of the police court and certain fees, one elected after the latter ordinance became effective was only entitled to the compensation provided for by it.

Sherman Spear for appellant.

Harlin & White for appellees.

Appeal from Monroe Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

In 1894 the board of trustees of the town of Tompkinsville adopted an ordinance fixing the salary of the town marshal at $15 per month. On the 28th of August, 1899, they adopted the following ordinance: "The marshal shall receive for his services 30 per cent. of the fines imposed by the police court, and the fees allowed sheriffs for the same services, to be taxed as cost against the defendant."

And at the same time an ordinance was adopted by the board repealing all former ordinances in conflict with the ordinance adopted by the board at that date. The appellant, W. H. Maxey, was subsequently elected by the board of trustees town marshal, and accepted the place, and served therein from the 7th of September, 1899, until the 7th of August, 1900, a period of eleven months. On the 8th of August, 1900, Sherman Hale was elected for the place by the board of trustees and discharged the duties of the place until the 14th of February, 1901. On the 13th of July, 1901, the appellant, W. H. Maxey, brought this action to recover $165 salary alleged to be due him, at the rate of $15 per month, while he was an incumbent of the office of marshal.

He also sought judgment for $93 upon a similar claim assigned to him by his successor, Sherman Hale, for services for six months and six days at $15 per month. The town denied liability, and alleged that the ordinance of 1894, fixing the salary of the marshal at $15 per month, was repealed by the ordinance of 1899, which allowed the marshal fees for his services. The case was submitted upon the pleadings and exhibits, and the circuit judge dismissed plaintiff's petition and he has appealed. The sole question presented for decision is whether the appellant, in addition to the compensation allowed by the ordinance of 1899, is also entitled to the $15 a month provided by the ordinance of 1894. The last ordinance provides that the marshal shall receive the fees therein provided for for his services. There is no intimation that they were to be in addition to the $15 per month theretofore allowed for his services, and taken in connection with the ordinance repealing all previous ordinances inconsistent therewith, and the further fact that no demand was made monthly for the $15 during the rendition of the service by either appellant or his successor, we think that it was clearly the understanding of all parties that the fees provided by the last ordinance by way of compensation were to be in lieu of that provided by the ordinance of 1894.

Judgment affirmed.

CITY OF COVINGTON v. BRINKMAN.

(Filed March 8, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Street construction—Ordinance—Under section 3006, Kentucky Statutes, the city council of cities of the second class has no power to order the construction of streets at the cost of the abutting owner until petitioned by two-thirds of the owners of the front feet of the real estate abutting upon such improvement, and in the absence of such petition the council had no power to enact an ordinance providing for such construction, and a contract under such ordinance is not enforceable.

F. J. Hanlon for appellant.

Wm. McD. Shaw for appellee.

Appeal from Kenton Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

On the 28d of June, 19002, the general council of Covington, two-thirds of the members thereof concurring, passed an ordinance for the original construction of brick sidewalks on Eighteenth street, between Pearl and Greenup streets. The contract for the work was let to Ellsworth Wood, who performed the work in accordance with the plans and specifications adopted by the city, and an apportionment warrant for $145.75 for the cost of the improvements, in front of lots Nos. 1 and 2, owned by Susan Brinkman, was issued to him. Susan Brinkman having refused to pay the warrant, this suit was instituted by the contractor against both Susan Brinkman and the city of Covington. Copies of all orders and proceedings of the council bearing upon the question are filed as exhibits with the petition.

The defendant, Susan Brinkman, filed a demurrer to the petition on the ground that it did not allege that the owners of at least two-thirds of the front feet of the real estate abutting on the improvement had petitioned for the construction of the pavement. The demurrer was sustained as to her and the plaintiff's petition dismissed, and the city has appealed. Section 3006 of the Kentucky Statutes, which is a provision of the charters of cities of the second class, to which Covington belongs, is as follows: "The general council may, by ordinance, provide for the construction or reconstruction of the streets, alleys and other public ways and sidewalks, or part thereof, of the city upon the petition of the owners of a majority of the front or abutting feet of the real estate abutting on such proposed improvement, or without petition by a vote of two-thirds of the members elected of each board of the general council. But when such original construction is to be made with brick, granite, asphalt, concrete, or other improved material, or paving, it shall be only upon a petition of the owners of at least two-thirds of the front or abutting feet of real estate abutting such improvement. Such original construction of public ways shall be made at the exclusive cost of the owners of the real estate abutting on such improvement."

Under this section of appellant's charter the council had no power to order the original construction of a sidewalk by brick at the cost of the abutting owners until they had been petitioned by the owners of at least two-thirds of the front feet of the real estate abutting upon such improvement. In this case there was no petition. The ordinance was, therefore, void. It is, however, contended by the city that as the property owners made no objection to the work while it was in process of construction, they are estopped from complaining. To support this contention we are referred to Preston v. Robertson, 75 Ky., 570; Fehler v. Gosnell, 99 Ky., 380, and Barber Asphalt Co. v. Garr, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 2235. In none of these cases was there any question of the city's authority to enact the ordinance, but the question was very fully considered in Richardson v. Mehler, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 921.

In that case the court, speaking through Judge DuRelle, said: "The correct doctrine seems to be that the liability for such improvements must, under the statute, be created by legislative action of the council; and that legislation must be valid at least in part or no liability can arise. If the foundation is a nullity, none of the subsequent proceedings can be valid. If the ordinance be wholly void, it can not be authority for a valid contract, for there is no authority to make the contract except the ordinance. By such an ordinance there is created no obligation to pay for the service for which there is no common law liability. It could not be created except by a statute. It must be created in conformity thereto."

The statute in this case as a condition precedent requires that the owners of two-thirds of the abutting real estate in the district to be improved shall petition therefor. In the absence of such petition the council had no power to enact the ordinance and no contract created thereunder is enforceable. (Kaye v. Hall, 52 Ky., 456.)

For reasons indicated the judgment is affirmed.

WALKER v. BANK OF MANCHESTER, &c.

(Filed March 8, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Fraudulent conveyances—Where one indebted to another conveyed property to his daughter in consideration of love and affection, but reserved certain timber which he conveyed to appellant for a valuable consideration, in an action by the creditor against the daughter seeking to set aside the conveyance, a judgment by the court after the purchaser of the timber was made a party upon her cross petition subjecting so much of the timber as was necessary to pay the debt was proper, and will not be disturbed.

Hazellrigg & Chenault and J. J. Fitzpatrick for appellant.

J. J. C. Bach, W. H. Miller and Hall & Baker for appellees.

Appeal from Perry Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

Henry Fields, who is now dead, was indebted to appellee bank as surety on a note for $200. Subsequently he conveyed to his daughter, Mrs. Wells, a certain tract of about 850 acres of land in Perry county, in consideration of love and affection and to "equalize" her with his other children. By the deed he reserved all the poplar timber on the tract five feet in circumference and over, at three feet above the ground, to be measured from the upper side of the tree; also ten oak trees of the grantor's selection. The bank brought this suit, after having recovered a judgment and return of execution "no property found," against the administrator and heirs of Henry Fields, including Mrs. Wells, charging that the conveyance to her was voluntary and void as to that debt. It sought the subjection of the land to the payment of its judgment debt. Mrs. Wells answered, admitting that the conveyance to her was without valuable consideration, but setting out the true consideration, and alleging that the reservation of the timber by her father was for the purpose of paying his debts, except the debt of the plaintiff bank, and that to defeat it he had made a voluntary and fraudulent conveyance to appellant of the reserved timber for the express purpose of defeating the bank's debt. She made appellant a defendant to her cross petition, and asked that the conveyance to him be declared void, and that enough of the timber be sold to pay the decedent's debts. Appellant claims to have bought the timber in good faith at the price of $400, of which he says he at the time paid $.00, and is ready and able to pay the balance. The proof shows that this timber is worth from $1,000 to $1,500. It is very doubtful whether appellant actually paid to Henry Fields the $200 under the proof, although they went through the form of counting out the money at the time. Joe Johnson, the county court clerk, who wrote the deed conveying the timber and took the acknowledgment at Henry Fields' room, where Fields was confined by sickness, says he saw the money and saw it counted out, but, significantly, did not see it pass into the hands of Henry Fields. The fact is admitted that he did not get it, but that it was delivered to his son, Bob Fields, who seems to be in some way interested in the case for appellant, if not with him. At any rate, such was the finding of the circuit judge, whose opportunities for knowing the parties give his judgment such a weight that under the evidence we do not feel warranted in disturbing it.

The legal question presented is, admitting that the conveyance by Henry Fields to appellant was fraudulent, can any one other than a creditor of Henry Fields attack it? And as the bank has not attacked that conveyance, can it be done by the grantor's daughter, to whom he had voluntarily conveyed other property sought to be subjected by the grantor's creditors? A voluntary conveyance is not necessarily fraudulent, though as to antecedent debts it is void. A fraudulent conveyance, to which the grantee is a party in its purpose, is void as to the grantor's creditors. In the latter instance the title to the property remains in the grantor so far as creditors are concerned, and they may disregard the conveyance by causing the levy of their executions or attachments upon it, or sue to subject it. (Section 1907a, Kentucky Statutes.) The grantor himself could not sue to avoid it. Not because it is not void for any purpose, nor because the grantor would be estopped, but for the reason that the courts will not hear the complaint of one who seeks relief from his own fraud. Here the grantor has conveyed for a good consideration certain of his property to a daughter, which, under the statute, is liable for his antecedent debts notwithstanding. He has also conveyed in actual fraud of the creditor other property, of which the grantee had notice. In this suit to settle the estate of the deceased grantor, to which both grantees are parties, a court of equity will require the subjection, first, of the property conveyed fraudulently, before that conveyed innocently. The pleadings are not technically in form, yet they bring before the court all necessary parties and the subject-matter, and litigate after a fashion the questions involved. The chancellor ought not to balk at a quibble in pleading under such circumstances, and favor the vicious transaction over the innocent. As said by the Supreme Court, in Walden v. Bodley, 14 Pet. (U. S.), 164: "The court have, by the bill, answer and evidence, the equities of the parties before them; and having jurisdiction of the main points, they may settle the whole matter."

Henry Fields, if living, could not have required the bank or other of his creditors to exhaust the property conveyed to his daughter before subjecting his property. His fraudulent grantee has no greater right. Or, if Henry Fields were alive, and the bank were seeking to subject the property he had conveyed to his daughter for a good consideration to his debt, a court of equity would compel the subjection of his property first, all the parties being before the court, and all the property in its custody or jurisdiction. Otherwise it would be to permit the grantor to indirectly defeat his own deed, which, as between him and the grantee, was valid and meritorious. His grantee of other property, a party to a purposeful fraud, ought not to have any greater right in it than the grantor would have had under the circumstances.

The judgment of the circuit court subjecting enough of the timber to pay the debts adjudged against the estate of Henry Fields is affirmed.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

BRADLEY, &c. v. BAILEY.

(Filed March 8, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Ejectment—Parties to actions—Where one who was a party to an action died during its pendency and the death of such party was suggested of record, but there was no order of revivor against her heirs, a judgment ejecting her tenants will not be upheld.

Salzer & Barker, A. H. Howard and Hazelrigg & Chenault for appellants.

J. M. Bailey and J. J. C. Bach for appellee.

Appeal from Knott Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

The appellee, J. M. Bailey, instituted an action in the Knott Circuit Court against appellant, John Bradley, and others. In his petition he alleged he was the owner of eight or ten surveys of land, containing several thousand acres, giving the metes and bounds of each survey, and alleged that Bradley and others were wrongfully in the possession of this land. Appellant Bradley answered, denying the allegations of the petition, and set forth a boundary of land, containing about three thousand acres, which he stated once belonged to his father, George Bradley, which George Bradley conveyed to him in the year 1867, and that he had conveyed this same land to Mollie P. Robinson in the month of December, 1896; that his father and himself and his vendee, Robinson, had been in the actual possession of this land, and claiming adversely to all the world, for more than fifty years, and that if any of the patents claimed by appellee covered this land, or any part thereof, they were void to the extent of the interference. He also alleged that he had no interest in the land, but was residing upon it, since this sale to Robinson, as her tenant.

In 1898 appellee reformed, by order of court, his petition, and in that he made Mollie P. Robinson and her husband defendant. Many amended petitions were filed by appellee and many amended answers by appellant, and it is shown by the record a contest arose between appellee Bailey and appellant Bradley as to their private and individual accounts, and much of the proof was taken on this issue. There was not a survey of this land made nor a plat or map filed to indicate the clash between the land claimed by appellee and that claimed by appellant. The appellee in his testimony testified that he did not know whether his land covered the whole of the Bradley survey or not, but that he believed that it covered the most of it. There was not any testimony showing the extent of the conflict between the claim of appellee and the Bradley survey, nor any showing that the house in which Bradley lived was covered by any patent under which appellee claims. Notwithstanding this, the lower court adjudged that appellant Bradley be ejected and all persons on the Bradley land be put off and the possession be delivered to appellee. It appeared prior to this judgment that Mollie P. Robinson had died, and that fact was suggested of record, but there was not any revivor against her heirs, and the court in its judgment expressly stated that it was not to affect the rights or interest of her heirs. It is hard for us to understand how a court could eject her tenants without affecting the interest of her heirs. It is impossible from the record before us, in its confused and defective condition, to determine the rights of the parties, but we have ascertained enough to know that error was committed.

Wherefore, the judgment of the lower court is reversed and the cause is remanded, with directions to the parties to reform their pleadings and divest the record of surplus and irrelevant matter and narrow the issue to the question as to whether or not appellee is entitled to the whole or any part, and if so, to what part, of the land in controversy.

BULLITT, &c. v. EASTERN KENTUCKY LAND CO., &c.

(Filed March 9, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Practice—Leave of court to file an amended answer was no authority for the filing of cross petition in vacation, and the issue of a summons upon a cross petition so filed and a judgment thereon was unwarranted.

J. H. Hazelrigg and Wm. Marshall Bullitt for appellants.

B. F. Day, J. F. Osborn, T. S. Candel and Doulgass & Day for appellees.

Appeal from Menifee Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

The facts of this case are set out in the opinion rendered on the former appeal. (Bullitt v. Eastern Kentucky Land Co., 99 Ky., 334.) On the return of the case to the circuit court the mandate was entered at the December term, 1896, and nothing further material was done, except to revive the action against the executor of J. F. Bullitt (who had died) until the April term, 1899, when certain of the defendants were given leave within thirty days to file an amended answer.

Within the thirty days they filed in the clerk's office cross petitions claiming part of the land, and had process issued upon the cross petitions against the Bullitts. At the next term of the court, the Bullitts not being present, judgment was entered by default against the Bullitts on the cross petitions.

The plaintiff then filed an amended petition setting up these judgments, and on the same day a judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff against the Bullitts, although, as shown in the opinion rendered on the former appeal, the Bullitts had filed an answer denying the allegations of the plaintiff's petition, and no proof had been taken to sustain its averments. The leave of court to file an amended answer within thirty days was no authority for the filing of the cross petitions and the institution of the cross petitions in vacation. A cross petition is the commencement of an action by a defendant against a codefendant or a person not a party to the suit, and it can only be instituted by leave of the court. Whether it should be allowed is a matter of discretion in the court. The filing of the cross petitions in vacation before the clerk and the causing of a summons to be issued on them was unwarranted, and no judgment should have been entered thereon.

The judgment which was entered in favor of the plaintiff based on these judgments was equally unwarranted. On the return of the case to the circuit court it will make an order filing the cross petition of record, and also filing the answer thereto subsequently tendered by the Bullitts. The parties will then be permitted to complete the issue or file such additional pleadings as may be proper. Proof may then be taken and the case heard on the merits.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded for further proceedings consistent herewith.

FINLEY v. KEINNINGHAM.

1. Res judicata.—A defense in an action against an executor in which he set up a claim for nursing and care of testator, which claim was rejected upon a former appeal, a demurrer to an amended answer setting up the same defense upon the return of the case to the lower court was properly sustained because that question was res judicata.

2. Liability of executor.—Where an executor without authority at law paid to another the estate to which the devisee under a will was entitled, the executor is responsible to the devisee, and he must undertake the trouble and expense of such litigation as may be necessary to recover the amount wrongfully paid out by him.

R. L. Crawford for appellant.

Hazelrigg, Chenault & Hazelrigg and John H. Wilson for appellee.

Appeal from Whitley Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle.

This is the second appeal in this case. On the first appeal, which was taken by the present appellee, Jennie Moss Keininningham, this court in an opinion by Burnam, Chief Justice, held that appellee was entitled to recover of the appellant, H. F. Finley, as executor of the will of her deceased father, James L. Keininningham, the legacy bequeathed her thereby, and to that end the judgment of the lower court appealed from, whereby a demurrer had been sustained to the petition filed by her against appellant and the same dismissed, was reversed and cause remanded for proceedings consistent with the opinion. (Keininningham v. Keininningham, Ex'or, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 1830.)

On April 6, 1908, which was after the decision of the case by this court on the former appeal, but before the filing in the lower court of the mandate of this court, the appellant filed an amended answer in the case, wherein he sought to renew, and again set up the same defense relied on in his original answer filed with the demurrer to the petition, which this court held had been wrongfully sustained by the lower court. After the filing of the mandate of this court the appellee filed a general demurrer to the amended answer of appellant, which the lower court sustained. Thereupon appellee filed an amended petition in that court, conceding the right of appellant to certain credits, and questioning his right to a certain other credit, and calling for proof of same. Appellant then filed another amended answer containing two paragraphs. The matter of the first paragraph was but a repetition of the attempted defense contained in his original and first amended answer. The second paragraph relied upon the alleged fact that F. W. Finley, the appellant's son, and the residuary legatee under the will of James L. Keininningham, to whom appellant had wrongfully paid over the estate left by the testator which, under the will, should have been paid appellee, his daughter and direct legatee, had a claim against the estate of testator for nursing and care given him in his last illness, which was a valid, subsisting demand against the estate of the latter, exceeding in amount the estate left by him, and that appellant had, as executor, paid to F. W. Finley the estate left by the testator after the payment of his debts and costs of the administration, without requiring of him proof of the correctness of such claim, as he believed him to be entitled to the estate as residuary legatee.

The last amended answer was attempted to be made a cross petition against F. W. Finley and a counterclaim against appellee. A demurrer was filed by appellee to the second and last amended answer and counterclaim, and each paragraph thereof, which was also sustained by the court, and appellant failing to plead further, judgment was rendered by the lower court against him in appellee's behalf for $1,185.86, with interest from May 6, 1890, and costs, that sum being the amount in his hands as executor found to be due appellee under her father's will, after deducting all credits claimed by appellant. Appellant now complains of that judgment, and prosecutes this appeal in the attempt to reverse it. The last two amended answers of appellant, except as to the alleged claim of F. W. Finley for nursing and care of the testator, contain nothing by way of defense that was not relied on in his original answer as amended, which was filed in the case before the taking of the first appeal. That defense was rejected and declared untenable by this court in the opinion upon the former appeal. It is, therefore, res judicata, and the lower court very properly sustained the demurrer to each of the last amended answers.

So much of the last amended answer as relies upon the claim of F. W. Finley for nursing and care of the testator, and that the payment to him by the executor of the estate left by the testator should go in satisfaction thereof, is utterly inconsistent with the defense originally relied on, and manifestly an afterthought. The original defense was that the payment to F. W. Finley was made solely because the appellee could not be made to comply with the terms of her father's will, and that such noncompliance on her part authorized the executor to turn over the estate to his own son as residuary legatee by direction of the will. Now he contends that F. W. Finley had an additional claim upon the estate arising upon a contract made between him and the testator whereby he was to be paid for the nursing of and caring for the latter. If this is true, it is strange that the appellant did not require some proof of that claim before turning over the estate to his son; also strange that he did not make known this claim when his defense was first presented, and stranger still that the son has not volunteered, even since the institution of this suit in 1901, to come to the rescue of the father by urging his claim in this action.

James L. Keininningham died in 1890, and his will was probated at once. This action was instituted in 1901, something over ten years after his death, during the whole of which time nothing was heard of the claim of F. W. Finley for care and nursing, and no attempt was made by him to assert it as a legal demand against the estate of the testator. In fact, he has not yet done so, though the appellant attempts to assert it for him after it has been adjudged by this court that the defense first interposed by him in this case was without merit. If F. W. Finley ever had such a claim as is suggested by his father it has long since been barred by the statute of limitation, and would necessarily be rejected if sued for and the statute of limitation were pleaded against it.

That the setting up of this claim by appellant is apparently an afterthought is supported by the fact that though in the last amended answer in terms it is asked to be made a cross petition against F. W. Finley, it does not make him a party to the cross petition, or call upon him to assert his demand against the estate of the testator, nor was the court asked to make him a party to the action, or to award process against him. If appellant, without authority of law, paid to F. W. Finley the estate to which the appellee was entitled under her father's will, she can not be made to look to F. W. Finley for its repayment to her. The executor is responsible to her, and he must undertake the trouble and expense of such litigation as may be necessary to recover of F. W. Finley the amount wrongfully received by him.

The judgment of the lower court being in accord with the conclusions herein expressed, the same is affirmed.

JONES v. SIZEMORE.

(Filed March 8, 1904.)

1. Elections—A vacancy occurring in an office to be filled by election by the voters of a county within three months of the next succeeding annual election, no election can be held to fill the office until the regular November election of the next succeeding year.

2. Construction of statutes—Section 236 of the Constitution and sections 3759 and 3755 of the Kentucky Statutes refer to offices which are to be filled for the full constitutional or statutory terms.

3. Vacancy in office—Where one was appointed to fill a vacancy in the office of sheriff he was not appointed to serve during the remainder of the unexpired term of his predecessor, but only to fill the vacancy caused by the latter's death until an election could be held according to law, and when elected the one so elected has the right to qualify and enter upon the performance of the duties of his office at once.

J. B. White, Sutton & Hurst, W. S. Pryor and Hazelrigg, Chenault & Hazelrigg for appellant.

A. F. Byrd, R. L. Greene and O. H. Pollard for appellee.

Appeal from Lee Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle.

This is a proceeding by rule in the nature of quo warranto to determine whether appellant or appellee is entitled to perform the duties of the office of sheriff of Lee county for the period intervening between the November election, 1903, and the first Monday in January, 1904.

At the November election, 1901, W. E. Jones was elected to the office of sheriff of Lee county, and entered upon the discharge of the duties thereof on the first Monday in January, 1902, and continued to act as sheriff until his death, which occurred in the month of September, 1902. On September 25, after his death, the appellant, John E. Jones, was appointed to fill the vacancy caused thereby, and after his qualification entered upon the performance of the duties of the office. As the vacancy caused by the death of W. E. Jones occurred within three months of the next succeeding annual election at which either city, town, county, district or State officers were to be elected, no election was, or could be, held to fill the vacancy in the office of sheriff until the regular November election, 1903, at which election the appellee was duly elected sheriff of Lee county, to fill the unexpired term for which W. E. Jones had been elected, and at once executed his official bond and took the oath of office as required by law. At the December term, 1903, of the Lee Circuit Court appellee appeared in court to perform his duties in waiting upon the court, and executing its processes and orders. Appellant thereupon presented himself in court and also insisted upon performing the duties of the office of sheriff at the same time, and objected to the appellee doing so. But appellee's right to the office was recognized by the court, whereupon appellant procured a rule against appellee to show cause why he should not give way to him until the first Monday in January following, to which the latter filed a response in which the facts of his election and qualification to the office in question were duly set forth, and upon the hearing of the rule and response the court rendered a judgment declaring appellee entitled to the office in dispute, and from that judgment this appeal was taken.

Section 152, State Constitution, contains the following provision: "Except as otherwise provided in this Constitution, vacancies in all elective offices shall be filled by election or appointment as follows: If the unexpired term will end at the next succeeding annual election at which either city, town, county, district or State officers are to be elected, the office shall be filled by appointment for the remainder of the term. If the unexpired term will not end at the next succeeding annual election at which either city, town, county, district or State officers are to be elected, the office shall be filled by appointment until said election, and then such vacancy shall be filled by election for the remainder of the term. If three months do not intervene between the happening of said vacancy and the next succeeding election at which city, town, county, district or State officers are to be elected, the office shall be filled by appointment until the second succeeding annual election at which city, town, county, district or State officers are to be elected; and then if any part of the term remains unexpired, the office shall be filled by election until the regular time for the election of officers to fill said offices."

It will be observed that in every instance the vacancies provided for by section 152 of the Constitution supra are to be filled by appointment "until the next succeeding annual election" which does not take place within three months next after the vacancy occurs. This regulation is in deference to the representative character of our government and the policy of our laws, that the people are to choose those who are to serve them. The power to appoint exists under certain circumstances, but it is only delegated, and may be exercised only when it is impracticable for the people to exercise their choice.

Section 99 of the Constitution declares that the first term of county officers elected immediately following the adoption of the Constitution should be for three years, beginning on the first Monday in January, 1895, but as such officers were thereafter elected for terms of four years, the next term began with the first Monday in January, 1898, and ended with first Monday in January, 1902, and the next beginning with the first Monday in January, 1902, will end on the corresponding day in January, 1906, and so on, the election in each instance taking place in November of the preceding year. So the only regular term, as applied to county officers, sheriff included, is that of four years.

Section 236, Constitution, provides that the "general assembly shall, by law, prescribe the time when the several officers authorized or directed by this Constitution to be elected or appointed shall enter upon the duties of their respective offices, except where the time is fixed by this Constitution."

Section 3759, Kentucky Statutes, provides that "all officers other than those mentioned in the preceding section relating to commissioned officers, may enter upon the discharge of the duties of their offices respectively at the time prescribed by the Constitution or the statutes creating the office, upon taking the oath and executing the covenant required by law."

Section 3755 of the Statutes, supra, provides: "If the official bond is not given, and the oath of office taken, on or before the day on which the term of office to which the person has been elected begins, or in cases of persons appointed to office, within thirty days after such person has received notice of his appointment, the office shall be considered vacant, and he shall not be re-eligible thereto for two years."

We are of opinion that the provisions of the Constitution and statute supra all refer to offices which are to be filled for the full constitutional or statutory terms. There seems to be nothing in either the Constitution or statutes of this State fixing the time at which one elected, or appointed to fill a vacancy in office, shall assume the duties of such office. It would, however, have been impossible for the appellee to have entered upon the duties of the office, the vacancy in which he was elected to fill, at the beginning of a term, for the term began on the first Monday in January, 1902, nearly two years before his election. Except as the beginning or ending of a full term of office, the first Monday in January has no more significance than the first Monday of any other month. The term of the office of sheriff is four years, no more and no less. The present term throughout the State began with the first Monday in January, 1902. The term had but one beginning, and will have but one ending, though there may be a dozen incumbents during the one term. The appellant was not appointed to serve during the remainder of the unexpired term of his predecessor, but only to fill the vacancy caused by the latter's death until an election could be held as provided by law to fill such vacancy for the remainder of the unexpired term, which election, as thus provided, could not take place until November of the year 1903. Therefore, upon the election and qualification of appellee the vacancy ceased, and it became the duty of appellant to retire at once from the office in favor of appellee, who was entitled to begin the immediate performance of the duties thereof, without waiting until the first Monday in January following, as would have been the case if he had been elected for a full term of four years.

The fact that the statute requires one elected to the office of sheriff for a full term to give bond by, and begin the duties of his office on, the first Monday in January following his election, and that his failure to do so shall forfeit his right to the office, does not compel one elected to fill a vacancy in that office to defer his qualification, or the commencement of his duties, until the first Monday in January, any more than does the statute providing that the failure of one appointed to such vacancy to qualify within thirty days after the date of his appointment shall forfeit his right to the office, require such appointee to defer his qualification for, and the taking of, his office until the end of the thirty days. Whether elected or appointed to such vacancy, the one so elected or appointed has the right to qualify and enter upon the performance of the duties of the office at once.

Being of the opinion that the lower court properly decided that appellee was entitled to the possession of the office of sheriff of Lee county immediately upon his election and qualification, the judgment is affirmed.

SMITH, ADM'R v. SMITH, &c.

(Filed March 9, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Mortgages—Interest in land—Where one had no interest in land during the life of his mother, as he died before she did, a mortgage by him conveying his remainder interest in her land was ineffectual to convey any interest in the land.

Lafferty & King and J. I. Blanton for appellant.

M. C. Swinford for appellees.

Appeal from Harrison Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

On the 29th of March Nathan O. Smith mortgaged to N. H. Carlisle, to secure the payment of a note for $350, simultaneously executed and due six months after date, an alleged undivided one-fifth interest in remainder in a farm occupied by his father and mother, known as the T. W. Smith farm in Harrison county, Kentucky. N. H. Carlisle assigned and delivered this note to Mary E. Giltner. After the execution of the note and mortgage, N. O. Smith died, and on the 12th of February 1902, his administrator and Mary E. Giltner instituted this suit in the Harrison Circuit Court against T. W. Smith and Martha Smith, the father and mother of decedent, his sisters, Anna Burgess, Martha Ware and Grace Claybrooke, and his brother, Thomas E. Smith, the only surviving children of T. W. and Martha Smith, seeking to subject the one undivided one-fifth interest in the Harrison county tract of land, alleged to belong to N. O. Smith, subject to a life estate of his mother, Martha A. Smith, to the payment of the note and interest. The defendants for answer denied that Natham O. Smith was the owner of one undivided one-fifth interest in the tract of land subject to the life estate of his mother, Martha Smith, or that he had any interest whatever in the property at the date of the execution of the mortgage to Carlisle, or at any time previous to his death, and alleged that the title to the property belonged to his mother during her life and at her death descended in fee simple to the children of Thos. W. and Martha A. Smith, who were alive at the death of Martha by virtue of a deed executed and delivered by Thomas W. Smith to his mother, Martha A. Smith, on the 29th of July, 1859. It appears from the pleadings and exhibits filed therewith that on the 29th of July, 1859, Thomas W. Smith, the father of N. O. Smith, conveyed the tract of land in controversy to his mother, Martha A. Smith, in trust, first, for the payment of certain debts due and owing by T. W. Smith.

The deed then provided that "after the above named debts shall be fully paid off and satisfied, the said Martha A. Smith is to hold the balance of the property hereby conveyed in trust for the sole use and benefit of Martha Smith, the wife of Thomas W. Smith, during her natural life, and at her death to be equally divided between the children of said Thomas W. Smith and Martha A. Smith, should they have any living at the time of said Martha's death; but if they should have no living children upon the death of said Martha, then, in that event, the title to said property is to vest absolutely in said Martha A. Smith for her sole use and benefit."

It appears from the recitations of this deed that the true name of both the mother and wife of Thomas W. Smith was Martha A. Smith, but that the letter "A" is left out of the name of the wife in certain parts of the deed. The Martha A. Smith named as the grantee therein was the mother of the grantor, T. W. Smith, and the conveyance of the property was to her primarily to secure the payment of certain indebtedness of the grantor. After this had been accomplished the mother was to hold the balance of the property in trust for the benefit of the wife of Thomas W. Smith during her natural life. If at the death of the wife of Thomas W. Smith they had living children, it was to be equally divided between them, but if at that time they had no living children, then the title to the property was to vest in the mother, Martha A. Smith, for her sole use and benefit.

On the 8th of February, 1875, after the death of Martha A. Smith, the mother of Thomas W. Smith, Thomas W. Smith and his wife conveyed the title to this tract of land to N. L. Hume, who immediately reconveyed it to Martha A. Smith, the wife, and her children by Thomas W. Smith. As the title to the property passed under the deed of 1859 to Martha A. Smith, the wife of Thomas W. Smith, during her life, and at her death to her children, the deed made to Hume in 1837 was ineffectual for any purpose; but even if valid, it did not change the character of the title conveyed by the deed of 1859, as the title vested in the children of Martha A. Smith and Thomas W. Smith living at the death of Martha. Nathan O. Smith, therefore, had no interest therein during the life of his mother, and as he died before her, his mortgage to Carlisle was ineffectual to convey any interest in the land.

Judgment affirmed.

FENWICK v. WATKINS.

(Filed March 9, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Sales of real estate—Contracts—In an action by a real estate agent for the sale of lands he must specifically allege what he was employed to do, and facts showing that he had complied with his undertaking, and where he fails to state what he was employed to do, an action for commissions upon the sale of real estate can not be maintained by him.

J. W. Bush, C. C. Grassham and Blue & Nunn for appellee.

L. H. James, Ollie M. James and C. C. Moore for appellant.

Appeal from Crittenden Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

The appellant, Fenwick, sued the appellee, Watkins, for commissions alleged to be due to him as agent in the sale of a tract of land. The circuit judge sustained a general demurrer to his petition, and declining to plead further his petition was dismissed, and he has appealed.

The petition is as follows: "The plaintiff, B. S. Fenwick, says that the defendant, Harry Watkins, in the fall of 1902, was the owner and in possession of a certain tract of land situated in Crittenden county, Ky., known as the Austin tract; and having discovered some mineral indications thereon, and desiring to put the same upon the market for sale at mineral prices, did employ this plaintiff, making said contract in said county, agreeing and binding himself to pay to this plaintiff the sum of all that could be realized in the sale of said land over and above the sum of $1,000, which contract was accepted and acted upon by this plaintiff; in the rendition of a great deal of services, loss of time and expense, looking up and bringing in touch with the defendant, upon the proposition of sale of said land, which thereafter, and on the — day of —, 1903, was consummated for and at the sum of $6,000, cash in hand, and as the purchase price of said land paid to defendant which was accepted by the defendant for said land, and as the sum and price that he fixed upon same at the time he made and entered into the contract with this plaintiff, aforesaid; and executed and delivered to the purchaser thereof a deed of conveyance covering said tract of land, a copy of which deed will be filed herewith and made part hereof, and marked exhibit 'A,' if required. The plaintiff further states that after the sale of said land aforesaid, and after the defendant had received said sum therefor, he called upon him for his said commission, $2,000, which he had agreed to pay this plaintiff aforesaid, that the defendant at which time refused and failed, and still refuses and fails, to pay this plaintiff said sum, or any part thereof, which is now past due and wholly unpaid. Therefore, the plaintiff prays judgment against the defendant, Harry Watkins, for the sum of $2,000, with interest thereon from the — day of —, for his cost and all proper relief."

In an action by a real estate agent for commissions in the sale of real estate he must allege specifically what he was employed to do, and the compensation which he was to receive therefor, and facts showing that he had complied with his undertaking and had procured a purchaser who was able and willing to take the property upon the terms agreed upon with his principal. In this case the plaintiff wholly fails to state what he was employed by the plaintiff to do in connection with the sale of the land in question. There is no averment that he had either effected the sale of the land or that it resulted from any service rendered under his employment.

For reasons indicated the judgment is affirmed.

GOFF, &c. v. WILBURN, &c.

(Filed March 9, 1904—Not to be reported.)

New trial—A new trial should be granted where an action was dismissed by the trial court after the court had stated to the attorneys on both sides that the case should remain upon the docket until the trial of another case in another county upon the same subject-matter, but dismissed the action having forgotten the statement made to the attorneys that the action should not be tried until the trial of the action in the other court.

Beckner & Jouett for appellants.

J. H. Hazelrigg for appellees.

Appeal from Wolfe Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

This is an action for a new trial under sections 518 and 520 of the Civil Code. There is a large body of land lying partly in Powell, Wolfe and Estill counties, title to and possession of which were claimed both by appellants and appellees.

Appellants had instituted an action in Powell county against appellees to quiet their title to this land, and had also an action pending in Wolfe against them for trespass upon it, which, incidentally, involved the title. Appellants moved the judge of the Wolfe Circuit Court to transfer the latter action to the Powell Circuit Court for trial with the former. This was overruled, but in consideration of the fact that the case in Powell had been advanced materially in preparation at considerable expense, the judge of the Wolfe Circuit Court stated to the attorneys for both sides that the case in Wolfe might be left as it was until the trial of the Powell county case; and upon this statement of the court appellants' counsel relied. Subsequently, without the knowledge of appellants or their counsel, the Wolfe county case was placed upon the trial docket, and the court having forgotten the statement made to counsel, it was dismissed. This judgment was not ascertained by appellants until too late to apply for a new trial, except under section 518 of the Code; whereupon they filed their petition, setting up the foregoing facts, and praying for a new trial, because of unavoidable casualty or misfortune preventing them from appearing.

The answer denied all the affirmative allegations of the petition, and, in addition, pleaded that in an action instituted in Estill county, between appellants (who were plaintiffs therein) and some of appellees' tenants, involving the title to the land in question, appellants "were defeated," and that the judgment was still in full force and effect. No denial was made of the allegations of the answer. The evidence fully establishes the allegations of unavoidable casualty. Judge Redwine's testimony places this beyond all question. The plea of res judicata, even if sufficiently stated, has no place in this case, but belongs to the action involving the merits of the controversy as to the land. But, conceding that it should be considered here, the allegations of the answer are not such as will bar appellants. No adjudication, except on the merits of the controversy, constitutes a bar to the defeated party. The admitted allegation that the plaintiffs "were defeated" in a law suit does not show that the case was decided on its merits. The same plea could have been truthfully made if the plaintiffs had been forced to dismiss without prejudice. Allegations are taken most strongly against the pleader.

Appellants have been prevented from preparing and trying their case on its merits by circumstances upon which any lawyer might have relied. It is not at all necessary to discuss in detail the means by which this result was brought about. Appellants must have their day in court, and this they have not yet had in this case. (Cooley v. Barbourville Land and Improvement Co., 19 Ky. Law Rep., 1454.)

The court below dismissed the petition. This judgment is reversed, with directions to grant appellants a new trial.

MANN v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed March 9, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Accomplice—Evidence—Upon the trial of appellant evidence to the effect that he said to the arresting officer at the time of the arrest, "you are a good friend of mine; why didn't you give me a tip and let me get away," and other testimony incriminating him, was sufficient to corroborate the testimony of an accomplice, and a verdict of conviction will not be disturbed.

J. M. Collins for appellant.

N. B. Hays and Loralne Mix for appellee.

Appeal from Mason Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

The indictment charges that Charles Saunders, Thomas Mann and Edward Morrison willfully, maliciously and feloniously shooting and wounding John B. Farrow. It is evident that Mann and Morrison, if not Saunders, went to Farrow's house to commit a robbery; that they broke into it, and when he refused to turn over his money appellant Mann shot him. Charles Saunders was introduced as a witness for the Commonwealth, who testified that Mann procured a horse and buggy in the city of Maysville; that they drove to Farrow's house, hitched the horse and entered the house as we have stated. Saunders claims that Mann and Morrison did not disclose their real purpose to him, but claimed that they were going there to see some girls. For the appellant it is contended that Saunders was an accomplice; that the evidence of Saunders is not corroborated, therefore, as the law will not allow the conviction of one charged with a crime upon the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice, the court should have directed the jury to acquit the defendant.

We will assume that Saunders was an accomplice, and hold that if his testimony had not been corroborated it would have been proper for the court to have directed an acquittal. (Miller & Smith v. Commonwealth, 78 Ky., 15; Craft v. Commonwealth, 80 Ky., 349; Commonwealth v. Barker, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 368.) If there is any evidence tending to corroborate an accomplice, it is sufficient to support a verdict. The evidence tends to support Saunders' testimony as to the circumstances attending the entrance into the house and the shooting and wounding of Farrow. It also tends to show that a horse's tracks were found, indicating that a horse had been hitched where Saunders said they had hitched the horse. It likewise tended to show that the horse had been shod by a blacksmith by the name of Crawford, who did it in a peculiar way, and the tracks indicated that it had been made by such a shoe. A hat was found near Farrow's house, and Simon Nelson testified that he had sold it, or one like it, to Mann. R. R. Thompson testified that when he made the arrest Mann said to him "you are a good friend of mine; why didn't you give me a tip and let me get away." There was other testimony tending to corroborate Saunders.

The judgment is affirmed.

CARSEY & CO. v. FARMER & DAVIS.

(Filed March 9, 1904.)

1. Contracts—Sales of tobacco—In an action by tobacco warehousemen against a firm of tobacco dealers to recover a balance on advances, the evidence showing that the dealers had fallen behind in their shipments, it was error upon the trial in the lower court to allow them damages upon a counterclaim setting up losses resulting from the failure of the warehousemen to continue advancements to them.

2. Breach of agreement to lend money—The breach of an agreement to lend money furnishes no grounds for a recovery of damages for injury to the reputation of the borrower in not getting it.

John K. Hendrick, Dancy Fort, H. M. Scales and W. F. Peterson for appellants.

Linn, Greer & Reid and Farmer & Davis for appellees.

Appeal from Calloway Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

W. H. Carsey & Co. are tobacco warehousemen at Clarksville, Tenn. Farmer & Davis are tobacco dealers at Murray, Ky. In the year 1899 Farmer

& Davis shipped their tobacco to Carsey & Co., the latter making them advances from time to time thereon, to secure which Davis executed to them a mortgage on a tract of land owned by him. When the tobacco was all sold there was a balance, as shown by the books of Carsey & Co., due them from Farmer & Davis of $488, and it not having been paid, they instituted this suit to recover the money and enforce the mortgage. The defendants filed an answer in three paragraphs, as follows:

"1st. The agreement between the plaintiffs and the defendants was that the defendants were to buy tobacco in the country and ship it to the plaintiffs' warehouse in Clarksville, Tenn., to be sold by the plaintiffs for the customary charges; and in consideration of this the plaintiffs agreed that they would from time to time advance to the defendants money with which to pay for the tobacco they so bought, and would keep in their hands a sufficient amount of money to pay for all the tobacco purchased by them, which was to be, and was, shipped to plaintiffs' warehouse; that plaintiffs failed to keep their contract and refused to furnish the defendants the money to pay for the tobacco purchased by them when they had contracted for 42,000 pounds of tobacco in the country; that by reason of this they were unable to buy the tobacco so contracted for, and lost the profits which they would have made on the 42,000 pounds of tobacco, they being unable to get the money elsewhere; that they contracted for the tobacco at $5 or $6 a hundred, and could have made a net profit on it of at least $1.50 a hundred; that in addition to this they were at trouble and expense to the amount of $50 in making the contracts with the farmers, and to the amount of $75 in rescinding these contracts when the plaintiff refused to furnish them the money to pay for the tobacco after it had been contracted for, making in all $820.

"2d. The defendants shipped to the plaintiffs for sale 111,891 pounds of tobacco of the value of $8,896, which was sold by the plaintiffs for that sum, but the plaintiffs failed to account to the defendants for at least $1,366 of the purchase price.

"3d. By reason of the plaintiffs not furnishing the money as agreed the defendants had been unable to use a barn which they had rented to put the tobacco in, and thus lost the rent, $100, and they had also been damaged $500 in their reputation as tobacco dealers by their inability to carry out the contracts they had made by reason of the plaintiffs' refusal to advance them the money."

All these sums were pleaded as a counterclaim. The plaintiffs demurred to the answer, and their demurrer being overruled filed a reply controverting its allegations. Proof was taken and on final hearing the court allowed the defendants on their counterclaim $494.73, setting off against this the plaintiffs' debts of $433, and entering judgment in favor of the defendant for $66.73. The plaintiffs appeal.

While the reply of the plaintiffs is not in the usual form, we think it substantially sufficient as a denial of the allegations of the answer. The proof is wholly insufficient to warrant the judgment for the defendants on the second paragraph of the answer, alleging that the plaintiff had not accounted for the price received for the tobacco which was sold by them on account of the defendants. The proof by the plaintiffs is unequivocal that all the money received was accounted for, and an itemized statement of the sales is filed, also an itemized statement of the plaintiffs' account, which is testified to be correct. There is no contrary evidence except the following: The defendants state that they weighed the tobacco bought by them from the farmers and that their scales were correct; they also show that the weights of the hogsheads as given by the plaintiffs in the reports of their sales were 8,800 pounds less than the weights of the tobacco for which they paid the farmers. They also show that they shipped to the plaintiffs sixty-one hogsheads, and only fifty-nine hogsheads were reported by the plaintiffs in their account. But it is shown on the cross examination of the defendants, and not controverted, that two hogsheads of the tobacco shipped in their name was ordered to be sold by them in the name of a customer, W. Adams, and that these hogsheads were reported in Adams' name. It is further shown that the defendants shipped three hogsheads of their tobacco to another warehouse which sold it, and while the weight of these hogsheads is not definitely established by the proof, judging from the weight of the other hogsheads, we think they may be safely put at about 4,800 pounds. This leaves only about 4,000 pounds of deficiency between the weights made by the defendants to the farmers and those made by the warehousemen when the tobacco was sold in Clarksville. The defendants sold during the season also eleven hogsheads at another warehouse, and the deficiency of 4,000 pounds must be considered with reference to these hogsheads as well as those shipped to the plaintiffs. Some of the tobacco was broken twice, not being sold when first offered. It was sold during the summer, and the loss is greater in dry weather than in damp, as the tobacco dries out. The proof warrants the conclusion that a loss of twenty-five pounds to the hogshead is not an unreasonable allowance on this tobacco. This would make a loss of nearly 2,000 pounds; and if there was this much loss at the warehouse, it would seem reasonable there was as much loss in the handling and prizing of the tobacco at the defendants' barn. But, however this may be, the proof is satisfactory that the plaintiffs accounted for all the money they received for the tobacco, and there is nothing in the evidence to warrant a judgment against them for anything beyond the money they received.

The other two paragraphs of the answer will be considered together as they both depend upon the allegation that the plaintiffs agreed to make advances and broke the agreement. The only proof of the agreement is the evidence of the defendant Farmer, as to a conversation between him and the plaintiff, W. H. Carsey, which is denied by Carsey. Both the conduct of the parties and the circumstances sustain Carsey, and while we are satisfied it was contemplated and understood between the parties that Carsey & Co. would make advances to the defendants, we are also satisfied that it was understood they were to do this only as long as things were satisfactory. When Carsey & Co. refused to make further advances the defendants had fallen behind, and their attention was called to the condition of their account. Carsey & Co. can not be held, under the loose evidence in this record, to have agreed to continue to make advances after the defendants fell behind. They were not satisfied with the way things were going. The defendants had the right to terminate the arrangement with Carsey & Co., and it hard to conceive that the parties contemplated that Carsey & Co. were compelled to furnish money when the defendants did not keep up their account.

There was no writing evidencing the contract. There is nothing in the letters passing between the parties sustaining in any degree the defendants' contention. When Carsey & Co. informed them that no further advances would be made in view of the condition of the account, no complaint was made that the plaintiffs were breaking any contract, and nothing was said about the contract now relied on. A few months later one of the defendants wrote Carsey & Co. telling them that he and his partner had dissolved, but he was going to carry on the business, and asking them to make advances to him, but making no complaint of any mistreatment in the past. When Carsey & Co. sent an attorney to Murray to get a settlement of their account, the only objection made by either of the defendants was the alleged shortage in the weights, and it was agreed that if the weights were shown to be correct by the buyers who had gotten the tobacco, the defendants would settle. The attorney returned a second time after getting certificates from the buyers as to the correctness of the weights, and still nothing was said about any agreement to make advances which had been broken by Carsey & Co. This claim was never set up until after the suit was brought, and can not be maintained.

Besides, whether the defendants would have made a profit on the 42,000 pounds of tobacco which they had contracted for, if Carsey & Co. had advanced the money to pay for it, would depend on whether or not tobacco advanced or declined in price in the interim before it could be prized and put on the market. It appears from the evidence that the defendants lost money on the tobacco they did buy and ship; and if the 42,000 pounds was sold at the prices got for the other there would have been no profit. What the price of tobacco would have been when this 42,000 pounds were prized and put on the market was entirely conjectural. The price might have been so low as to entail a great loss. Profits which the defendants might have made if the money had been advanced are too precarious to constitute an element of damage. (Kentucky Tobacco Association v. Ashby, 9 Ky. Law Rep., 109.) The cases relied on for appellee are essentially different, for there the profits or gain might be reasonably estimated, but here there is no basis for estimating the profits except the unknown contingencies of the future. It is not alleged or shown that the defendants had contracted for the tobacco at less than its market price, or that it was at the time worth any more than they had agreed to pay for it. The breach of an agreement to lend money furnishes no grounds for a recovery of damages for injury to the reputation of the borrower from not getting it. On the whole case we conclude that no allowance should be made on account of any part of the counterclaim, and that judgment should be entered for the plaintiffs for their debt and the enforcement of their mortgage.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded for a judgment as herein indicated.

COMBS, &c. v. DUFF, JR., &c.

(Filed March 9, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Patents—Adverse possession—Where a tract of land has been held adversely by those in possession and those through whom they claim for more than fifty years, such possession and holding will be upheld.

Hall & Baker and W. F. Hall for appellants.

J. J. C. Bach and W. H. Miller for appellees.

Appeal from Perry Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

The appellees claim the land in controversy through John A. Duff, who lived at the mouth of Grapevine creek for more than sixty years, within a boundary containing twenty-one or twenty-two hundred acres, two hundred of which was in cultivation. The boundary so claimed is within the Pickett and Marshall patent for 23,100 acres granted by the governor of Virginia in 1792. About 1856 Cotton and Ketchum, claiming under the Pickett and Marshall patent, had a suit pending against John A. Duff to recover the land he had in his possession. Pending the suit E. C. Strong, who claimed to have acquired the right to the land under the Pickett and Marshall patent, sold his claim to Duff, and afterwards, on July 8, 1882, made him a deed therefor. Duff continued to occupy and claim the land until his death; since that time the appellees have so done, except for the interruption of the possession by appellants. The appellants claim the land in controversy under two Kentucky grants. They cover land which had been previously patented to Pickett and Marshall, and are void. In 1898 appellants entered within their respective boundaries and built little cabins and attempted to take possession of the land. They were trespassers, as their patents did not give them any right of entry. (Terry v. Johnson, 96 Ky., 95; Crate, &c. v. Strong, &c., 24 Ky. Law Rep., 710; Dineen v. Hall, &c., 28 Ky. Law Rep., 1615.) The appellees were in the actual possession of the land at the time, and they and the party through whom they claim had been for many years; especially had they been in the actual possession from the time Strong made the deed, claiming it to a well-defined boundary designated in the deed, which was for more than fifty years before appellants entered upon the land.

When the patentees applied to the register of the land office for the patents under which appellants claim, John A. Duff obtained a caveat against their issuance. It was certified to the circuit court for trial, and the court sustained a demurrer to and dismissed the proceedings. The office of a caveat is to have the question determined which of two claimants are entitled to have a patent issued for the unappropriated land. (Preston v. Preston, &c., 85 Ky., 16; Alexander v. Noland, 88 Ky., 143.) If a judgment in such a proceeding could operate as a bar in a future controversy over the title to the land, we could not so hold as the transcript does not contain the record of the proceeding, hence we can not hold that the court below erred in deciding it did not operate as a bar.

The judgment is affirmed.

PLANTERS BANK AND TRUST CO. v. MAJOR, &c.

(Filed March 9, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Husband and wife—In an action by appellant, to attach a fund due the husband, the claim of the wife to the fund as her property was improperly sustained, the evidence conducing to show that at the time of the transaction the husband discounted his own paper to a bank procuring the money; that the amount paid over which the controversy arose was something like a year before the time the wife claims to have come into possession of her money, and all the circumstances going to show fraud of the husband and wife to defeat the claim of appellant.

Landes & Allensworth and Downer & Russell for appellant.

J. W. Hopkins for appellees.

Appeal from Christian Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

This is a controversy between appellant, a creditor of Mat. S. Major, and appellee, his wife, over a fund of $1,608.95, attached in the case of Means, &c. v. Major, &c., Christian Circuit Court.

In 1893 L. W. Means purchased at judicial sale, in the case of Savage, &c. v. Gaither, &c., Christian Circuit Court, a tract of land known as the Over-shiner place, containing two hundred and twenty-three and two-thirds acres of land in Christian county, Kentucky. For the purchase price he executed bond, with Mrs. Lottie L. Shipp as surety. When this obligation fell due it was not paid, Means being unable, and his surety unwilling, to do so. Being pressed for payment, the principal obligor applied to his brother-in-law, Mat. S. Major, for a loan of the money with which to pay the bond; this Major refused to do, but agreed to pay the bond, take the conveyance of the land to himself, and give Means three months in which to redeem it; if this was not done within the time limited, the farm was to be the property of Major. This was agreed to, and, on the 16th day of December, 1895, Major paid over to the commissioner the sum of $1,608.95, that being the full amount of the purchase bond due from Means, with interest; and thereupon the commissioner executed and delivered to Major an absolute conveyance for the farm.

Means was left in possession, notwithstanding he failed to redeem the property, until October 14, 1899, when Major and his wife sold it to W. M. Girard for the sum of $2,236.66, for which the latter executed and delivered his five equal notes to Major, due, respectively, in one, two, three, four and five years from date. After receiving this conveyance Girard instituted forcible detainer proceedings against Means to obtain possession, and about the same time Means instituted an equitable action in the Christian Circuit Court for the purpose of having the conveyance from the commissioner to Major declared to be a mortgage, and the deed to Girard set aside. These two proceedings were finally consolidated, and on the 21st day of June, 1901, a judgment was entered by the chancellor, awarding to Means the relief prayed for by him in his petition, vacating the deed to Girard, cancelling the notes of the latter to Major, and giving Means until the first day of September, 1901, in which to repay to Major the money paid by him to the commissioner in satisfaction of Means' purchase bond; in default of which payment the property was to be again sold, and Major repaid out of the proceeds.

Means failed to pay in the time given him, and on the 23d of September, 1901, the property was again sold at judicial sale, and purchased by his wife, Mrs. Harriet E. Means, for the sum of $2,401, for which she executed bond with surety, and finally paid into court this money, constituting the subject-matter of this controversy.

After the rendition of the judgment of June 21, 1901, vacating the deed to Girard, Major executed and filed in the case of Means, &c. v. Major, &c. the following transfer:

"Whereas, Mrs. Kittie H. Major is the legal holder of the notes executed by W. M. Girard for the purchase price of the L. W. Means farm; and whereas the conveyance for which said notes were executed has been set aside by the Christian Circuit Court and the said notes are canceled; therefore, in order to place the said Mrs. Major in possession of all interest I have in said farm, per lien thereupon, and in consideration of the sum of $1 this day paid me, I hereby assign and transfer to the said Mrs. Major all the claim I have upon the said farm, the deed I hold against same, and the judgment rendered in the Christian Circuit Court against L. W. Means for the unpaid purchase money on said farm.

"This June 20, 1901.

MAT. S. MAJOR.

"Witnessed by: J. T. EDMONDS."

In the meantime the appellant had instituted two actions against Mat. S. Major in the Christian Circuit Court, which were afterwards consolidated, and judgments rendered against him for sums aggregating largely in excess of the fund in controversy. Upon these judgments executions were issued, and returned "no property found." Whereupon these two actions were instituted under section 489 of the Code, for the purpose of discovery and attachment of funds, or other property, belonging to Mat. S. Major, or in which he had an interest; and in both the fund in court in the case of Means, &c. v. Major, &c., was attached in the manner provided by the Code, and the assignment to appellee sought to be set aside on the ground of fraud and want of consideration.

To this action Mat. S. Major and appellee, his wife, filed separate answers, denying all the allegations of fraud in the petition; and the appellee in her answer pleading title to the fund in court independent of the assignment from her husband. In substance, she states that she furnished the money which originally went to satisfy Means' purchase bond, and that it was then and there agreed between her and her husband that the conveyance was to be made to her, but that through accident, inadvertence or fraud, it was made to her husband; that she did not know of this until the conveyance from her husband and herself to Girard, when her husband undertook to ratify the error by assigning to her Girard's notes for the purchase price of the land; and afterwards, when the conveyance to Girard was set aside by a judgment of the court, and her husband given a judgment for the money advanced by him to Means, that this fund then became hers, and the assignment from her husband to herself was merely the legal evidence of her title to property which was already equitably hers.

These allegations were placed in issue, and without going minutely into the details of the pleadings, the question as to whether or not the fund in court was the property of appellee, or whether, on the contrary, the assignment to her by her husband was fraudulent and void, was aptly raised, and is now the question for adjudication. It will be observed that appellee seeks to establish a resulting trust to the fund in court, making allegations, which, if true, would bring the transaction within the exception of section 3353, Kentucky Statutes, enacted for the purpose of abrogating resulting trusts. But in her testimony she places the time when she gave her husband the money with which to pay for the farm as "early as 1896," and her father, who testifies for her, places the time as late as March or April in 1894, whereas the record shows the husband paid the commissioner, and took the deed to himself on December 16, 1895; so that the record contradicts her statement as to this, and makes it impossible that her theory could have been true. She also overlooks the fact that it is indisputably shown that the transaction between her husband and Means was not to be a purchase by the former of the property, but only a loan; and the conveyance was taken to himself to secure his debt, provided it was paid within three months. This is entirely inconsistent with appellee's theory that the original transaction was to be a purchase by her with her own money as an investment. She states in her testimony that her father advised her not to invest her money in the Overshiner place, but to use it in paying for another tract of land belonging to her, known as the Herndon place, and she gives as a reason for not taking the advice of her father that her husband said to her that by investing her money in the Means property she would double it. But, as said before, this entirely ignores the fact that the original transaction was not to be a purchase of the land, but a loan to Means; and the only way that the title to the property could vest in the Majors would be through the misfortune of Means, in being unable to redeem it. Her statement that she furnished the money which her husband advanced to Means is contradicted by the officers of the city bank of Hopkinsville, who show that the husband raised the money by discounting his individual note at their bank; that the proceeds were carried to his credit, and that he gave his own check to the commissioner. The check itself is placed in evidence, and the testimony of the commissioner, Judge Winfrey, places this matter beyond question.

It is unreasonable to believe that appellee did not ascertain that the conveyance was not made to her (if it should have been) in the long time elapsing between December 16, 1895, when it was made to her husband, and October 14, 1899, when the land was conveyed to Girard. During all this period Means was permitted to remain in possession, and, so far as the record shows, she obtained no profit of any kind from her property. Assuming that the property was hers, according to her understanding, she must have regarded it as peculiar, to say the least, that, during the four years mentioned, Means was permitted to remain in possession, without rendering her any account, or profit, by reason of his tenancy. When, however, the conveyance was made to Girard she admits to having discovered the error against her, and states that her husband rectified his mistake by assigning all of the Girard notes to her. But again she is contradicted by the record. Girard, in his testimony, shows that before the judgment vacating the conveyance to him was rendered Major brought to him two of the notes theretofore given for the purchase price of the land, and requested that he (Girard) would take them up, and give to him (Major) duplicate notes therefor, stating that he desired to have a different endorsement on the new notes from that upon the old. This Girard, after consulting his attorney, did, delivering duplicates for the old notes as requested. He says that Major requested him to destroy the old notes, but that his attorney advised him not to do so, and in compliance with this legal advice he retained them. These are placed in evidence, and show, by the endorsements upon them, that they were assigned to appellee, not absolutely, as she testifies and as would have been the case had she been the owner, but only as collateral security to indemnify her from loss by reason of her suretyship of a debt due by her husband to the Planters Bank and Trust Co.

The evidence of appellee, that she paid over to her husband the $1,608.95 in controversy, in money, at their home, when no one was present but themselves, without the intervention of any of the business forms or ceremony usually attending such large transactions, of itself excites the utmost incredulity. This transaction took place in Hopkinsville, a city of banks, and where financial transactions are carried on in modern style, and it is highly improbable that this large sum of money would have been kept in the house, and paid over without the intervention of a check, or other receipt. It is not believed that ladies usually keep such large sums about their homes. If a fraud was intended, just such a transaction would necessarily have been resorted to. On the other hand, J. T. Edmonds, the attorney who drew up the assignment from Major to his wife, testifies that at the time it was done Major declared to him that it was for the purpose of deluding his creditors; that he had originally assigned the Girard notes to his wife for that purpose, and, now that the court had vacated them, he wished to assign the judgment to his wife, in order that his creditors might not finally obtain the money. Both Edmonds and Girard testified to conversations with her husband in the presence of appellee, which excluded the idea that she had any interest in the Means property. On the other hand, there is no competent testimony that supports appellee's claim to the fund in controversy. Without going into the details, it may be said that the evidence which would have any tendency to uphold her case is incompetent, either because it is in direct violation of the provision of the Code which forbids the introduction as evidence of communications between husband or wife, or of those elementary rules which forbid the introduction of hearsay testimony, and especially of that class of hearsay which consists of declarations in the interest of the declarant. But it is immaterial for the purposes of this case whether this incompetent evidence be excluded or not. Taken as a whole, we think it is indubitably shown, that the assignment from Means to his wife was a mere fraudulent ruse to conceal his property from his creditors. All of the evidence which is shown by writing, or which is established beyond contradiction, refutes appellee's claim, and while entertaining for the finding of the chancellor on the facts the highest regard, we are constrained to the conclusion that his judgment, awarding the fund to appellee instead of to appellant, was erroneous, and for this reason it is reversed for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

DANVILLE COAL AND ICE CO. v. VILTNER MFG. CO.

(Filed March 9, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Contracts—Where the owners of an ice plant, a month or so after they began to operate it, stated in a letter to the contractor that the machinery was fulfilling the contract, and some time after this, without objection, executed notes for the remainder of the contract price for putting in the plant, and finally asked indulgence on the notes, promising payment, such statements and representations bound the owners in an action by the contractor for the recovery of the balance of his demand for putting in the machinery for the ice plant.

2. Warranty—In an action for the recovery of the balance due for putting in an ice plant, a defense relying upon a warranty could not be maintained beyond the year when the plant was constructed, as it could not be operated for an indefinite time and losses of profits claimed for an indefinite period.

A. C. VanWinkle, Robt. Harding and Chas. E. Rodes for appellant.

Rawling C. Voris and C. C. Bagby for appellee.

Appeal from Boyle Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

In the spring of the year 1899 the Viltner Manufacturing Co. put in an ice plant for appellant at Danville, Ky. After the plant had been put up and turned over to appellant and they had operated it for some time, on September 1, 1899, they executed two notes to the Viltner Co. for $1,886.16, each payable in three months. They paid $3,000 on the notes December 20, 1899, but failed to pay the balance, and this suit was brought by the Viltner Co. to recover therefor; also on an open account accruing after the execution of the notes. The defendants by their answer denied that certain charges in the account were reasonable, or that certain items charged were ordered by them or sold to them. They also pleaded that at the time the plaintiff sold them the ice plant it guaranteed that the plant should be capable of producing ten tons of crystal, clear ice every twenty-four hours of continuous running; that the plant was not capable of producing this ice in the year 1899, but owing to some defect in the construction or erection of the machinery about one-third of each cake of ice produced in the year 1899 was impure and useless; that thereby the defendants sustained a loss of 500 tons of ice, worth $5 a ton, to their damage in the sum of $2,500. In another paragraph the same allegations were made as to the year 1900. In a fourth paragraph of the answer they pleaded that plaintiff having failed to make the plant do what they had guaranteed it would do, defendants notified plaintiff that they desired to change the location of the plant, and to this end plaintiff sent an engineer named Afflick to make the transfer and start the plant so as to make it as guaranteed; but Afflick was drunk and failed to make the plant produce the ice guaranteed, and yet they were charged with the board of Afflick in the account. The court sustained a demurrer to the third and fourth paragraphs of the answer setting up the defectiveness of the plant in the years 1900 and 1901. An amended answer was filed as to the year 1900, in which it was pleaded that the ice plant having proven to be defective in the year 1899, before the season of 1900 opened the plaintiffs undertook to remedy the defect and agreed to make the plant as guaranteed, and when the work was done assured defendants that all defects in the plant had been remedied, and thus induced them to continue its operation, but that it was as defective as before. This amended answer was controverted of record. In another amended answer the defendants pleaded that in the spring of 1901, before the plant was put in operation, they requested plaintiff to move the plant from its location to another point, and to reconstruct it so as to make it as guaranteed; that in pursuance to this demand the plaintiff undertook to move the plant and make it as guaranteed; that it did move it and reconstruct it, but from the time it began operation, about April 1, it was not as guaranteed until July 1, and during this time one-third of the ice was a total loss. The court sustained a demurrer to this pleading. Issue was joined on the allegations of the answer and an estoppel was pleaded. The case was heard before a jury, which found for the plaintiff, subject to a credit of $410 on the account. The defendants appeal from the judgment entered on the verdict. At the conclusion of the evidence the court instructed the jury as follows:

"3d. If you believe from the evidence that in the year 1899 the ice plant, because of a defect either in the construction or the erection of the machinery composing said plant, did not produce, and was incapable of producing, on reasonably skillful management, ten tons of clear, crystal ice every twenty-four hours, and that any part of the ice produced for that year was not clear or crystal because of such defect, and that defendants suffered damage thereby, then you will find for defendants on their counterclaim for such damage the reasonable profits defendants would have realized on their ice that year if the entire output had been clear, crystal ice. Unless you so believe, find nothing on their counterclaim.

"4th. The counterclaim of defendants for damages accruing from the operation of the plant in the year 1900 is based on what defendants claim to be another contract made between the parties before the opening of the ice-making season in said year 1900, and after the close of the season 1899.

"If you believe from the evidence that before the opening of the ice-making season in the year 1900, and after the close of the season of 1899, the plaintiff and defendants, the former acting through his authorized agent, made a contract by which the plaintiff agreed to undertake to remedy all defects in said ice plant and to make it capable of producing ten tons of clear, crystal ice every twenty-four hours; that plaintiff under said contract made changes, repairs and alterations in said plant, and then guaranteed to defendants that the plant was capable of making ten tons of clear, crystal ice every twenty-four hours; and if you further believe from the evidence that upon reasonably efficient and reasonably skillful management, said plant, as repaired or altered or changed, was not capable of producing, and did not produce, ten tons of clear, crystal ice every twenty-four hours, and that the defendants suffered damage thereby, then you find for the defendants on their counterclaim for the year 1900, the reasonable profits defendants would have realized on their ice that year if the entire output had been clear, crystal ice. Unless you so believe, you will find nothing for defendants on this counterclaim. * * *

"5th. If you believe from the evidence that after the close of the season of 1900, and before the opening of the season of 1901, the defendants, in order to and for the purpose of obtaining from plaintiff the aid of an expert in removing and reconstructing its ice plant, and for the purpose of inducing plaintiff to open a new account with them, proposed to plaintiff that if plaintiff would so furnish said expert and so open a new account with them, they would settle their entire indebtedness to plaintiff, meaning and intending thereby to cause plaintiff to understand that they would pay off the account sued on and the unpaid balance of the notes sued on, provided the plant on reconstruction should be capable of making pure, clear ice; and if you further believe from the evidence that the plaintiff accepted this proposition, opened a new account, furnished the expert, and that the plant under the management and direction of said expert was so reconstructed that it was capable under reasonably skillful handling to make clear, pure ice, then you can not consider any defense which the defendants make to this action, and your verdict must be for the plaintiff on the notes and account sued on. Unless you so believe, then you can not find that the defendants are estopped from contesting plaintiff's claims."

The form of the verdict of the jury shows that they allowed a credit of $410, because they regarded certain charges in the account unreasonably high. The evidence also warrants this conclusion. The finding of the jury was in effect a finding against the defendants on account of defects in the plant for the years 1899 and 1900. The defendants complain that the demurrer was sustained to their amended answer setting up the claim for damages for the year 1901, and that the court restricted them to a recovery under their warranty for the damages sustained in the year 1899. They also complain that the verdict of the jury is palpably against the evidence.

The evidence for the defendants was to the effect that the plant from the start did not make ice up to the warranty, it being conceded that the plant was warranted to make ten tons of clear, crystal ice a day as alleged by the defendants; that this trouble continued through the second season and into the third until about the 1st of July, when defendants employed a man from Cincinnati who did some work upon it, and after this they had no trouble. On the other hand, it was shown that the plant was started in the spring of 1899, and about a month after it was started the defendants sent the Viltner Co. a letter by the man who put it up, stating that the machinery, so far as they were able to judge, fulfilled the contract. Two months or more after this the notes sued on were executed without objection, and after the season was over, on December 8, when payment of the notes was demanded, the defendants wrote, asking indulgence on the notes and promising payment. On December 20 $3,000 was paid on the debt, and the defendants themselves admitted on cross-examination that as late as March of the next year they had not concluded to make a claim for damages on the warranty. There was some trouble about the machinery from the time the man who put it up left; but the correspondence would indicate that the trouble then complained of was from the odor and taste of the ice. The damage claimed on the trial was on the ground that the plant would not make clear, crystal ice, and that about one-third of what was frozen was colored and had to be thrown away. Without minutely setting out the facts, we conclude that the trouble with the plant, from the evidence, was that none of the men handling it understood the business, and the reason there was no trouble after July, 1901, was that they then got a good man to operate it. The jury seems to have come to this conclusion from the proof. The warranty which appellee gave was in writing, but the written contract, although referred to by the witnesses, was not read to the jury, and is not before us on the appeal. But aside from this, we think the court properly restricted the recovery under the warranty to the damages sustained in the year 1899. The defendants operated the plant during that entire season. If it did not come up to the warranty the defendants were entitled to recover the difference in value between the plant they got and the plant they contracted for, and, in addition to this, they might recover such special damages as they suffered, which were within the reasonable contemplation of the parties; but they could not continue to operate the plant indefinitely, and claim the loss of profits for this indefinite period. The finding of the jury was that there was no breach of warranty in the year 1899, and if the warranty was not broken in the year 1899 there could be no recovery on it for the years 1900 and 1901; for if the machinery filled the warranty in 1899, and during that season, it would be an unreasonable construction of the contract to hold the plaintiff liable upon it for subsequent years.

The court submitted to the jury aptly whether a new contract was made in the spring of 1900, and allowed a recovery if this contract was not complied with. The letters of the plaintiff, which were read in evidence to the jury, established the contract beyond question, and so the finding of the jury under this instruction was that the plant in the season of 1900 came up to the warranty. The condition of the plant was the same in 1901; for, so far as appears, the man from Cincinnati made no substantial changes. We, therefore, conclude that on the real merits of their case the defendants had a fair trial before the jury, and that no reason exists for disturbing their verdict.

Judgment affirmed.

BALDRICK, &c. v. GAST, &c.

(Filed March 10, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Street construction—Apportionment warrant—Where the pleadings and evidence in an action to enforce the payment of an apportionment warrant set out the enactment of the ordinance authorizing the construction, the names of the owners of the abutting property, the letting of the contract and the performance of the work, and the acceptance by the board of public works, a judgment enforcing the lien will be upheld.

2. Same—Evidence—Where the owner of a lot upon which a lien for street improvements was sought to be enforced testified that he had left a writing with a member of his family to be handed to the inspector of the work, his testimony amounts to nothing more than that he failed to see the inspection of the work, and can not outweigh the positive statements of the engineer that he did inspect and accept the work.

J. W. S. Clements and H. H. Cocke for appellants.

Wm. Furlong and J. L. Woodbury for appellees.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery Branch, Second Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle.

This is an appeal from the judgment of the Jefferson Circuit Court, Second Division, subjecting the appellant, M. E. Baldrick's, lot of ground in the city of Louisville, under an apportionment warrant, to the payment of a lien of $51.08, for the improvement of an alley from Avery to Brandies avenues, between Second and Third streets. The petition is in the customary form, and sets out in appropriate language the enactment of the ordinance for the construction of the alley, the names of the owners of the abutting property, the letting of the contract for the work to appellees, their performance of the work according to the ordinance and specifications, the acceptance thereof by board of public works of the city of Louisville, the apportionment of the cost of the improvement among the property owners, and the issual to appellees of the apportionment warrant therefor. The answer traversed in part the averments of the petition, and, in addition, averred that the work of constructing the alley was defectively done, contrary to the ordinance and contract; that it had never been received by the city; and finally, that the apportionment of the cost of improvement had not been correctly made.

The material averments of the answer were controverted by reply. The lower court held that the defense interposed was without merit, and rendered judgment subjecting the lot to the payment of appellees' lien debt, and from that judgment this appeal is prosecuted. It appears from the record that the work of constructing the alley was done under an ordinance duly enacted and according to certain specifications contained therein, and that it was performed by appellees under contract with the city, awarded them after proper advertisement; and further, that the work was duly inspected and accepted by the board of public works of the city. The appellant, after the acceptance of the work by the proper authorities of the city, will not be permitted to escape paying for it by mere proof that the work was not done in accordance with the ordinance. (Eversole v. Walsh, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 784; Purdy v. Drake, 17 Ky. Law Rep., 819.)

It is insisted for appellants that there was no inspection or acceptance of the work by the city in this case. There seems to have been two notices for the inspection and acceptance of the work, both of which were duly advertised in a daily paper of the city as required by law. The first notice was for November 28, 1901; the second for December 11, following. The purpose of such notice is to give an opportunity to the property owners upon whom will fall the cost of the improvement, to be present at its inspection by the city officials, that they may call attention to such defects in the work as may exist, and object to its acceptance.

Parsons, the city enigneer, who was deputed by the city's board of public works to inspect and accept this work, testified that it was not accepted on November 28, the date fixed by the first notice, as certain defects of a slight character were found in the work, which he required to be remedied before he would accept it, for which reason the notice for December 11 was given, and that on that day the work, upon a second inspection, was found satisfactory, and was then accepted, of which he gave the board of public works due notice by formal written report and by letter. The report bears date December 5, which is probably a mistake of the copyist, as the instrument contains the statement that the work on the alley was inspected and received on December 11, as provided by the notice. We are unprepared to believe, in the absence of proof of such intention, that the city engineer would have wantonly and fraudulently reported an inspection and acceptance, neither of which was in fact made, and that, too, in advance of the date fixed for such inspection. Besides, in addition to the report mentioned, which also contains the apportionment of the cost of the work, there appears in the record a letter from the engineer to the board of public works, notifying it of his inspection and acceptance of the work, which was written on and bears date December 11, 1901.

The engineer testified with positiveness that the inspection and acceptance of the work were made on that day, and at the hour fixed by the notice, and it appears from the record that the apportionment warrant was issued to appellees by the city December 17, 1901. The appellant's denial that the work was ever inspected or accepted is supported by only one witness, the appellant, Samuel Baldrick, but upon cross-examination he admitted that on the day fixed for the inspection of the alley he stood around a few minutes on his back premises, his wife's lot being about equally removed from either end of the alley, for the purpose of objecting to the acceptance of the work when the inspector came to examine it, but as it was cold weather that he returned to his house without seeing him, and left a written statement with some member of his family to be handed the inspector upon his arrival, in which writing he objected to the work and the city's acceptance of it. The witness did not know, however, whether the writing was or not delivered to the inspector, nor did he introduce any member of his family to corroborate his statements. His testimony amounts to nothing more than that he failed to see the inspection of the work if it was made. Such testimony can not be allowed to outweigh the evidence furnished by the report and letter and positive statements of the engineer that he did inspect and accept the work. It has been decided by this court that when the work has been accepted by the proper authorities of the city, and there is no allegation of fraud or collusion, such acceptance is conclusive evidence that the work was performed according to the requirements of the contract. (Barker v. Tennessee Paving Co., 24 Ky. Law Rep., 1524.)

The answer in this case does not allege either fraud or collusion, nor is either shown by the evidence. The attempted defense that the apportionment was not legally or correctly made can not be relied on by appellants in this case, as they have neither averred nor proved that under another or corrected apportionment the cost of the improvement charged against their lot would have been lessened. (Schuster v. Barber Asphalt Paving Co., 24 Ky. Law Rep., 2446.)

For the reasons herein indicated the judgment is affirmed.

MULLINS v. VANARSDALL.

(Filed March 10, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Compromise—Settlement—Where parties made a settlement of their accounts and in pursuance thereof one of them executed to the other two notes, without any allegation of fraud or mistake in the settlement, he can not in an action go behind it. Such a settlement when made should be conclusive of all matters between the parties when not impeached on the ground of fraud or mistake.

E. H. Galther for appellant.

J. F. Vanarsdall for appellee.

Appeal from Mercer Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

It appears from this record that prior to May 1, 1901, the appellee, Jackson Vanarsdall, instituted an action against appellant, A. R. Mullins, and others for a settlement of all matters between them, and that A. R. Mullins was the real defendant in that action. On May 1, 1901, they compromised and settled, and on that settlement A. R. Mullins, appellant, executed two notes to appellee for $363.50 each, due in one and two years, with interest after maturity until paid. Appellee sold and assigned these notes before maturity to the First National Bank of Harrodsburg, Ky. On July 27, 1903, after both notes became due, the bank instituted suit upon them against A. R. Mullins, appellant, and Jackson Vanarsdall, appellee. The appellant, Mullins, filed his answer to this action. He did not contest the bank's right to a judgment, but made his answer a cross action against his codefendant and appellee, Vanarsdall, and stated in substance that the notes sued on by the bank were executed to Vanarsdall in settlement and compromise of a suit then pending in the Mercer Circuit Court, wherein the said Vanarsdall was plaintiff, and this appellant was the real defendant; that the purpose of that suit was a settlement of the accounts between them, and alleged that at the time of this compromise and settlement and the execution of the two notes by him to the appellee he then held four promissory notes of appellee, all dated in the year 1886 and due within that year, and all amounting to the sum of $2,100, with their interest, and that this appellant, at the time of the settlement and the execution of the notes, failed to credit the notes he held by the amount of the two notes he executed to appellee; that at that time his notes were lost or misplaced, and by an oversight on his part he failed to credit appellee for the amount of the two notes sued on, and that appellee is indebted to him in the sum of $2,100, less the amount of the two notes. The court sustained a demurrer to the pleading of appellant, and he has appealed from that judgment.

The appellee contends that the judgment of the lower court is right for the reason that the notes claimed by appellant show upon their face that they are barred by the statute of limitations. We deem it unnecessary to pass upon this question for the reason that there is another question conclusive of the case. The appellant shows by his pleadings that the appellee, in 1901, sued him for a settlement of all matters between them, and that they did in fact, on May 1, 1901, settle and compromise that action, and in pursuance of that compromise and settlement he executed to appellee the two notes sued on, and in this cross action he seeks to go behind that settlement and compromise and recover of appellee the amount of four notes that were in existence at that time, without an allegation of any fraud or mistake in arriving at the settlement or compromise. He contents himself with the allegation that he neglected to credit these notes with the amount of the notes he executed to the appellee. Settlements and compromises are favored in law, and a compromise implies the surrendering of some conceived right on the part of both, a giving or surrendering of something by each to obtain the settlement. It may have been that appellee, at the time of the compromise, had full knowledge of the notes now claimed by appellant, and understanding that by this settlement these notes were to be abrogated, he accepted the amount of the two notes sued on, presumably, on his part, surrendering claims of equal dignity. When a settlement between parties, intended and understood to be final, is made, the same should be considered conclusive of all matters antedating the settlement or compromise, unless impeached on the ground of fraud or mistake or undue advantage, or some improper means used in procuring it. No such impeachment has been made in the pleadings of appellant, and the lower court was right in sustaining the demurrer. (8 Dana, 46; 6 Mon., 98; 2 Bush, 252; 12 Ky. Law Rep., 620; 7 Ky. Law Rep., 40.)

Wherefore, the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

Deeds—Where a paper purporting to be a deed was never acknowledged as required by law, and the signature was by mark, the record containing no proof of its execution, it was not sufficient to pass title.

Riddell & Riddell and H. L. Wheeler for appellants.

Hazelrigg, Chenault & Hazelrigg for appellees.

Appeal from Lee Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

This case is before this court for the second time. The opinion delivered upon the former appeal (20 Ky. Law Rep., 1812), sets out the condition of the pleadings at that time. The judgment of the trial court upon the former appeal was reversed on the ground that the pleadings in the case did not authorize the judgment, and the case was remanded, with instructions to allow both parties to reform and amend their pleadings. Upon the return of the case the appellants, William and John Abner, filed an amended petition against the appellees, E. G. Creech, Enoch Creech and Emily Parsons, in which they allege in substance that on the 21st day of April, 1890, the appellee, E. G. Creech, had executed to them his promissory note, due on the 21st day of April, 1891, for $300 for loaned money, and to secure its payment had executed a mortgage upon a tract of one hundred acres of land occupied by him on the waters of the Kentucky river. They further allege that the appellee, Enoch Creech, had conveyed the title to this land by quit deed on the 27th of December, 1883, for value received; and that E. G. Creech was then, and had ever since been, in the possession of it, claiming it as his own against all the world, and was so claiming and residing upon it at the date of the mortgage to them in 1890, but that he had failed and refused to have the deed recorded; that the appellees, Parsons, E. G. Creech and Enoch Creech, had entered into a fraudulent conspiracy to claim the land as the property of Enoch Creech for the purpose of defeating the collection of their judgment, and asked that the court adjudge the land the property of E. G. Creech, and decree its sale. Both Enoch and E. G. Creech in their answers deny the execution or delivery of the alleged deed from Enoch to E. G. Creech, as of the 27th of September, 1882, and Enoch Creech denied that the possession of E. G. Creech was adverse to his title; admitted that he had lived on the land and used it, but alleged that he did so as his tenant. He further alleges that when E. G. Creech moved on the land that he had a verbal promise to sell it to him, but denied that E. G. Creech had ever paid him anything for it. The pleadings were made up by reply.

The evidence for appellants is to the effect that Enoch Creech bought a tract of land, of which the one hundred acres in controversy formed a part, from one Crawford in 1872; and that a division of the land was about that time agreed upon between Enoch and E. G. Creech; and that shortly afterwards E. G. Creech took possession of the part which fell to him in the division, and had ever since resided upon it, claiming to be its owner; that he had cultivated it, cut timber on it, built fences and exercised every conceivable act of ownership over it. A number of witnesses testified that both Enoch and E. G. Creech told them that they had purchased the land together, and divided it. A number of witnesses also testified that both Creeches had always spoken of the land in controversy as the property of E. G. Creech. Other witnesses testified that E. G. Creech claimed to have in his possession a deed to the land from his brother Enoch. W. O. Smallwood and O. H. Davis testified that he had in his possession a deed dated the 27th of September, 1882, to the land from Enoch Creech, a copy of which is filed with his deposition. Smallwood testifies that he took this paper out of a box belonging to E. G. Creech, and made a copy of it; and that E. G. Creech had repeatedly informed him that it had been executed to him by Enoch, and that he had long before fully paid for the land. This alleged deed, however, was never acknowledged by Enoch Creech as required by law, and he denied ever having executed it. His signature was by mark, and the record contains no proof of its execution by him. We think, therefore, that appellants failed to establish the authenticity of the paper. But it seems to us the evidence in the case conclusively establishes the adverse possession of this land by E. G. Creech for more than fifteen years before the execution of the note for $360, and the mortgage to secure it. E. G. Creech has not testified, and the testimony of Enoch Creech that his brother, E. G. Creech, took possession of the land under a parol contract of purchase in 1872, and had ever since admitted his title, is wholly inconsistent with the conduct, acts and claims of E. G. Creech with reference to the land for more than twenty years before he borrowed appellant's money.

Whilst there must be a written contract signed by the vendor to enable the vendee to hold by virtue of the written contract, "a different question is presented when a vendee or donee has taken possession of land under a verbal contract, saying to the vendor or donor and all the world this is my land and not yours, and has held it for more than fifteen years. The moment the vendee, or donee, does this the vendor or donor has the right to sue for the land; and the adverse holding begins, and having continued for the statutory period, this possession ripens into a possessory title. (Commonwealth v. Gibson, &c., 85 Ky., 689; Wood on Limitations, 539.)"

Section 2509 of the Kentucky Statutes provides that "no continual claim upon or near real property shall preserve a right to bring an action."

Even if it be conceded that Enoch Creech claimed the land in controversy from the time E. G. Creech took possession of it in 1872, such claim under the statute would be ineffectual to entitle him to institute a suit for its possession in the face of an adverse claim of ownership therein by E. G. Creech for more than fifteen years. As a matter of fact, however, in this case the overwhelming weight of the proof tends to show that prior to the time when E. G. Creech borrowed appellant's money and executed the mortgage on the land Enoch Creech asserted no claim of ownership in himself.

For reasons indicated the judgment is reversed and cause remanded, with instruction to subject the one hundred acres of the land in controversy, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to the payment of the $300 loaned by appellants to E. G. Creech in April, 1880, with 6 per cent. interest thereon from that time until paid.

CITY OF COVINGTON v. JONES.

(Filed March 10, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Damages—In an action against a city for damages sustained by falling into a hole in a pavement, where the city admitted in its evidence that it learned of the condition of the street on the morning before the accident happened at night, the street being considerably traveled, the court properly overruled a motion by the city for a peremptory instruction, and a verdict against the city being reasonable, the injuries of appellee being serious, will not be disturbed.

F. J. Hanlon for appellant.

B. F. Graziani for appellee.

Appeal from Kenton Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

The evidence shows that appellee fell into a hole in the pavement on one of appellant's streets, in the night time, and was injured. The hole was about two feet deep, about three feet wide, and extended across the pavement. The place was not lighted. Appellee sustained a fractured rib, perforating or damaging a lung. She was confined to her room for about a month, and continued for some months after to suffer from the injuries. Her physician's bill was $50. The jury awarded her $500 damages against the city. Appellant contends that it should have had a peremptory instruction at the close of plaintiff's case, because it was not then shown that the city knew of the hole, or ought to have known of it by ordinary diligence. The proof of the plaintiff showed that the pavement had caved in early Saturday morning or Friday night. Appellee was injured Saturday night. The street was considerably traveled. Whether defendant could have learned of the condition by ordinary diligence was a question properly for the jury, and the court was right in overruling the motion for a peremptory instruction against plaintiff. Without resting its case there appellant introduced its evidence showing that it did learn of the condition Saturday morning, but did not put a light at the hole till about 10 o'clock Saturday night after appellee's injury. Even if the peremptory instruction should have gone at the close of plaintiff's case, defendant's evidence cured the deficiency in the evidence.

It is not prejudicial in this case that the court's instruction as to appellant's duty apparently required the city to keep its sidewalk in "safe" condition for travel, instead of "reasonably safe," for it is manifest that a hole, such as this one in a sidewalk, was not "reasonably safe." It was not possible for the jury to have a difference of opinion on that point. The only question, under the evidence, about which they might have differed were whether the city had notice or reasonable time to learn of the conditions, and if so the amount necessary to compensate plaintiff for her injury, pain, loss of time and expense in causing the injury. The verdict is not excessive.

Judgment affirmed.

CARR v. LOUDEN & CO.

(Filed March 10, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Sales—Contracts—Where a commission merchant purchased wheat to be paid for upon its delivery at Chicago, a letter from the shipper to the commission merchant at the time of the shipment stating, "I am sure will stand the test as it goes 61 and 62 here," obviously meant that the wheat was to be inspected and graded, and in an action against the seller by the commission merchant for the amount of value of shortage, a judgment in favor of the merchant for the amount of the shortage will not be disturbed.

W. B. Cochran for appellant.

Thos. M. Wood for appellees.

Appeal from Mason Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle.

This action was instituted in the Mason Circuit Court against the appellant, R. A. Carr, by the appellee, J. A. Loudon, a grain commission merchant of Cincinnati, O., doing business in the name of J. A. Loudon & Co. It is averred in the petition that appellee, in May, 1898, purchased of appellant, at the price of $1.50 per bushel, 4,000 bushels of No. 2 red winter wheat, to grade No. 2, and to be accepted and paid for by Chicago weights and inspection; that it was, however, agreed between them that appellant upon shipment of the wheat at Maysville, Ky., should draw upon appellee, with bills of lading attached, for the price of the wheat to the amount of $1.40 per bushel, leaving 10 cents per bushel unpaid until final settlement, which was supposed to be a sufficient margin to make good appellant's contract in Chicago; that pursuant to the terms of the contract the appellant shipped to appellee at Chicago four carloads of wheat, each invoiced at 1,000 bushels, Chicago weights and grade No. 2, at $1.50 per bushel, each car amounting to $1,500, with sight draft and bill of lading attached for each car for $1,400; that appellee, relying on the contract with appellant as to Chicago weights and inspection, paid each of the drafts as presented before the wheat reached Chicago, or had been weighed or inspected there, which payments amounted in the aggregate to $5,600; that when weighed and inspected in Chicago two car loads of the wheat shipped him by appellant graded No. 2 according to contract, but fell short in weight, the two cars containing only 1,961 80-100 bushels, instead of 2,000 bushels as per invoice; that the other two car loads of wheat failed in quality, and by Chicago inspection only graded as No. 3, instead of No. 2 wheat as required by the contract, and that upon the failure of the wheat to grade No. 2 by Chicago inspection appellee immediately notified appellant of the fact of his (appellee's) refusal to accept it, and asked him for instructions; whereupon the appellant instructed appellee to appeal on the inspection of the wheat, which he did at a cost of $16 inspection fees, but with the result that the wheat still graded No. 3, by reason of which appellee still refused to accept the same upon his contract with appellant, and so notified him, and offered to return him the wheat upon his making good his contract with appellee, which appellant refused to do, and left the wheat in appellee's hands.

It is further averred in the petition that appellee, after immediately notifying appellant that he would hold the No. 3 wheat at his risk and order it sold for his account, and look to him for the difference between the net amount realized for the wheat and the amount advanced by appellee thereon, viz., $2,810, and that without delay the wheat was sold at the best market price in Chicago. For one of the cars of No. 3 wheat, which contained 994 40-100 bushels, a net price of $1,041.57 was realized, and for the other, containing 995 bushels, $1,092.10 net was realized, both of which sums were duly credited to appellant's account, and that after crediting appellant with these sums, and charging him with the shortage in the two car loads of No. 2 wheat, and the $10 paid for him on the appeal on inspection, the aggregate amounted to $484.08 less than the entire sum that was advanced him by appellee upon the wheat by the payment of the drafts attached to the way bills, and for this sum of $484.08 appellee prayed judgment against the appellant.

The answer of appellant contains a specific denial of the averments of the petition, except as to the fact that he sold appellee 4,000 bushels of No. 2 red wheat at $1.50 per bushel; but it is alleged in the answer that the wheat was to be delivered to appellee on the cars at Maysville, and then and there paid for by him without regard to Chicago weights or inspection; that the wheat was so delivered, and was guaranteed to weigh 56 pounds to the bushel; and further, that appellee was yet indebted to appellant upon the wheat to the extent of 10 cents per bushel, amounting in the aggregate to $400, for which sum judgment was asked by appellant, and to that end his answer made a counterclaim against appellee. Appellee filed reply traversing the affirmative averments of the answer.

Upon the trial a verdict was returned by the jury in appellee's favor for the amount claimed by him, and judgment entered therefor in his behalf. Of which judgment, and the action of the lower court in refusing him a new trial, the appellant now complains. After a careful examination of the record we are satisfied that the trial court properly refused to disturb the verdict of the jury. It is true that the evidence is conflicting, and if in attempting to reach a verdict the jury had been confined to the testimony as detailed by the witnesses in view of its contradictory character, we can well

Imagine how difficult of solution would have been the questions of fact in issue. But our examination of the record has disclosed three facts, which, in our opinion, so completely support the appellee's version of the contract between the parties as to leave practically no doubt of his right to recover.

These are the facts referred to: On May 14, 1898, the day on which some of the wheat purchased by appellee was shipped by appellant, he wrote appellee the following letter:

"Messrs. Louden & Co.,

"Cincinnati, O.:

"Gentlemen—I have this day sent forward one car of wheat which I am sure will stand the test, as it goes 61 and 62 here. I will send the balance as soon as I can.

"R. A. CARR."

If there was to be no inspection or grading of the wheat when it reached Chicago, what test was it to be subjected to, and where? Obviously the test referred to in the letter was the inspection and grading which appellee contends was to be given at Chicago. The bills of lading for the four carloads of wheat accompanied by the drafts for the cash payments thereon at the rate of $1.40 per bushel reached appellee through a Cincinnati bank, the invoices he received by mail. The appellant being then in Cincinnati, appellee, in view of the fact that the wheat had not then arrived at Chicago, and to prevent any future misunderstanding about the terms of the contract, asked appellant to write on the invoices "guaranteed Chicago weights and grades," which he did.

Would he have given such a guaranty if he had not agreed when the wheat was sold that it was to be inspected and graded in Chicago? Appellee had not then paid the drafts, but he paid them immediately after the guaranty on the invoices was given. Finally, the request or direction from appellant that appellee take an appeal from the action of the Chicago inspecting board that first inspected his wheat and placed two car loads of it in the third grade, is conclusive evidence of the fact that it was to be paid for by appellee according to Chicago weights and inspection. Otherwise, appellant would not have cared how or when it was inspected or graded, or whether it was graded at all. We are unable to find any just grounds for the objections urged by counsel for appellant to the instructions given by the trial court; they seem to be entirely free from error, and to express with more than ordinary conciseness and clearness the whole law of the case. Consequently none of the refused instructions asked by appellant were necessary, or would have been proper.

Believing that the verdict was authorized by the evidence, and that the record is free from prejudicial error, the judgment is affirmed.

GREGORY v. LOUISVILLE & NASHVILLE R. R. CO.

(Filed March 10, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Railroads—Damages—In an action against a railroad company for damages resulting from being struck by its train and injured, where the evidence showed that at the time of the accident the morning was so foggy as to make the train visible for only thirty or forty yards, and where it was at a public highway, and there was ample space between the tracks to walk upon, the injury resulted from his own negligence, and a peremptory instruction to find for the railroad company was proper.

2. Same—In an action against a railroad company for damages for being run over by its train, where there was no crossing near the place where the accident occurred nor houses where people would likely be passing, there was no occasion for the giving of a signal at such a point.

B. B. Golden for appellant.

B. D. Warfield, James D. Black, J. W. Alcorn and Edward W. Hines for appellees.

Appeal from Knox Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

Appellant was in the employ of appellee as a member of a section gang. He lived on the railroad, one to two miles south of Artemus station, in Knox county. On the morning of October 10, as he was going along the railroad track from his home to the section tool house north of the station where he was to begin his day's work, he was struck by a rapidly moving train upon the main track and thrown partially under a moving train on the parallel side track, by which latter train his foot was mangled, and he was otherwise hurt. The injury occurred about 2,000 feet south of the station. The morning was very foggy. The track at that point curved. The long freight train on the side track, by reason of the curve, and possibly to some extent by reason of the fog, obstructed the view on the main track so that in the direction from which the train was coming it could not be seen more than thirty or forty yards distant. Appellant was going toward the train that hit him, but failed, for the reasons stated, to see it in time to get off the track to avoid being struck.

Artemus is a small unincorporated village, having some twenty or thirty families living in it. It is built stragglingly along the railway right of way and about the depot. Running about parallel with the railroad and from ten to twenty yards distant was a public highway that crossed the railroad track north of the depot and near the tool house. Appellant's course was north. Between the main and side tracks was a space of nine to eleven feet, where one could have walked with perfect safety from passing trains. The locomotive that struck appellant had whistled for the station, and had slowed up there. After passing the station some 100 or 150 yards it increased its speed, suddenly and considerably, until when it struck appellant it was running twenty-five or thirty miles an hour. At the point where appellant was struck there were no houses. The limits of the village had been passed. It is not claimed that the engineer or other person on the train striking appellant saw him in time to have possibly averted the injury. The following matters are claimed as negligence: First, that in running the train through the "town" it was run at a recklessly high and dangerous rate of speed, the railway company's servants knowing that the track at that point was frequently used by footmen as a passway; second, that there was no adequate signal of the approach of the train; and, third, that the engineer on the other train had just a moment before the accident seen appellant walking on the main track meeting the coming train, and failed to warn him of his danger.

As for the first contention, the train was not at the time of the injury running through a town or village. The speed of a train in the country is not a matter that can be negligence to trespassers on the track whose presence is unknown. (Brown's Adm'r v. L. & N. R. R. Co., 17 Ky. Law Rep., 145; Ky. Cent. R. R. Co. v. Gastineau's Adm'r, 88 Ky., 119.) The fact that footmen sometimes and very frequently used the tracks everywhere can not be held to give them any right to do so, nor can that fact lessen the right of the company to run its trains over its tracks without taking their possible presence into consideration. The proof in this case shows a state of facts of common existence. Many people in small villages along railways, and those living near the railway, are constantly using the tracks to walk along. There is no way to keep them from it. Appellant's contention, that the railway company should run its trains having in view the safety of these trespassers, would be to practically abandon the road to them. If at every curve, bridge, tunnel, cut and fill not plainly in view for a long distance the train would have to slow up, give signals and warnings, and take extraordinary precautions on account of possible trespassers, because other trespassers were in the habit of using the track, it would so retard as to practically destroy the railroad business. On the contrary, it is the duty of these common carriers to serve the public by the diligent use of their tracks and means. Their duties are onerous, and they are necessarily held to a high standard of strict performance in their discharge to the public with whom they must deal. To impose upon them this additional and extraordinary burden of policing their whole line of tracks, or to run their trains so slow and with such frequent warnings as to guard the safety of trespassers, would be equivalent to turning the right of way into a public highway for footmen. Such a rule would be against the public policy, that considers alike the welfare of the public in securing to it rapid and safe service from the carrier, as well as the preservation of human life. The public, by such unauthorized use, acquires no right to use the railway as a highway. (Hoskins' Adm'r v. L. & N. R. R. Co., 17 Ky. Law Rep., 73; Brown's Adm'r v. L. & N. R. R. Co., supra.) In Roseberry's Adm'r v. N. N. & M. V. R. R. Co., 19 Ky. Law Rep., 194, this court, speaking of the duty of a railroad company as to keeping a lookout, for those using the streets of a village of 150 or 200 people, said: "We do not think that the rule which has been established as to cities, with regard to accidents in the corporate limits, applies to a hamlet like Denton, having no streets or alleys."

The localities in which the public may be said to acquire such right of passing over the company's tracks by license must be understood to be those communities so populous and where the use is so general, as reasonably apprise the company that in every probability some one is likely to be found on the tracks at such point. Whether there was a signal or warning of the approach of the train was not proven. The most that was said on that point was by appellant, who said he did not hear any signal. But he also said that, owing to the noise being made by the locomotive of the train on the side track, which was only a few feet distant from him, he could not have heard the signal if it had been given. Nor does the situation, as proven

In the record, show any necessity for the giving of a signal at that point. There was no road or street crossing near, and no houses where people would likely be passing from across the track.

Of the third ground of negligence relied on it may be said there was no evidence to show that the engineer of the freight train on the side track knew that the other train was about to pass there at that moment; nor that he knew that appellant was unaware of its approach; nor that he suspected that appellant was going to continue on the main track in the face of an approaching train.

We do not mean to hold that the servants of a railroad company may not use its tracks in going to and from their proper places of employment, and that they are licensed to do so to a necessary extent. However, this would not relieve them from the duty to care for their own safety, by taking the safer of two or more ways equally accessible to them. There was no proof of negligence whatever against the appellee. Even if there had been proof of such negligence, appellant shows such contributory negligence that precludes his recovering in this case. Not only did he have the public highway to walk upon, but there was ample safe space between the tracks for him to have traveled. He, for his own convenience, left his proper place of travel, and took up a dangerous one instead, knowing that it was dangerous, and knowing that the track was being constantly used by trains. But for his own negligence his injury could not have occurred. There can not be two ways of looking at that. The peremptory instruction at the close of plaintiff's evidence was proper.

ILLINOIS CENTRAL R. R. CO. AND LOUISVILLE BRIDGE CO. v.
CROCKETT.

(Filed March 11, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Railroads—Damages—A verdict for $7,500 against appellant in an action by appellee against them for injuries sustained by being run over by appellant's engine, he being fastened to its track by catching his heel in a frog, will not be disturbed, the evidence conducing to show negligence on the part of the bridge company in suffering the dangerous condition of the frog, and negligence on the part of the servants of the railroad company in running its engine over him.

Pirtle, Trabue & Cox and Gibson, Marshall & Gibson for I. C. R. R. Co.
Charles H. Gibson for Louisville Bridge Co.

Kinney & Fitzgerald and Matt O'Doherty for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Common Pleas Branch, First Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

The appellant, Louisville Bridge Co., owns and maintains a railroad track along the center of Fourteenth street, connecting with its railroad bridge, which spans the Ohio river between Indiana and Kentucky. Under a contract with the bridge company, appellant, Illinois Central R. R. Co., operates its engines and cars over the bridge and along Fourteenth street, using the tracks of its co-appellant.

Appellee, Albert G. Crockett, on the night of the 17th of January, 1902, was run over at, or near, the intersection of Esquire and Fourteenth streets, in Louisville, Ky., by one of the engines of the railroad corporation, receiving injuries which made necessary the amputation of his left leg between the knee and the ankle; to recover damages for which he instituted this action.

In his petition he states in substance that on the night in question, between the hours of ten and eleven o'clock, he undertook to cross Fourteenth street diagonally from the east to the west side at, or near, where Esquire street intersects it; that in the western line of its road the bridge company kept and maintained a railroad frog, or switch, which was in an unblocked and dangerous condition to pedestrians; that in passing over this frog, or switch, he inadvertently stepped upon it in such a way that his heel was caught in the unblocked part of the frog, and became fastened, so that it was impossible for him to extricate it therefrom; that while he was in this condition, and attempting to remove his foot, two of the engines of the railroad corporation, which were coupled together and in charge of its employees, were backed along the line of the railroad on Fourteenth street and over his foot, mashing and crushing it in such manner as to necessitate its amputation. The negligence of the bridge company is alleged to have been the dangerous condition of the frog in which appellee's foot was caught; that of the railroad, in running its engines over him, when his presence on the track was either known to it, or could have been known by the exercise of reasonable diligence.

Appellants filed separate answers, denying all of the material allegations of the petition, and affirmatively pleading the contributory negligence of the appellee. The replies of the appellee, controverting the allegations of negligence on his part, made up the issues. The trial resulted in a verdict in favor of appellee against the appellants jointly for the sum of $7,500, of which they are now complaining. As to the condition of the frog at the time of the accident, it was shown by appellee's testimony that it was sufficiently open to admit his heel, and that he did get his heel fastened therein in such a way as to make it impossible for him to extricate it in time to avoid the approaching engines which ran over him. His witness, Robert Young, who is the engineer for the K. & I. Bridge Co., and who shows himself to be an expert civil engineer, examined the frog, found it sufficiently open to admit his heel being caught therein, and states in his testimony that it might have been kept in such a condition as to make the accident, which happened to appellee, impossible.

On the part of the bridge company it is shown that the frog in question was of the most modern and expensive character and quality; that it was blocked at either end, and in such condition as to make it highly improbable, if not impossible, that the accident to appellee could have occurred in the way he states. In appellee's deposition, which seems to have been taken by appellant some time before the trial (for what purpose does not definitely appear), he is made to say that he saw the frog before he stepped into it, knew it was dangerous, and, with this knowledge, stepped upon it and was caught; but in his testimony before the jury he materially qualifies these statements, and shows that he did not see the frog until his foot was upon it, and he was caught. The evidence upon this question is exceedingly voluminous, and it is neither necessary nor profitable to enter into a detailed statement or analysis of it. The question was one of fact, and eminently suited to the determination of the jury.

On the issue of the negligence of the railroad corporation, while there was much testimony, the most material was that of appellee for himself, and the pilot, John Noonan, for appellant. Appellee states that when he crossed the railroad track he saw the engines some two hundred feet away; that when he became fastened in the frog, the distance then having been reduced to one hundred feet, he took off his hat (being an experienced railroad man), and waived it in such a way as to give the signal to stop; that he was in plain view, and there was nothing to obstruct the vision of Noonan, who permitted the engines to run over his foot without even having given any signal of danger to those in charge of the engines which he was piloting. On the contrary, Noonan states that he did not see appellee until within ten or fifteen feet of him, when he at once gave the signal of danger, but it was impossible to stop the engines in time to save appellee from injury. All of the employes in charge of the engines corroborate Noonan in his statement that he did signal them to stop, but too late to prevent the injury to appellee; and the evidence is overwhelming that those in charge of the engines did all that they could, after receiving the signal, to stop. But this still leaves the question as to whether Noonan saw, or could have seen, by the exercise of ordinary diligence, the unfortunate plight of appellee in time to have saved him. The bill of evidence, as made out, makes Noonan say that the engines ran from 120 to 130 yards after he gave the signal of danger. When appellant's counsel, in order to extricate him from the consequences of this evident mistake, asked him if he meant 130 yards, and how many feet that was, he answered: "I don't know;" and when asked how many feet in a yard, he answered: "I don't know exactly; I never figured it out."

These answers were evidently given under the influence of mental confusion; they are not mentioned here to reflect upon him, but to illustrate the importance of leaving pure questions of fact to the elucidation of the jury, who have witnesses before them, see their demeanor, and hear them depose. It may be conceded that the evidence in volume was overwhelming in favor of appellants, but after all the jury constitutes the tribunal established by law for the ascertainment of fact in actions such as this; and while the court may feel that if we were weighing the testimony, in place of the jury, we would have reached a different conclusion from them, it is not for us to lightly set aside their verdict, based upon a determination of fact so peculiarly within their province to reach.

We readily admit that it is impossible for us to perceive how appellee, with his heel fastened in the frog, as he claims, could have had his foot mashed in the way it was, without the heel itself being crushed; but we can not undertake to say what happened in the few frantic seconds transpiring immediately before the injury; we must either accept appellee's theory or reach the conclusion that he deliberately placed his foot under the wheels of the engine to have it crushed off, for the purpose of bringing this action. This, we reject as incredible. He was not trying to board the engine, because Noonan testifies that he saw him in front of the engine before the accident. This precludes the idea that his injury was caused by a misstep in undertaking to board the engine; and with this theory out of the way, we are thrown back to the alternative of accepting his statements as true, or concluding that his injury was self-inflicted, for the purpose of gain. Appellant complains of the admission of evidence on the subject of whether or not the engines which were being backed along the highway had a headlight on the forward tender. Admitting this to be incompetent under the pleadings, an examination of the evidence shows that most of the questions were not objected to, and that the answers, which were made on cross-examination of appellant's witnesses, were not detrimental to their interest. It is also complained that the instructions of the court, so far as they present the contributory negligence of appellee, were too abstract in their nature. These instructions have been approved so often by this court as to almost become stereotyped, and we are unable to agree with counsel in their adverse criticism of them.

Judgment affirmed.

MUTUAL BENEFIT LIFE INS. CO. v. HARVEY, &c.

(Filed March 11, 1904.)

1. Insurance—Beneficiary—Where by the terms of a policy of insurance application for extended insurance must be made and policy surrendered in order to obtain a paid-up policy, such application and surrender of policy is a condition precedent to the issue of paid-up insurance.

2. Same—Infants—Where a policy of insurance containing a provision for its surrender when a paid-up policy should be issued was assigned to infants, such surrender, together with an application, being a condition precedent to the issue of a paid up policy, the fact that they were infants without a statutory guardian did not change the rule lapsing the policy, and they were not entitled to wait five years after attaining full age to make their election and sue for the amount due upon the policy.

W. L. Dulaney and W. O. Harris for appellant.

Geo. H. Galloway for appellees.

Appeal from Warren Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

On the 4th of November, 1887, the appellant, the Mutual Benefit Life Ins. Co., issued a policy of insurance on the life of Hiram H. Harvey for $3,000, payable at his death to his executors, administrators or assigns, in consideration of an annual premium of $107.82, which was to be due and payable on the 4th of November in every year during the continuance of the policy. On the 10th of October, 1888, Hiram Harvey assigned the benefit of this policy to his three daughters, Vashti, Roxianna and Rebecca Harvey, who were at that time infants of the respective ages of 18, 10 and 8 years. The insured paid or secured to the satisfaction of the company the first five annual premiums, but failed to pay the premium due November 24, 1892, and the policy lapsed in accordance with its terms at that date. Harvey died on the 2d of April, 1902. On the 6th of April, 1903, this suit was instituted by his children, to whom the policy was assigned on October 10, 1888, who alleged that "said policy lapsed because the premium was not paid on the 4th day of November, 1892; that at the time of said lapse there was fully paid-up insurance under said policy to the amount of $507, which became due and payable to them as assignees at the death of the insured on the 2d day of April, 1902, and for which they pray judgment."

The defendant filed a general demurrer to plaintiff's petition, which was overruled. It then answered, pleading the following stipulation of the policy by way of defense:

"Provided that in case the said premium shall not be paid on or before the several days hereinbefore mentioned for the payment thereof at the office of the company in the city of Newark, or to agents, when they produce receipts signed by the president or treasurer, then in every such case this policy shall cease and determine, subject to the provisions of the company's nonforfeiture system, as hereon endorsed with accompanying tables.

"NONFORFEITURE PROVISIONS.

"When two full premiums shall have been paid on this policy it shall cease or become void solely by the nonpayment of any premium when due, its net reserve by the American Experience Mortality and Interest at 4 per cent. yearly, less any indebtedness to the company on this policy, shall be applied by the company as a single premium at the company's rates published and in force at this date, either, first, to the purchase of nonparticipating term insurance for the full amount insured by this policy; or, second, upon the written application by the owner of this policy and the surrender thereof to the company at Newark within three months from such nonpayment of premium, to the purchase of a nonparticipating paid-up policy, payable at the time this policy would be payable if continued in force."

And allege that three months after the lapse of the policy for nonpayment of premium on the 4th of November, 1892, no written application having been made, accompanied by a surrender of the policy for paid-up insurance, the company in accordance with the provisions of the policy gave to appellee's nonparticipating term insurance for the full amount of the policy for three years and 134 days, this being the extended insurance which the net reserve due upon the policy at the time of its lapse, after deducting therefrom the premium loan indebtedness for $102.75, with accrued interest thereon, was sufficient to purchase. To this answer appellees replied, denying that they had elected to take extended term insurance for the full amount of the policy, and claimed that they were entitled to the amount due upon a paid-up policy which the net reserve would have purchased. The defendant demurred to the reply, which was overruled, and a jury trial resulted in a verdict and judgment for appellees for $295, of which the company now complains.

The case involves the interest of the assured in that portion of the premium of the policy, with interest thereon, which is required to be reserved or set aside as a fund for the payment of the policy when it becomes due, which the uncontradicted testimony of the "actuary" of the company shows was $152.68, after deducting the indebtedness of the assured to the company, on the 4th of November, 1892, the day of the lapse of the policy, which would purchase at the company's rates first term insurance for three years and one hundred and thirty-four days for $3,000; second, a paid-up policy payable at death for $295. It will be observed that the nonforfeiture provisions of the policy provide that the assured shall be entitled to the first named or term insurance for the full amount of the policy, unless he makes application and surrenders his policy, in which case he may take the second, or paid-up, policy, payable at his death. There is no contention or proof that the assured made application for or elected to take a paid-up policy of insurance for $295. There can be no question under the terms of the policy that such application and surrender by the beneficiaries of the policy is a condition precedent to the issual of paid-up insurance. Otherwise it became the duty of the company, without application or request, to set aside for the benefit of the assured extended insurance for the full amount of the policy. The only question, therefore, for consideration is the power of the company to contract for these alternate benefits in case of a lapse. This exact question was before this court in the recent case of Crutchfield v. Union Central Life Ins. Co., 28 Ky. Law Rep., 2800. It was there decided that the failure of the assured to surrender the policy, or demand a paid up policy, was an election on his part under the contract of insurance to take the term insurance provided by the contract. In Drury's Adm'x v. New York Life Ins. Co., 26 Ky. Law Rep., 68, the principle announced in the Crutchfield case was reaffirmed. In that case the company contended that the insured was only entitled to a life policy for paid-up insurance, instead of extended insurance.

It is insisted for the appellees, however, that as they were infants without statutory guardian when the policy lapsed they were not bound by these conditions of the policy, and are entitled to five years after attaining full age to make their election, and sue for the amount due upon a paid-up policy. No authorities are cited to support their contention. While, on the other hand, it was decided in O'Loughlin v. Union Central Life Ins. Co., 11 Fed. Rep., 280, Judge McCreary delivering the opinion, that the fact that the beneficiaries named in the policy were minors would not prevent the enforcement of conditions of this character. In discussing this question the court said: "It is said that because the beneficiaries are minors that, therefore, the condition can not be enforced. I have been unable to find any authority to support this proposition, and it seems counsel instanced none. The guardian can bring the suit, and is bound to bring it under and according to the contract. It is not a suit that can not be brought. It is not a suit that the parties by reason of their disability can not bring. But it is a suit which the guardian can bring, and is bound to bring, I think, in accordance with the terms of the contract."

In Suggs v. Ins. Co., 71 Texas, 579, the policy contained the following clause: "No suit or proceeding in law or equity shall be brought to recover any sum hereby insured unless the same is commenced within one year from the time the right of action accrued."

The contention was there made that this clause did not apply to minors who were beneficiaries. The court decided that the exception in the statute did not affect the agreement.

The contract of the insurance company was with Hiram H. Harvey. By the express terms of the contract he had the right at any time during the continuance of the policy to change the beneficiaries. The mere fact that he transferred the benefit from his estate to his three daughters could not change the express stipulations of the contract of insurance between them. His assigns were equally bound thereby. It is not contended that the assignees subsequent to the assignment paid the premium installments, or any new contract was made with them by the company, and it can not be doubted for a moment that if the assured had died within the period of extended insurance that appellees would have been prompt to have asserted their right under the terms of the contract to the full amount of the policy. We have reached the conclusion that the trial court erred in overruling the demurrer to the petition, and also in failing to give the jury a peremptory instruction to find for the defendant upon final trial.

For reasons indicated the judgment is reversed and cause remanded for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

CHESAPEAKE & OHIO RY. CO. v. SEE'S ADM'R.

(Filed March 11, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Railroads—It is a well-settled rule in this State that those in charge of a train owe no duty to a trespasser, except when his presence is discovered on the track to use reasonable care to avoid injuring him.

2. Same—Damages—Where one while walking along the track of a railroad was run over and killed by a train, the evidence conducing to show that the fireman and engineer were in their proper places; that the deceased was walking on the track in the same direction in which the train was going; that the accident did not happen in any incorporated town or city, nor any village, where there were streets or crossings, and the presence of the decedent not being discovered on the track in time to prevent the accident, a verdict and judgment against the company was erroneous.

3. Same—The fact that a railroad company may have acquiesced in the use of its track by pedestrians does not amount to a permission or license to so use it.

E. L. Worthington and W. H. Wadsworth for appellant.

James Andrew Scott, R. S. Dinkle and W. C. Marshall for appellee.

Appeal from Boyd Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

Between 5 and 6 o'clock, p. m., November 26, 1900, James G. See, while walking along the track of appellant about 400 feet east of Norman, a station between Ashland and Catlettsburg, was struck by one of appellant's "shuttle trains," and killed. This action was instituted to recover damages for the loss of his life. The alleged negligence consisted in the failure of appellant to give signals, by sounding the bell or blowing the whistle, of the train's approach; in not having a headlight on the front of the train, and in failing to have some one in a position to see and warn persons who might be on the track of the train's approach. The shuttle train consisted of a tender, engine and two cars. It was going east from Ashland at the rate of twenty-five or thirty miles an hour. The engine was backing, so the tender was in front of the engine. The uncontradicted evidence shows that the cars were lighted, and that the fireman and engineer were in their proper places. The evidence conduces to show that the decedent was walking along the track in the same direction in which the train was going, and while so doing was struck by the train.

It appears that in 1874 Williams, as owner of the land, had made and put upon record a plat of a town designated as "East Ashland." It covered a distance from Keyes creek, about 1,000 feet, to a point east of there. Winchester avenue was shown to run about 1,000 feet eastwardly. Bell street was the first street east of Keyes creek intersecting Winchester avenue. Next was Ann street, and the next was Elizabeth street. There were other streets laid out running parallel with Winchester avenue, but they were never opened as streets, neither was Bell nor Elizabeth streets. Ann street seems to be used for crossing appellant's road at its station called "Normal." The town was never incorporated. A line drawn from the south side of the land plotted to the bank of the Ohio river is about one-third of a mile in length. Vansant's sawmill is situated on or near Keyes creek, but it does not appear whether or not it is on the land plotted. About a quarter of a mile east of the east line of the land plotted is a mill. Situated within the plotted territory is a planing mill, working ten to twenty men. One witness testifies that there are fifty houses situated between the hills on the south, the Ohio river on the north, Keyes creek on the west and the mill referred to, as being situated east of the plotted territory, and that there are four or five hundred people living within boundary just given, but the witness fails to state how many houses are within the plotted territory. One witness testifies that there are five houses fronting toward the railroad on the south side of it between Normal and the place where the accident happened and two back of them. There seems to have been no houses on the north side of the railroad, between "Normal" and the place where See was killed, because the evidence shows that the lots or territory fronting the railroad had a road or drive way over it which was considerably used. Immediately south of the railroad was a street car line, and immediately south of that was the turnpike road, both of which were between the houses situated on the south side and the railroad. The appellant had two tracks along the so-called Winchester avenue, one of which seems to have been elevated two feet above the surface of the ground. There was no travel over the so-called Winchester avenue, except persons who walked on the track or along the side of it. There was no road crossing within the plotted territory except at Normal, though east of that point there was a path over which persons walked. Williams' property seems to have passed into the hands of others, and the land covered by the so-called Winchester avenue was condemned for the right of way for the railroad, and it had been so using it for about twenty years before the accident happened. The west line of the plotted territory was a mile and a quarter east of Ashland and the east line was three-quarters of a mile west of Cattlettsburg. Quite a good many people walked over the track through the plot of ground described. The court has endeavored to give the local situation at the time of the accident as shown by the record. East Ashland was never incorporated. The plan to lay out a city was ineffectual. There was no one representing the public to accept the proposed dedication. The public never evinced any purpose to accept it; so far as the record shows it was never used by the public as a street. On the contrary, the only inference to be drawn from the testimony is that Williams, his successors in ownership, and the public acquiesced in the appropriation of the strip of land by the railroad company. It necessarily follows that the appellant was a trespasser upon the right of way at the place of the accident. The well-settled rule in this State is that those in charge of a train owe no duty to a trespasser, except when his presence is discovered upon the track, to use reasonable care to avoid injuring him. This rule has been so repeatedly enunciated by this court that it would be labor lost to cite cases in its support. There is no duty resting upon those in charge of a train to sound whistles or ring bells or to carry headlights to give warning to trespassers. They did not have to anticipate their presence upon the track. The fact that the railroad company may have acquiesced in the use of its track by pedestrians does not amount to a permission or license to so use it. (Brown v. Louisville & Nashville R. R. Co., 97 Ky., 228; Dials v. C. & O. Ry. Co., 25 Ky. Law Rep., 1349; C. & O. Ry. Co. v. Perkins, 20 Ky. Law Rep., 608.) The rule we have announced is recognized by counsel for appellee, but it is contended that it does not apply to this case because of the place where the accident happened. It is contended that the rule which applies to the movement of trains in cities and towns should apply to this case. The well-settled rule of this court requires that the agents and employes of a railroad company in operating trains through the streets of a city or town shall keep a lookout along the line of railway where people are likely to be found upon the right of way. In cities and towns there are streets and street crossings. Frequently the railroad tracks are along a street, some places so constructed that vehicles may be driven over them at any point; at others vehicles are required to cross the tracks at street intersections. So in towns and cities the travelling public use the streets in common with the railroad company. In addition to that persons may be expected at any time to be walking on the space in the street occupied by the railroad company with its track. Due regard for human life requires that those operating trains in cities and towns should keep a lookout for persons on the track with the purpose of avoiding injuring them, as well as to protect the property and lives in their keeping. In the case at bar the railroad tracks were not on a street; they were not on a strip of land upon which the public had the right to travel; there was no roadway on it for the use of public travel. There were no streets intersecting; it no road crossings over it, except at the station called "Normal," and the approach to it seems to be a road over the strip of land designated as Ann street on the plot. There was neither a roadway nor street used at the point where the accident happened. The duty to sound bells and whistles to give warning to those who were upon the track did not exist, because no one could rightfully be on the track at the place of the accident. If the law imposed the duty upon those in charge of the train to have sounded the bell and whistled before approaching "Normal," it did so for the protection of those who might be, and had the right to be, at that crossing, not for the protection of a trespasser on the track east of there. In the case of Cahill v. Cincinnati, &c., Railway Co., 92 Ky., 345, the court held there was a breach of duty in failing to whistle at a public crossing, because Cahill, who had the right to the use of a private crossing, also had the right to rely upon the railroad company's performance of its duty in whistling at the public crossing. It was thus guilty of a breach of duty to the public and to Cahill, the latter because of his right to the use of the private crossing. The Conley case, 89 Ky., 402; the Shelby case, 85 Ky., 224, and the Keelin case, 22 Ky. Law Rep., 1943, are cited to support the recovery in the case. In the Shelby case the court found the party killed by the railroad was not a trespasser; that he had the right to be where the accident happened, and that the railroad company owed him a duty, and that his death resulted from a breach of its duty. The facts of the Conley case are very dissimilar to the case at bar, and this court does not understand that the case does or was intended to change the rule which we adhere to and apply in this case. Neither is the Keelin case a departure therefrom. The accident under consideration in that case happened in a city, with a population of more than three thousand, with streets and street crossings over the railroad tracks. We are asked to apply to this case the doctrine which imposes a duty on those operating railroad trains through cities and towns to keep a lookout and sound bells and whistles to notify persons of the approach of the train. The accident did not happen in an incorporated town or city; it did not occur in a village or community where there were streets or street crossings; not on the right of way of a railroad where the public was licensed to use it, or where the public could use it as a street or roadway, because there were two tracks on it, one elevated about two feet above the surface of the earth. We decline to extend the doctrine so as to apply it to this case. The only duty which appellant's servants owed the intestate was to use reasonable care to avoid injuring him after discovering his peril, and the record fails to show there was such breach of duty. The well-settled rule which applies to trespassers is applicable to this case.

The judgment is reversed for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

CONN v. CITY OF LOUISVILLE.

(Filed March 11, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Street Improvements—Damages—In an action by appellant against appellee, alleging that his lot was damaged by the raising by appellee of a street in front of it, and defense was made that the property was enhanced by the street construction, a verdict for appellee will not be disturbed, the record presenting only a question of fact, which was the province of the jury to determine.

Edwards & Ogden for appellant.

N. R. Peckinpaugh for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Common Pleas Branch, First Division.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

The appellant, Walter Conn., was the owner of a lot fronting on Everitt avenue 80 feet and 180 feet deep, on which there was a four-room frame dwelling. The lot was on a hillside and the front of his premises was on a level with the street, which was a dirt road. In 1900 the appellee, the city of Louisville, graded and paved Everitt avenue with vitrified brick, and in so doing the street in front of appellant's house was raised from two to three feet above the surface of his lot. He was compelled to fill in the lot and raise the dwelling house to a level with the new grade of the street. He thereupon brought this suit against the city, fixing his damages at $600. The answer of the city is a traverse of plaintiff's right to recover. A jury trial resulted in a verdict and judgment in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

The only ground relied on for reversal is that the verdict in favor of the defendant is not sustained by the evidence, and is contrary to law. The plaintiffs introduced four witnesses, whose testimony conduces to show that the plaintiff's property had been diminished in value about $600 by the raising of the grade of the street. While defendant introduced four witnesses, who testified that the market value of appellant's property immediately after the construction of the street was enhanced from $100 to $400 in value, in consequence of the work done by the city in grading and macadamizing the street. There is nothing in either the pleadings or testimony to show whether the cost of improving Everitt avenue was paid by the city or by the abutting property holders, or what expense, if any, appellant was subjected to on this account. Only one instruction was given to the jury, and this one was not excepted to, and is not complained of upon this appeal. The record, therefore, presents only a question of fact, which it was the province of the jury to determine, and in view of the sharp conflict in the testimony on this issue we do not feel warranted in reversing the judgment.

Judgment affirmed.

CLARKE, &c. v. GARRISON, &c.

(Filed March 11, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Attorneys—Fees—In this action for the recovery of an attorney's fee where the services rendered were for executors in the suit to settle an estate, no proof being taken in the case and it going off on the pleadings and commissioner's report, the action of the chancellor in allowing a fee of $150 will not be disturbed, he being on the ground and knowing the scale of fees usual in his court and knowing better what took place than this court can determine from the record, will not be disturbed.

J. B. Clarke for appellants.

S. Holmes for appellees.

Appeal from Bracken Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

William Garrison died a resident of Bracken county in the year 1894, leaving a will by which he devised his estate to his wife for life, with the remainder to his children. At the time of the making of the will he owned a tract of land, but before his death he sold the land to his son, George, for something over $3,000, and took his notes therefor. These notes constituted substantially his only estate at his death. After his death the widow bought from a Mrs. Roberts a piece of land near by and moved upon it, executing to Mrs. Roberts her notes for the price. When her notes fell due she had no means of paying them except her interest in her husband's estate; her two sons, George and Sam, had qualified as executors, and George wanted time on his notes which he had executed to his father, so the three assigned these notes to Mrs. Roberts as collateral security to the notes she held on Mrs. Garrison, and Mrs. Roberts agreed to wait on her debt. At the end of the time agreed upon Mrs. Roberts filed suit against Mrs. Garrison on her notes and to foreclose her vendor's lien on the land she had sold her. She also brought suit against George Garrison on his notes which had been assigned to her. In this condition of things the executors employed J. B. Clarke as their attorney. There were debts of William Garrison unpaid amounting to $600 or $700. Mrs. Roberts had sold Mrs. Garrison her land for much more than it was then worth. Clarke filed an answer in the suit against Mrs. Garrison, seeking to have the sale of the land by Mrs. Roberts to her rescinded. The court sustained a demurrer to his answer and gave judgment in favor of the plaintiff. Clarke also filed an answer for George Garrison in the suit against him on his notes, but the court also sustained a demurrer to this and gave judgment for the sale of the land. Appeals were granted from these judgments, but were not taken. Before a sale was made Clarke filed a suit to settle up the estate of William Garrison, making Mrs. Roberts a defendant, charging that the George Garrison notes were the assets of the estate; that the debts were unpaid; that Mrs. Garrison had only a life estate in the notes, and that Mrs. Roberts took no interest in the fund by reason of the assignment to her. He obtained an injunction restraining Mrs. Roberts from the further prosecution of her claim, except in that action. He also had an appraisal made of the estate. Some of the creditors had obtained judgments against the executors and sought to recover on their bond. This alarmed the sureties, who had them removed on failure to give a new bond, and an administrator with the will annexed was appointed, who took charge of the proceedings Clarke had instituted, continuing Clarke as his attorney. Two small suits were filed against the executors which Clarke had dismissed for want of demand and verification. The estate was settled up, the debts amounting to about $700. The land was sold and brought $2,100, which left about $1,300 after paying the court cost to be divided among the heirs. Clarke then moved the court to allow him a fee as attorney for the executors of $600. The court allowed him $150, and from this judgment he appeals.

In his suit to settle the estate of William Garrison, Clarke, who drew the petition, inserted an allegation that Laura Garrison, the wife of George Garrison, held a lien on the land for $1,000, which was inferior to the creditors of William Garrison. When the case was referred to the commissioner to report the debts of the estate he presented to the commissioner a claim of Laura Garrison for $500 against the estate. The other heirs contested the validity of these claims of Laura Garrison and employed attorneys to resist them and look after their interests in the estate. The commissioner rejected Laura Garrison's $500 claim, and an agreement was made between Clarke and the attorneys who had been employed by the heirs by which both these claims were abandoned. These attorneys afterwards co-operated with Clarke in the conduct of the suit. During its pendency Clarke compromised with Mrs. Roberts by getting her representative to take back the land sold Mrs. Garrison by George Garrison paying him a certain amount of money; and Mrs. Garrison moved back from the Roberts' place to her old home, with her daughter Martha, who lived with her.

While at first blush the allowance made by the circuit court seems small for the services rendered by Clarke, in view of all the facts in the record we conclude that we ought not to disturb the chancellor's judgment. He is on the ground; he knows the scale of fees usual in the court, and also knows better than we can tell from the record much that took place in court. The services which Clarke rendered in the suits brought by Mrs. Roberts, or in the compromise of those suits which he subsequently made, were chargeable to his clients in those cases, Mrs. Garrison and George W. Garrison. The executors were not parties to those suits, and the estate of the decedent in their hands is not liable to Clarke therefor. The only services for which Clarke should be allowed are his services for the executors in the suit to settle the estate and in some other small matters incidental thereto. No proof was taken in this case; it went off on the pleadings and the commissioner's report, which was short. Some of the children employed other attorneys to look after the case who assisted in its management. Part of the services of Clarke in the action were apparently rendered for George Garrison and his wife, Laura, and when the land was sold, as well as when the commissioner was making up his report, it would appear from the proof that Clarke was looking after the interests of Laura Garrison as well as the estate of the decedent, and that part of his services ought to be paid for by her or by her husband, George Garrison. In determining what is a reasonable attorney's fee the court must take into consideration not only the amount of the estate, the character of the services rendered, and the amount of work done, but also in a case like this the fact that part of the services are not chargeable to the estate. On the whole case we can not say the chancellor erred in fixing the fee at $150, giving to his finding that weight which ought to be given to it in cases of this sort.

Judgment affirmed.

DUNEKAKE v. BEYER, BY, &c.

(Filed March 11, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Pleading—Where a pleading was vague and indefinite, but no motion being made to make it more specific, and no demurrer interposed, it was cured by verdict.

2. Damages—Where an employe was ordered by the master to assist another employe in packing glass, and in making boxes pursuant to directions he was cut by a circular saw, sustaining serious injuries, a verdict in his favor will not be disturbed, the record showing a state of fact sufficient to support it.

Joyes & Jarvis for appellant.

Leiber & Lincoln for appellees.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Common Pleas Branch, Second Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

The appellant, at the time of the occurrence from which this litigation arose, was engaged in the business of manufacturing mirrors and beveled glass in Louisville, Ky. Appellee was in his employment, his duty being to grind the glass on an iron wheel, being what is technically called a "rougher." He claims that on the day he was hurt he had been ordered by the appellant, his employer, to assist Isaac Foust, whose business it was to pack the glass and mirrors for shipment, and to do whatever Foust told him. In order to properly ship mirrors and glass it was necessary to make rough boxes, into which they were placed to prevent breakage. Appellee states that he was ordered by Foust to saw some light lumber in order to make a box for the shipment of a mirror he was about to pack; that in pursuance of this order he undertook to use a circular saw, which was there for that purpose, and that in doing so his hand was caught by the saw, and two of his fingers cut off, to recover damages for which he instituted this action, alleging that his misfortune was caused by the gross negligence of appellant, his employes and servants.

The answer placed in issue the material allegations of the petition, and pleaded the contributory negligence of appellee. A trial resulted in a verdict for appellee for the sum of $1,000, of which appellant now complains.

Two grounds are relied upon for reversal: First, that the petition does not state a cause of action; and, second, the admission of incompetent testimony.

The petition is exceedingly vague and indefinite, and would certainly have been held to be bad on demurrer, but no motion was made to require the plaintiff to make it more specific, nor was a demurrer interposed, and we are of opinion that the defects were cured by the verdict. Newman, in his work on Pleading and Practice, page 739, says: "The verdict will not only aid a defective allegation, but it extends sometimes even to cure an omission altogether to make a necessary allegation. Where there are defects or imperfections in the pleading, yet the issue joined is such as necessarily required on the trial the proof of the facts defectively or imperfectly stated, or even omitted, and without which it is not reasonable to presume that a jury would have given a verdict for the party, such deficiency is cured by the verdict. (Vaughn's Ex'or v. Gardner, 7 B. Mon., 327.)"

The recent case of Hill v. Ragland, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 1053, contains a thorough discussion of this question, reviews all the authorities, and makes it unnecessary to further extend the opinion on this point.

In the case at bar the court submitted to the jury in the instructions the issues as if the allegations which were omitted had been in the petition. The case of Bogenschutz v. Smith, 84 Ky., 330, is not inconsistent with the view here expressed. In that case the court did not in its instructions submit the question to the jury in such manner as to necessarily involve their passing upon the facts omitted in the pleading, and, by reason of this failure of the court to so frame the instructions, it was held that the defective pleading was not cured by the verdict. Appellant also complains that the court erred in admitting the evidence of two witnesses, Frank Riehm and John Kavanaugh, as to the condition of the saw from four to six months prior to the time of the accident. In addition to this testimony there was evidence in the case to show that the condition of the saw remained the same from the time of which those two witnesses testified until the accident. The evidence that the condition of the saw remained unchanged during the interim made the evidence of Riehm and Kavanaugh competent. There is no complaint of the instructions, and we think they properly presented the issues to the jury.

Perceiving no error in the record the judgment is affirmed.

CITY OF LOUISVILLE v. KEHER.

(Filed March 11, 1904.)

1. Damages—Obstruction of streets—Where appellee in passing along a street of appellant on a bicycle, at night, it being in a dark place, struck a large stone that extended out beyond the middle of the street and was thrown on some rocks, such obstructions having been placed there by workmen engaged in building a structure, and so injured as to lose an eye and sustain other serious injuries, a judgment for $7,500 against the city will be upheld, the obstructions being beyond the point in the street where the city was authorized to permit them to extend, and the place not being guarded or indicated by lights at the time of the accident.

2. Instructions—In civil cases the circuit court is not required to give the whole law of the case to the jury in his instructions, it being incumbent upon the litigants to ask such instructions as they deem proper.

3. Same—Where an obstruction had existed in a city for weeks with the knowledge of the officers of the city, it was not prejudiced by the failure of the court to submit the question as to whether or not it had notice of such obstruction.

Henry L. Stone for appellant.

Kohn, Baird & Spindle, O'Neal & O'Neal and R. L. Greene for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Common Pleas Branch, First Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

Between 9 and 10 o'clock on the night of July 11, 1899, appellee Keher was riding on a tandem bicycle with a young lady (the lady being in front) along Jackson street, near Green, in Louisville, Ky. They were riding a little to the east of the middle of the street; the place was dark from the shade trees obstructing the electric light. The front wheel of the bicycle struck a rock, eight by fourteen by twenty inches; the wheel was crushed, and both riders were thrown down. The stone was at the edge of a mortar bed; the young lady was thrown over in the mortar bed, and the appellee, who was on the rear seat, was thrown into a pile of rock, fracturing the arch over his right eye, severely cutting the scalp, and injuring his ear drum. By reason of an internal hemorrhage the optic nerve of the right eye was destroyed; his ear inflamed and gave him great pain. The right arm was also affected; but gradually this got right, and the hearing in the ear was not permanently impaired; but the right eye is entirely blind. The left eye also became inflamed and is much impaired, although this appears from the evidence to be due to another cause. The plaintiff was studying medicine, but as his sight got so that he could not read, he had to give that up. His sufferings from the injury to his ear and the atrophy of the optic nerve were very great. He filed this suit against the city and others to recover for his injuries. The jury found a verdict against the city for $7,500, on which the court entered judgment, and the city appeals.

On February 23, 1899, the city issued a permit to St. Boniface Church to build a one-story brick and stone church on Green street near Jackson, and on May 12, 1899, it issued a permit for the building of a three-story brick monastery on the northeast corner of Jackson and Green. By an ordinance of the city regulating the use of public ways it is provided in substance that for the purpose of erecting houses or other improvements adjacent to any street the person making the erection may use not more "than one-third of the width of the said street fronting said improvement for material for making and conducting said improvements," all such obstructions to "be safely guarded in such manner and with sufficient necessary red lights at night as to protect all those travelling or passing upon such street." (Compilation of ordinances, 1901, 830-821.) In erecting the buildings referred to the contractors had placed in Jackson street a pile of bricks and rocks, also a mortar bed which extended out nearly to the center of the street, and had placed around the mortar bed foundation stones of the dimensions above given to protect it from wagons passing along the street. The proof for the plaintiff by a number of witnesses was that there were no lights of any sort on the obstruction or about it; that it had existed in the street for several weeks, with the knowledge of the officers of the city, and that for two or three nights at least before the plaintiff was hurt it was lighted in no way. It was a public and much used street of the city, paved with granite; the plaintiff was ignorant of the obstruction and unable to see it from the want of light. He was riding along about four or five miles an hour when his wheel struck the stone. The proof for the city tended to show that the boys in the neighborhood had given trouble about the lanterns; that a few nights before one of its officers had gotten a lantern and put it on the obstruction, and that on the night in question the lights were in position and burning. On the question of light, however, the great weight of the evidence was with the plaintiff. As to who placed the obstruction in the street and left it unlighted the evidence is very unsatisfactory. There were separate contractors for the stone work, the brick work, the plastering and the putting in of the furnace and engine. Each of these denied that the mortar bed was his, or each tried to put the blame on somebody else. The contractor for the furnace and engine was not sued. The action was dismissed as to the contractors for the stone work and the plastering. The jury found in favor of Hoertz, the contractor for the brick work. This threw the entire liability on the city. The court, of its own motion, instructed the jury as follows:

"1st. The court instructs the jury that it is the duty of the defendant, the city of Louisville, to keep the streets and highways in a reasonably safe condition for use by the public, and if it is necessary that a part of the street be used as a place of deposit for material for the erection of a building adjacent to the said street, it is the duty of the person using the street as a place of deposit for such material to protect persons using the said street at night from injury, by giving notice or warning of the obstruction to the street by placing sufficient lights upon or near the said material to give timely warning to other persons using the said street; and it is the duty of the defendant, the city of Louisville, to exercise ordinary care in causing the said warning to be given by persons to whom it may have given a license to use a portion of a public street as a place of deposit for such material. And if the jury shall believe from the evidence that the defendant, Fred Hoertz, placed the material in Jackson street with which the plaintiff came in contact and which caused his injury, and the presence of said material in the street was not indicated by sufficient lights to give reasonable and timely warning to persons using the street as the plaintiff was then using it, and by reason thereof he was caused the injuries of which he complains, and he did not, by negligence upon his part, help to cause or bring about his injury, but for which contributory negligence, if any there was, he would not have been injured, then the law is for the plaintiff as against the defendant, Hoertz, and they should so find.

"2d. If the jury find that the defendant, Hoertz, or his employees, placed the said obstruction in the street and failed to give warning of its presence as mentioned in instruction No. 1, and they find for the plaintiff; and they shall believe from the evidence that the defendant, the city of Louisville, did not exercise ordinary care to have the said notice or warning given of the obstruction to the said street, then the law is for the plaintiff against the city as well as against the said Hoertz.

"3d. But unless the defendant, Hoertz, or some of his agents or employees, placed the said obstruction in the street and failed to give notice of its presence as mentioned in instruction No. 1, the law is for the defendant, Hoertz, and the jury should so find. Or if the plaintiff was negligent, and thereby helped to cause or bring about his injuries, and he would not have been injured but for his contributory negligence, if any there was, the law is for the defendants.

"4th. If the jury shall find from the evidence that the defendant, Hoertz, did not place the obstruction in the street, but they shall believe from the evidence that it was placed there by some other person, and the defendant, the city, did not use ordinary care to give notice of the said obstruction as mentioned in instruction No. 1, the law is for the plaintiff as against the city, and they should so find."

Over the objection of the city, the court gave the two following instructions asked by the plaintiff:

"5th. If the jury find their verdict for the plaintiff they shall award him against both of the defendants, or against the city of Louisville alone, such a sum of money as they believe from the evidence will fairly and reasonably compensate the plaintiff for the pain and suffering, mental and physical, sustained by him, directly resulting from the injuries complained of, and also for the permanent impairment of his power to earn money in the loss of his right eye, not exceeding the sum of $10,000, the amount claimed in the petition. If they find a verdict for the defendants they shall say so, and no more.

"6th. By negligence is meant in these instructions the failure to observe ordinary care.

"By ordinary care is meant a failure to observe such care and prudence as persons of ordinary care usually exercise under the same or similar circumstances.

"By contributory negligence is meant the failure on the part of the plaintiff to use ordinary care for his own safety, and by reason of which he helped to cause or bring about the injuries complained of, and but for such contributory negligence, if any there was, he would not have been injured.

"But the plaintiff could not be guilty of contributory negligence at the time and place complained of unless by the exercise of ordinary care on his part he could have seen the obstructions or materials in connection with which he was injured, before striking the same, in time to have avoided the injuries complained of. Unless the plaintiff knew the obstructions were in the street, or unless they were marked by some light as hereinbefore defined, the plaintiff in traveling the street was compelled to use only such care as persons of ordinary care would use, presuming the street to be safe under the same or similar circumstances."

It is insisted for the city that the two first instructions taken together make the right of the appellee to recover a verdict against the city turn solely on the fact that the city did not exercise ordinary care to have warning given of the obstruction of the street, and that the jury should have been told that the city was liable only if the city knew of the obstruction, or by ordinary care should have known of it, and also knew that at the time and place of the accident the obstruction was not sufficiently lighted, or by the exercise of ordinary care should have known this. It is also complained that the court did not submit to the jury the question whether the city, at the time and place of the accident, kept its street in a reasonably safe condition for persons riding thereon with ordinary care for their own safety. In support of the instructions of the court we are referred to the cases of District of Columbia v. Woodbury, 136 U. S., 450; Boucher v. City New Haven, 40 Conn., 456; Sutton v. Snohomish, 11 Wash., 28; Anderson v. City of Wilmington, 19 Atl., 509; Stevens v. City of Macon, 83 Mo., 345; McAllister v. City of Albany, 18 Ore., 426, all of which are much alike and hold that where a city authorizes an excavation to be made in one of its streets and a traveler on the street is injured by the negligence of the person making the excavation in not sufficiently covering the hole, or not giving sufficient warning of the danger, the city is liable to the person injured by reason of the act which it has licensed without notice to it of the dangerous condition of the excavation. The rule on which these opinions rests is that the city having exclusive control over its streets, and being charged with the duty of maintaining them, must keep its streets in a reasonably safe condition for public travel, and for a failure to do this is primarily liable, although the defect in the highway may be due to the act of some contractor or third person done by authority of the city. (Glasgow v. Gillenwaters, 28 Ky. Law Rep., 2875; 2 Smith on Municipal Corporations, sections 1289-90; 2 Dillon on Municipal Corporations, section 1027, 4th edition.)

The city asked no instructions on the trial. The permit for the erection of the building was, under the ordinance, permission for the contractors to use one-third of the width of the street fronting the improvement for material for making and conducting the improvement, and while the ordinance required the contractor or person so using the street to guard the obstruction in such manner and with such light at night as to protect all those traveling upon the street, the primary duty of the city to the public to keep its streets reasonably safe rested on it. But the obstruction in the case before us extended out nearly to the middle of the street, and the plaintiff was injured, according to the uncontradicted testimony, thirteen or fourteen feet from the curb, which placed him beyond the point to which the obstruction should have extended under the ordinance. Yet the obstruction had thus existed in the street, according to the uncontradicted testimony, with the knowledge of the officers of the city, for several weeks, and under the evidence the city was at least not prejudiced by the failure of the court to submit to the jury the question whether the city had notice of the obstruction. It was a much traveled highway paved with granite, and for the city to permit such an obvious obstruction to remain for the length of time shown by the evidence in such a street, when its officers, whose duty it was to report on such matters, knew all about it, can not but evidence acquiescence on the part of the city in this use of the highway by the contractors. (2 Smith on Municipal Corporations, sections 1298-1300.) Instructions 1 and 2 aptly informed the jury that Hoertz was liable if he placed the obstruction in the street, and failed to indicate it by sufficient light to give reasonable warning to persons using the street. By them the jury were also properly told that it was the duty of the city to keep its streets in a reasonably safe condition for use by the public, and that it was its duty to exercise ordinary care in causing warning to be given by persons licensed by it to use a portion of the public street as a place of deposit for building material, and that it was liable as well as Hoertz if it failed to exercise such care. The jury were properly told that Hoertz was not liable unless he or his agents placed the obstruction in the street, and that if it was placed there by some other person, and the city did not use ordinary care to give notice of it, the city alone was liable. While the form of instruction 5, if taken alone, would be objectionable, the meaning, when it is read in connection with 3 and 4, is perfectly plain. The instruction begins with the words "If the jury find their verdict for the plaintiff." Hoertz and the city were the only defendants to the action at the time the instruction was given. If the jury did not find against Hoertz they could not find for the plaintiff unless they found against the city. The instruction was not, therefore, an intimation from the court that the jury should find against the city. It only gave the measure of damages in case "the jury find their verdict for the plaintiff." The obstruction of the street, as the uncontradicted testimony showed it to be, manifestly made the street not reasonably safe for the traveling public, and no good could have come to the city from the giving of an instruction on this point which neither party asked on the trial. The rule is that only errors prejudicial to the substantial rights of the party complaining are grounds for reversal. In civil cases the circuit court is not required to give the whole law of the case to the jury in his instructions, but it is incumbent on the litigants to ask such instructions as they deem proper. No good would come from giving to the jury instructions on every conceivable question not desired by either party on the trial because deemed of no value before the jury under the evidence. The court after laying down in instruction No. 1 correctly the rule that it was the duty of the city to keep its streets reasonably safe for use by the public, undertook in No. 4 to bring the mind of the jury directly to the question of fact whether ordinary care had been exercised by the city to give notice of the obstruction, all the evidence introduced by it on the trial being on this question, and there being no conflict of evidence as to the nature of the obstruction. The instruction could not have been prejudicial unless, as maintained for appellant, the city was not liable without notice to it that the obstruction was not lighted. To so hold would be to relieve the city entirely of its primary duty to keep its streets in a reasonably safe condition. It had authorized or acquiesced in the obstruction of the street, and, therefore, had notice of the obstruction. Knowing the obstruction, it was bound to exercise ordinary care for the protection of the traveling public in giving warning of the danger. It was not liable if, notwithstanding this, an accident happened; but the instructions of the court only required of it ordinary care in this regard. In District of Columbia v. Woodbury, above cited on this point, it is said: "If a permit is granted, as is usually the case, the fact is notice to the authorities that the work is in progress, and then they are charged with the duty of seeing that it is properly conducted." To the same effect are the other cases referred to; also 2 Dillon on Municipal Corporations, section 1027; Deering on Negligence, section 163; 1 Shearman and Redfield on Negligence, section 367, note 6, 5th edition.

Instruction 6 properly defined contributory negligence, for as the plaintiff did not know of the obstruction of the street, unless he might by ordinary care have discovered it in time to have avoided injury, he might recover; and he had a right, in the absence of anything indicating the contrary, to assume that the street was safe, or reasonably so. (Glasgow v. Gillenwaters, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 2875; Pettingill v. Yonkers, 116 N. Y., 564.)

One of the grounds assigned for new trial is that the city attorney who was familiar with the facts was not present at the trial. But there was no motion by the city to continue the case on account of the absence of the city attorney, and in the absence of such a motion it can not complain that the circuit court proceeded with the trial. A litigant can not go on with a trial without objection in the absence of its leading counsel, and then, when defeated, ask a new trial because he was not present. (Besides, we know judicially there are six divisions of the circuit court in Jefferson county, and it is impracticable for one man to be present in all the trials in all of these divisions, to say nothing of the cases in this court or the United States courts.)

While the verdict is large, we can not say, under the evidence, it is so large as to indicate passion or prejudice. The plaintiff is a young man at the opening of life; his right eye is entirely destroyed, his left is so affected he can not read with it, he suffered for months most intensely, and his intended career in life is destroyed. The city did not seek by any pleading to recover against the negligent contractor. The authorities seem to be that in such cases the person using the street under the permit is liable to the city for any damages the city may sustain by reason of his neglect or failure to comply with the terms of the ordinance. (2 Dillon on Municipal Corporations, sections 1034-1035; 2 Smith on Municipal Corporations, section 1805.) But as the city asserted no claim against the contractors, this question is not here presented.

On the whole case we perceive no substantial error to the prejudice of appellant, wherefore, the judgment complained of is affirmed.

Whole court sitting.

LEONARD v. HOLLAND.

(Filed March 15, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Sale of timber—Injunction—Where appellant entered into a contract for the sale of timber, providing that "all timber that can be made into railroad cross ties, consisting of white oak, post oak and chestnut oak, no limit in size of post oak and chestnut oak, that will measure in diameter of not over twelve inches and down to the smallest that can be worked into ties," in an action by him against appellee to enjoin him from the further cutting of timber and for damages for the violation of the contract, it is apparent that the words "no limit in size of post oak and chestnut oak" are parenthetical, and that only white oak trees not over twelve inches in diameter were sold, and where appellee was cutting oak trees in excess of twelve inches in diameter he was violating his contract and the court erred in not perpetuating the injunction, with costs.

P. H. Darby for appellant.

Mulloy & Utley for appellee.

Appeal from Lyon Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

Appellant Leonard filed this suit on March 9 1899, alleging in his petition that he was the owner of a tract of land in Lyon county containing 1,853 acres; that on September 12, 1898, he entered into a contract with the appellee, Holland, as follows: "This contract and agreement made and entered into this 12th day of September, 1898, by and between S. N. Leonard, of the county of Lyon and State of Kentucky, of the first part, and W. W. Holland, of the same county and State, of the second part, witnesseth: The party of the first part has bargained and sold to the party of the second part all timber that can be made into railroad cross ties, consisting of white oak, post oak, and chestnut oak, no limit in size of post oak and chestnut oak, that will measure in diameter not over twelve inches and down to the smallest that can be worked into ties, that is now growing on what is known as the McPhail land lying on Cumberland river, in Lyon county, Kentucky, and aggregating about 1,853 acres; also the second party is to have the privilege of working, and agrees to work, all laps of the large growth that will be cut by the first party for other purposes, that can be worked into ties, for all such ties cut and made by said second party on said land the second party hereby agrees to pay 5 cents per tie. It is further agreed that after the parties to this agreement, or some one acting for them, shall have gone over said land and made as close an estimate of the number of the ties, the second party will probably get off of the land, the said second party will pay to the first party an amount in cash in advance equal to the worth of said timber according to said estimate; and that upon final settlement between the parties proper adjustment will be made according as the estimate may go over or under the number of ties actually obtained."

He alleged that the defendant, Holland, was cutting in violation of the contract, measuring white oak trees over twelve inches in diameter at the stump, to his damage in the sum of $500, and that Holland was insolvent. He obtained an injunction restraining Holland from cutting any white oak trees larger than twelve inches in diameter at the stump. Holland, by his answer, filed on May 8, 1899, denied that he was insolvent, and claimed that he had the right under the contract to cut white oak trees not measuring more than twelve inches in diameter at the top according to the customary rule for measuring trees. In another paragraph he pleaded that the plaintiff had entered on the land after the contract was made and cut from it a large number of trees belonging to him under the contract, to his damage in the sum of $1,000. In an amended answer, filed on May 22, 1900, he alleged that the plaintiff had cut and removed from the land since his former answer was filed post oak timber sufficient to make 5,000 cross ties, and for this he prayed damages in the sum of $500. In his reply the plaintiff pleaded that immediately after the commencement of the action the defendant had abandoned his contract and refused to cut any more timber on the land, or to work it into cross ties, and still refused to do so. By his rejoinder the defendant denied that he had abandoned his contract, and alleged that he had been prevented by the injunction from going on with it and cutting the timber, as he did not know what to cut, and could not, without loss, cut part and leave part, and afterwards come back for it. In this condition of the pleadings the court transferred the case to the common-law docket on the issues whether the timber had been cut, and as to the damage resulting from the cutting. The jury to whom the case was submitted found the following special verdict: "We, the jury find from the evidence that W. W. Holland cut from the land 28,000 feet of white oak timber more than twelve inches in diameter at the stump, valued at $3.50 per 1,000 feet, and find that plaintiff has cut from same land 200,000 feet post oak timber, valued at $3 per 1,000 feet, and find that same was cut by S. N. Leonard from May, 1899, to July, 1900."

The case being then submitted, the court adjudged that the conduct of Holland did not constitute an abandonment of his contract, and entered judgment in his favor for $600, subject to a credit of $98 and his costs; but made no disposition of the injunction. From this judgment Leonard appeals.

It is apparent from the contract that the words "no limit in size of post oak and chestnut oak" are parenthetical, and that only white oak trees measuring in diameter not over twelve inches were sold. For there being no limit as to the post oak and the chestnut oak, unless the words limiting the diameter to not over twelve inches refer to white oak trees, they were meaningless. The trees were sold to be cut into cross ties. A standing tree must be measured at the stump. It can not be measured at the top until it is cut, and there is no fixed point for measuring trees at the top. Nearly any tree, if you go up the trunk high enough, will measure less than twelve inches. The plain meaning of the contract is that only the smaller white oak trees were sold. This is shown by the reference to the laps of the large growth, which, by the contract, are to be worked into ties. The plaintiff was, therefore, right in his construction of the contract, and the court erred in not perpetuating the injunction with costs.

The special finding of the jury is not sufficient to warrant a judgment in favor of Holland for any sum. It simply finds the amount of timber cut by Leonard, and the value of it. If Holland had cut this timber himself, he would have had to pay Leonard at the rate of 5 cents a tie for it. There was no time fixed in the contract within which Holland was to cut the timber, and from the agreed facts we concur with the chancellor in the conclusion that Holland did not intend to abandon his contract. Still the injunction was no reason for his not going on with the cutting of the timber. His being enjoined from cutting what he had no right to cut under the contract was no reason for his not going ahead with what he had a right to do. This he should have done, and under all the circumstances, in view of the lapse of time, we conclude that Leonard, in cutting the timber, should in equity be regarded as cutting it to get his money out of it.

On the return of the case the circuit court will charge Leonard with the value of the post oak timber cut as fixed by the jury, and credit him by the value of the white oak as fixed by them; also by the amount which he would have received from Holland for the cross ties if Holland had cut the timber. The verdict of the jury not being sufficient to warrant a judgment, the court on the return of the case will allow the parties to take proof and make an adjustment between them on the question of damages. The parties may be allowed to amend their pleadings, if they desire to do so.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded for a judgment sustaining plaintiff's injunction with costs, and for further proceedings on the counterclaim as herein indicated. The cost upon the counterclaim will depend upon the result.

STEVENSON'S ADM'R v. ILLINOIS CENTRAL R. R. CO., &c.

(Filed March 15, 1904.)

Removal to Federal court—Nonresident corporation sued jointly with resident citizen—Jurisdiction of State court—Appellant brought suit in the McCracken Circuit Court against the Illinois Central R. R. Co., Robert Bean, engineer, and A. T. Cole, conductor, for damages in the alleged negligent killing of plaintiff's intestate. The suit was removed to the United States Circuit Court by defendants against the objection of appellant. Plaintiff appeared in that court and made a motion to have it remanded to the State court, which was overruled. Defendants then filed their answer in the Federal court. Subsequently this action was dismissed by plaintiffs without prejudice. Plaintiff also prosecuted an appeal to this court from the judgment of the McCracken Circuit Court, and it was decided upon that appeal that the order of removal to the Federal court was improperly made because there was no denial of the averment that one of the defendants was a resident of this State, but that this error was waived by plaintiff going into the Federal court and dismissing that action without prejudice, and that, as a consequence thereof, plaintiff had no action pending in either court. On July 23, 1903, and within one year after the accrual of his cause of action, plaintiff brought this suit against the same defendants and Roy Christian, fireman. The railroad company again filed its petition and bond for removal, and also a special plea to the jurisdiction of the McCracken Circuit Court, relying on the facts recited in bar of plaintiff's right to sue. To this plea of jurisdiction the plaintiff filed a demurrer, which was overruled, the plea sustained and action dismissed. Held—That the trial court erred in sustaining the plea to the jurisdiction of the State court.

Taylor & Lucas for appellant.

Wheeler & Hughes and Pirtle, Trabue, Doolan & Cox for appellees.

Appeal from McCracken Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

On the 6th of August, 1902, Lucy Stevenson was killed by a railroad train upon the tracks of the Illinois Central R. R. Co., and thereafter, on the 10th of October, 1902, her administrator instituted an action in the McCracken Circuit Court against the Illinois Central R. R. Co., Robert Bean, the engineer of the train, and A. T. Cole, the conductor, for damages, alleging that the death of his intestate was attributable to the negligence of Bean and Cole. This suit was removed to the United States Circuit Court upon the application of the railroad company, on the ground of diverse citizenship. Cole, the conductor, was not before the court. The administrator subsequently dismissed the suit without prejudice. Subsequently, on the 30th of November, 1902, he brought a second action against the same parties in the McCracken Circuit Court upon the same cause of action. The railroad company and Robert Bean again filed their petition and bond, asking a transfer of the case to the Federal court. Plaintiff objected to the order of transfer to the Federal court, which was overruled. The defendants in that case filed a transcript of the record in the United States Court at Paducah, and the plaintiffs appeared in the court and made a motion to have the case remanded to the State court, which was overruled. The defendants thereupon filed their answer to the petition in the Federal court, which, upon the motion of plaintiff, was controverted of record. Subsequently this action was dismissed without prejudice on the motion of plaintiff. Plaintiff also prosecuted an appeal to this court from the judgment of the McCracken Circuit Court, and it was decided upon that appeal that the order of removal to the Federal court was improperly made, because there was no denial of the averment that one of the defendants, Cole, was a resident of the State of Kentucky, but that this error was waived by plaintiff going into the Federal court and dismissing that action without prejudice; and that as a consequence thereof they had no action pending in either court. But the opinion in that case states that the plaintiff could bring another suit upon the same cause of action in the State court if not barred by the lapse of time. (Stevenson's Adm'r v. Illinois Central R. R. Co., 24 Ky. Law Rep., 442.) On the 23d of July, 1903, and within one year after the accrual of his cause of action, the administrator of Lucy Stevenson brought this action against the Illinois Central R. R. Co., A. T. Cole, Robert Bean and Roy Christian, who, they allege, were, respectively, the conductor, engineer and fireman of the train which killed his intestate, and to whose negligence her death was attributable. They also make additional allegation of negligence to those relied on in the former suits. The railroad company again filed its petition and bond for a removal of the action to the United States Court for the Western District of Kentucky, and also filed a special plea to the jurisdiction of the McCracken Circuit Court, relying upon the facts recited supra in bar of plaintiff's right to prosecute the suit. To this plea of jurisdiction the plaintiff filed a general demurrer, which was overruled, the plea sustained and action dismissed; and to reverse that judgment this appeal is prosecuted.

It is the contention of appellee that the Federal court, having acquired jurisdiction of the cause of action upon the former removals, it was exclusive and continuous, and no suit could thereafter be instituted or maintained for the same cause of action in the State court, and in support of this contention rely upon the case of Cox v. R. R. Co., 68 Ga., 446; R. R. Co. v. Fulton, 59 Ohio St., 575, and Chesapeake & Ohio Ry. Co. v. Riddell's Adm'r, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 1687.

In the Georgia case it was decided that where a case has been removed from the State court into the Federal court the jurisdiction of the former ceases; and that after a nonsuit in the Federal court the case could not be renewed in the State court, and to support the conclusion there reached, relied upon the case of Kern v. Huldekoper, 103 U. S., 485. An examination of that case discloses that a party to a suit who was entitled to its removal from the State court, wherein it was brought, filed in due time his petition and requisite bond, asking for a transfer to the Federal court, and his petition was denied. The parties asking the removal nevertheless filed a transcript of the proceedings of the State court in the Federal court. The State court, however, proceeded to try and render judgment against the parties asking the removal. Afterwards the cause was tried in the Federal court, and the parties who had removed the case secured judgment in their favor. This latter judgment went to the Supreme Court by writ of error, and was affirmed, the Supreme Court holding that being entitled to removal, the Federal court acquired jurisdiction; and that all subsequent proceedings in the State court were void. We are unable to discover that the decision in Kern v. Huldekoper has any bearing upon the question at bar, or supports the judgment of the Georgia case. The case of R. R. Co. v. Fulton, 59 Ohio St., 575, seems simply to have adopted the reasoning and conclusion of the Georgia court. In the Chesapeake & Ohio Ry. Co. v. Riddell's Adm'r the court distinguished that case from the Georgia and Ohio cases above referred to. In that case the suit had been originally instituted in the Federal court by plaintiff, and afterwards dismissed without prejudice, and renewed in the State court. The jurisdiction of the State court was upheld, but the opinion seems to have recognized as authority the Georgia and Ohio. This was mere dicta, unnecessary to the decision of the case and in conflict with the conclusion reached herein, and is now withdrawn. In Adams Express Co. v. Scofield, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 1120, the same contention relied on by appellee in this case was made by the express company, and it was decided that an action which had been removed to the United States Court from the State court stood upon the same footing as one originally brought in the Federal court, and that either might be dismissed without prejudice to a future action within the statutory period. The decision in this case finds abundant support in Grassman v. Jarvis, 100 Fed. Rep., 146, in which both the Georgia and Ohio cases are construed, and is decisive of the case at bar.

It follows that the trial court erred in sustaining the plea to the jurisdiction of the State court.

The judgment is, therefore, reversed and cause remanded for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

SMITH v. PETREE.

(Filed March 15, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Lands—Sheriff's sale—Liens—Where a ditch under the drainage act of July 10, 1893, was constructed, the contractor upon a purchase of the land at a sheriff's sale for the purpose of enforcing his lien acquired no title to the land. Such purchaser was only entitled to a lien and costs for the construction of the ditch and the enforcement of his lien with legal interest.

2. Same—The cost of the drainage ditch is a lien upon the specific land assessed even in the hands of a purchaser, and the lien for the construction of the ditch is properly adjudged a lien upon the land.

Sweeney, Ellis & Sweeney for appellant.

R. G. Hill for appellee.

Appeal from Daviess Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

On October 8, 1897, a proceeding was instituted in the Daviess County Court for the construction of a ditch at the cost of the adjoining land owners under the act of July 10, 1893 (Acts 1891-2-3, page 15(2)). On October 18 viewers were appointed and were directed to act on October 21. On November 3 they filed their report, by which they charged the land of James Carter's heirs with $102.98 for the construction of the ditch. The land was correctly described in the report. Notice of the proceeding was given by posting notices as provided by the act. In these notices the course of the ditch was given, and the owners of this land were designated as James Carter's heirs. The land referred to was deeded to Mary Carter, the wife of James Carter. She had married the second time, and her second husband, Eaty, was one of the applicants. She had two children by Carter, none by Eaty. Young Carter was present at the survey. Before the report was filed they sold and conveyed the land to appellant Smith, and Smith paid them for it; but he had notice of the proceeding to establish the ditch before he bought, as shown by the evidence. The deed to Smith was lodged for record after the report was filed. This section of the ditch was not constructed, and the digging of it under the act was sold to the lowest bidder. Appellee Petree took the contract, and when the work was done obtained his certificate from the county clerk, which was listed with the sheriff for collection, the act providing that such claims should be collected by the sheriff as taxes are collected. The sheriff sold the land, and Petree, the purchaser, then filed this suit to recover it. The court sustained a demurrer to his petition so far as he sought to recover the land, but adjudged him a lien on it for his money, giving him interest at 30 per cent. for two years, and after that certain interest and penalties. Smith appeals.

We concur with the circuit court in the conclusion that no title to the land passed by the sheriff's sale. It has been held in several cases that no title passes under a sale for taxes where the land is assessed in the name of B's heirs, and we see no reason why the same rule should not be applied to proceedings under the act referred to. But section 4636, Kentucky Statutes, provides: "Whenever any person shall purchase property sold for delinquent taxes and the sale shall be set aside because of any irregularity, the purchaser shall have a lien on the property for the amount of taxes and costs paid by him and for which the property is liable, with legal interest from the time of such payment, which may be recovered from the owner of the property or person owning the same."

The report of the viewers properly described the land. It was a proceeding in rem based upon notices posted up at three places in the vicinity of the land. The person in possession of the land was one of the applicants, and from the facts shown we think it a fair presumption the other Carter heirs had actual notice of the proceeding. Smith, the purchaser, had such notice. This is shown by the testimony of the witness who told him about it, and by his own statements to his attorney who prepared the deed for him, proven by him on cross examination, when examined as a witness for Smith. The purpose of the posting up of the notices is that the owners may know of the proceeding. The owners should be properly given by name in the notices; but where the land is correctly described, and the owners have actual notice of the proceeding, the fact that the owners of the land are designated in the notice by general terms, instead of their Christian names, is an irregularity merely in the proceeding within the meaning of section 4636, Kentucky Statutes.

In Scherm v. Short, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 1103, it was held that the cost of a drainage ditch is a lien upon the specific land assessed even in the hands of a purchaser, and that the sheriff has no authority to subject first the personal property of the person who owns the land at the time of the assessment. The court, therefore, properly adjudged a lien upon the land, but the judgment should have been limited to the amount of the taxes and costs paid by the purchaser, with legal interest from the time of payment.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded for a judgment as herein indicated.

COLLINS v. STODGHILL.

(Filed March 15, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Lands—Sales by the acre—Where two tracts of land were sold by general warranty deed, the first tract purported to contain 125 acres, more or less, and the latter four acres, more or less, the two tracts in reality only containing 113 acres, the purchaser was entitled to credit for the deficit at the date of the execution of the note, the sale being in fact by the acre, and so understood by the parties.

J. C. Beckham & Son for appellant.

Gilbert, Peak & Gilbert for appellee.

Appeal from Shelby Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

On the 5th of March, 1886, the appellant, W. T. Collins, sold and conveyed to the appellee, J. D. Stodghill, by general warranty deed two tracts of land in Shelby county, Ky., which were described by metes and bounds, courses and distances. The first tract purported to contain 125 acres, more or less. The second four acres, more or less. The recited consideration was $4,900, $1,250 of which was paid in cash, and a note for $382.68, payable on the 5th of March, 1897, one for $382.67, payable on the 5th of March, 1898, and a third for $382.67, payable on the 5th of March, 1899, bearing interest at 6 per cent. from date, with a lien reserved to secure the payment of the note was executed by the vendees. This action was instituted by the appellant in the court below to enforce the payment of the note due on the 5th of March, 1899, less a credit of $170 endorsed thereon on the 22d of December, 1899. The other notes were all fully paid. The defendant for answer set out that the two tracts of land represented to contain 129 acres, in reality contained 118 acres; that he bought the land by the acre at the price of $30 an acre, and was entitled to a credit for the deficit at the date of the execution of the note at this rate. Plaintiff replied, denying that the defendant purchased the land at $30 per acre, but alleging that the sale was gross, and that the alleged deficit was immaterial.

The testimony of a number of witnesses was taken to support the respective contentions of the parties. The trial court adjudged defendant a credit for the deficit at the rate of $30 per acre, amounting in the aggregate to $354. The defendant appealed, and plaintiff has appealed. The question involved upon the appeal has been frequently before this court and was very fully considered by Judge Robertson in Harrison v. Talbot, 12 Ky., 253, where all the Virginia and Kentucky authorities upon the question are reviewed. He sums up his conclusions in these words: "From an analysis of the cases, thus chronologically reviewed, the following principles may be deduced: First, when it is evident that there has been a gross mistake as to quantity, and the complaining party has not been guilty of any fraud or culpable negligence, nor has otherwise impaired the equity resulting from the mistake, he may be entitled to relief from the technical legal effect of his contract, whether it be executed or only executory. . . . The relative extent of the surplus or deficit can not per se furnish an infallible criterion. The conduct of the parties, the date of the contract, the value and extent and locality of the land, the price and other nameless circumstances, are always important and generally decisive. Sales in gross may be subdivided into various subordinate classifications: First, sales strictly and essentially by the tract, without reference in the negotiations or in the consideration to any estimated or designated quantity of acres; second, sales of the like kind, in which, though a supposed quantity by estimation is mentioned or referred to in the contract, the reference was made only for the purpose of description, and under such circumstances or in such manner as to show that the parties intended to risk the contingency of quantity, whatever it might be, or how much soever it might exceed or fall hort of that which was mentioned in the contract; third, sales in which it is evident from extraneous circumstances of locality, value, price, time and the conduct and conversation of the parties, that they did not contemplate or intend to risk more than the usual rates of excess or deficit in similar case, or than such as might be reasonably calculated on within the range of ordinary contingency; fourth, sales which, though technically deemed and denominated sales in gross, are in fact sales by the acre, and so understood by the parties."

The evidence in this case brings it within the fourth subdivision above enumerated. There is a deficit of approximately 14 per cent. of the land actually included in the boundary. The trial court, therefore, properly allowed a credit for this deficit at the average price per acre which the total contract price bore to the number of acres of land supposed to have been covered by the conveyance.

Judgment affirmed.

JONES, &c. v. CONWAY, &c.

(Filed March 15, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Practice—Appeals—Upon an appeal in an action to set aside a judgment where no part of the record of the suit in which the judgment sought to be opened is copied in the transcript, it is impossible to determine whether there was any error committed by the trial court or not.

2. Same—Presumption—The rule is that the circuit court is presumed to have ruled properly and where a new trial is sought the record of the old action should be brought up on appeal in order that this court may see as to the things complained of.

Harreld & Willis and N. T. Howard for appellants.

R. L. Greene and M. M. Logan for appellees.

Appeal from Butler Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

Appellees were the executors of J. A. Jones. The estate amounted to something over $20,000. They made two settlements in the county court and then filed suit in the circuit court for the settlement of their accounts, and in that suit two more settlements were made. Finally an order of the court was entered by which the exceptions to their last settlement were withdrawn and a judgment was entered finally settling their accounts. Appellants subsequently filed this suit to set aside the judgment and obtained a new trial on the ground that it was entered without authority by consent of attorneys, and that certain errors had been made by which appellees had not been charged with part of the estate they received.

On final hearing the court dismissed the petition and the appellants have brought the case here. But no part of the record of the suit in which the judgment sought to be opened was rendered is copied in the transcript. The four settlements referred to which were made part of the petition are not copied. In this condition of the record it is impossible for us to see that the court erred in dismissing the petition; for if the old record was here it might show that all the property referred to was accounted for by the executors in that case, and that these very matters were there looked into and determined. The rule is that the circuit court is presumed to have ruled properly, and where a new trial is sought the record of the old action should be brought up on appeal in order that this court may see as to the things complained of. (Overstreet, &c. v. Brown, &c., 23 Ky. Law Rep., 317.)

Judgment affirmed.

MONTGOMERY v. MONTGOMERY.

(Filed March 15, 1904.)

Jurisdiction—Where the Court of Appeals is without jurisdiction to entertain an appeal it is likewise without jurisdiction to enter judgment upon supersedeas bond.

Jas. Bradley and B. M. Lee for appellant.

Victor F. Bradley for appellee.

Appeal from Scott Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

The judgment appealed from in this case was superseded. The appeal was dismissed because this court had not jurisdiction of the appeal. The case now comes upon the motion of the appellee for judgment for damages on the supersedeas bond. The court is of opinion that as the court has not the jurisdiction to entertain the appeal, we are likewise without jurisdiction to enter a judgment upon the supersedeas bond.

Motion overruled.

CRAVENS v. DESPAIN.

(Filed March 16, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Trespass to lands—Evidence—Judgment—In an action for trespass to lands, the bill of exceptions not containing the evidence, it is presumed that the evidence would have sustained the action.

2. Pleading—Where appellee alleged that he was the owner of lands, and appellant denied this and pleaded that he was the owner, this affirmative was but an affirmative denial which did not require a reply.

C. S. Hill and G. C. Avritt for appellant.

L. S. Pence and R. L. Greene for appellee.

Appeal from Marion Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

Appellee brought this suit in trespass against appellant, alleging that he (appellee) was the owner and in the possession of a certain tract of land, and that appellant had wrongfully and unlawfully entered within the boundary and cut therefrom certain trees of a certain value.

Appellant's answer denied that appellee was the owner of the land, and denied that the cutting of the trees was unlawful or wrongful. In a second paragraph appellant further pleaded that he was the owner by title of record of a large boundary of land, including the tract in controversy. There was no reply to this answer. Upon proof heard the circuit court adjudged the title in favor of appellee. Appellant has prosecuted this appeal on a transcript, including the pleadings, certain deeds filed with his answer, a copy of the surveyor's report and the judgment. He insists that upon the pleadings he was entitled to a judgment because of the failure to controvert the affirmative allegation of his answer.

We are of the opinion that the answer presented only one issue, that was the ownership of the strip of land described by the plaintiff. When appellee alleged that he was the owner, and when appellant denied that appellee was the owner, but alleged that he (appellant) was the owner, the last-named affirmation was but an affirmative denial which did not require a reply to put the matter in issue. (Ellis' Adm'r v. Blackerby, ante, 1557.)

The pleadings as they stand present the controverted point, that is, which of the two litigants was the owner of the strip of land in dispute. In the absence of the evidence heard by the circuit judge we must presume that it supports his judgment. An amended petition filed by the plaintiff before trial stated that another person named owned an undivided one-sixth of the land, and that he would enter his appearance to the suit. The record brought up does not show whether this person was brought before the court or not, but we must presume that he was, or the court would not have rendered its judgment. Upon such partial transcript we must presume in the absence of a schedule, as permitted by the Code, that the omitted part would sustain the judgment rendered.

Perceiving no error the judgment is affirmed.

DE WITT v. CHESAPEAKE & OHIO R. R. CO., &c.

(Filed March 16, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Railroads—Jurisdiction—In an action against a railroad company and one of its employes for damages, the fact that appellant had brought a suit against the railroad company alone, which he dismissed without prejudice upon an order being made to transfer it to the Federal court, the lower court was not without jurisdiction because of the removal of the first suit to the Federal court where it was dismissed, and it was error to overrule appellant's demurrer to the answer of appellees, and to sustain the plea to the jurisdiction.

Byron & Hargell for appellant.

E. L. Worthington and W. H. Wadsworth for appellees.

Appeal from Bracken Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle.

This action was instituted by appellant in the Bracken Circuit Court to recover of appellee, Chesapeake & Ohio R. R. Co., and two of its employes $5,000 in damages for an alleged assault and battery committed upon him by the two employes mentioned while he was a passenger upon the train of the appellee railroad company.

Some time prior to the bringing of this action appellant had brought in the same court a similar suit against appellee Chesapeake & Ohio R. R. Co., alone, upon the same cause of action, and to recover the same amount. The first suit was upon the petition of appellee Chesapeake & Ohio R. R. Co., a foreign corporation, transferred to the Federal court, whereupon the appellant appeared in that court, dismissed the action without prejudice, and thereafter brought the present action in the Bracken Circuit Court. Appellee railroad company again filed its petition in the State court and moved to transfer the cause to the Federal court upon the ground of diverse citizenship, which motion was overruled by the lower court. Appellees then filed a joint answer, but nearly a year later they filed an amended answer, containing a plea to the jurisdiction of the court, setting up the proceeding in the former action in the Federal court in the matter of the removal, and relying upon such removal and the proceeding in the Federal court as a bar to the last or present action.

The appellant demurred to the amended answer, which demurrer was overruled and the petition dismissed. From that judgment this appeal is prosecuted. The question presented for decision by the appeal is, did the transfer of the first case to the Federal court, notwithstanding the dismissal of the case in that court without prejudice by appellant, oust the lower court of jurisdiction in this action, and operate as a bar to its renewal in the court?

In Chesapeake & Ohio R. R. Co. v. Riddell's Adm'r, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 1687, it was apparently so held by this court. But in Lucy Stevenson's Adm'r v. I. C. C. R. R. Co., ante, 2011, the court in an opinion by Chief Justice Burnam, referring to the case of C. & O. R. R. v. Riddell's Adm'r, supra, said: "In that case the suit had been originally instituted in the Federal court by plaintiff, and afterwards dismissed without prejudice and renewed in the State court. The jurisdiction of the State was upheld, but the opinion seems to have recognized as authority the Georgia and Ohio cases. (69 Georgia, 446; 59 Ohio, 575.) This was mere dicta, unnecessary to the decision of the case, and in conflict with the conclusion reached therein, and is now withdrawn."

Continuing the discussion of the question of jurisdiction here involved the court further said: "In Adams Express Co. v. Scofield, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 1120, the same contention relied on by appellee in this case was made by the express company, and it was decided that an action which had been removed to the United States Court from the State court stood upon the same footing as one originally brought in the Federal court, and that either might be dismissed without prejudice to a future action within the statutory period.

The decision in this case finds abundant support in Grassman v. Jarvis, 100 Fed. Rep., 146, in which both the Georgia and Ohio case are construed, and is decisive of the case at bar. It follows that the trial court erred in sustaining the plea to the jurisdiction of the State court."

From the foregoing authorities it is manifest that the lower court was not deprived of jurisdiction in this case by the removal of the first suit to the Federal court, where it was dismissed. The lower court, therefore, erred in overruling the demurrer of appellant to the amended answer, in sustaining appellee's plea to the jurisdiction, and in dismissing the petition.

Wherefore, the judgment is reversed and cause remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

DAVIS v. CITY OF CLINTON.

(Filed March 16, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Streets—Action to recover possession of—Pleading—In an action by a city for the recovery of possession of a street which had been enclosed, the fact that the petition did not allege that notice had been given requiring the removal of the fence did not render it defective. If defendant had admitted title in plaintiff and pleaded tenancy at will or by sufferance, then notice would have been necessary.

2. Same—Evidence—In an action for the recovery of real property it is competent to read from deed book tracing title, the deed books being original evidence and competent for the purpose for which they were introduced.

Brummal & Son and J. H. Shelton for appellant.

Bullock & Smith for appellee.

Appeal from Hickman Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

This action was instituted by the city of Clinton against the appellant, John Davis, to recover the possession of a part of Water street, which had been without right taken possession of and enclosed by the defendant. The defendant's answer was a traverse and plea of the statute of limitation.

A jury trial resulted in a verdict and judgment in favor of the city, and the defendant has appealed. The first ground relied on for a reversal is that the trial court erred in overruling a demurrer to the petition on the ground that it failed to allege that the city had given the defendant one month's written notice requiring him to remove his fence, as required by section 2326 of the Kentucky Statutes. If the defendant had admitted the title of plaintiff, and plead a tenancy at will or by sufferance, he would have been entitled to this notice; but no such notice is required or contemplated where the defendant claimed a title to the property by prescription.

The next ground of complaint is that the trial court permitted the clerk of the Hickman Circuit Court to read to the jury from the deed books in his office deeds tracing the title to the tract of land in dispute to the city, it being insisted that only certified copies of these records attested by the clerk were competent evidence. We can not concur in this contention. The deed books were original evidence, and competent for the purpose for which they were introduced.

3d. It is also complained that the court erred to the defendant's prejudice in permitting the defendant to introduce as evidence a plat of the city of Clinton, certified by the clerk of the county court to have been pasted in the back of the deed book A., the first book of record in the office, on the ground that no evidence was offered to show that it had been adopted as the official plat of the city by the city authorities. It is shown that the town was incorporated in 1829, and the fact that this plat was pasted in the first official deed book of the county, which had remained continually in the possession of the clerk, certainly made it competent as an ancient document for the purpose for which it was introduced.

4th. It is claimed that the lower court erred in refusing to peremptorily instruct the jury to find for the defendant on the ground that the plaintiff had failed to trace title to the strip of land in controversy back to the Commonwealth. It appears that on the 19th of March, 1829, Stephen Ray and wife conveyed to the trustees appointed by the general assembly to locate a seat of justice for Hickman county a tract of 160 acres of land in consideration of an undertaking on their part to locate the county seat there. It further appears that the town of Clinton was laid out with streets, alleys, lots, etc., on this tract of land; and that it became the county seat of Hickman county. The record discloses that both the plaintiff and the defendant have recognized by deeds and conveyance of real estate this plat; and that the land enclosed by the defendant constituted a section of Water street as originally platted. Tracing to a common vendor, it was unnecessary for the city in this proceeding to trace Ray's title back to the Commonwealth.

Plaintiff also complains that the court erred in the instruction given to the jury and in refusing to give those offered by the defendant. Instruction No. 1, given to the jury, is as follows: "The court instructs the jury that the strip of ground in contest belonged to the corporation of Clinton under the deed from Stephen Ray, and they are instructed to find for the plaintiff, city of Clinton, in this case unless they shall believe from the evidence that the defendant, John Davis, and those under whom he claims had the actual, peaceful, adverse and continuous possession of said strip of land for more than fifteen years next before December, 1878, in which event the law is for the defendant, and the jury should so find."

Section 2546 of the Kentucky Statutes was enacted by the general assembly in December, 1873, and provides that the "limitations mentioned in the first article of this chapter shall not begin to run in respect to actions by any town or city for the recovery of any street, alley or other public easement, or any part of either, or the use thereof in such town or city, until the trustees or the council or the corporation, by whatever name known or called, have been notified in writing by the party in possession, or about to take possession, to the effect that such possession will be adverse to the right or title to such town or city. Until such notice is given all possession of streets, alleys and public easements, or any part of either, in any town or city, shall be deemed amicable, and the person in possession the tenant at will of such town or city."

There is no claim that the notice required by this statute was ever given. The testimony is conflicting as to the length of time defendant had had the street enclosed, and it was, therefore, properly a question for the jury. And we think the first instruction embraced the whole law.

Perceiving no error prejudicial to the right of the defendant the judgment is affirmed.

HEWITT, TRUSTEE v. HENSLEY.

(Filed March 16, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Lands—Action to quiet title—In an action to quiet title the lands of one not a party to the action can not be affected, and where it was admitted by the adverse party that a certain boundary of land belonged to the claimant, the court properly adjudged it to the latter.

H. C. Clay for appellant.

W. F. Hall for appellee.

Appeal from Harlan Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

This suit was brought in the Harlan Circuit Court by appellee against appellant to quiet his title as against the claim of the appellant, whom he alleged was making a claim to his land and casting a cloud upon his title. In his petition he set out a boundary containing 200 acres.

The appellant answered and denied that he was casting any cloud upon the title of appellee, and admitted that appellee was the owner of the lower half of the boundary described in the petition, but stated that he was the owner of the upper half. Appellee then filed an amended petition, and alleged that he had, by mistake, bounded and described the 200-acre survey as his land; that he had, prior to the bringing of this action, sold and conveyed to his son, George Hensley, all the land described in his original petition except 51 acres of the lower end of the survey, which 51 acres he described in his amended petition by metes and bounds, courses and distances.

The court adjudged that the appellee was the owner of this piece of land described in the amended petition containing 51 acres. From this judgment appellant has appealed. The judgment of the lower court was right. This part of the land adjudged to the appellee is a part of the 100 acres admitted by appellant in his answer as belonging to him. George Hensley, the owner of the balance of the 200-acre survey, as alleged in the amended petition, was not a party to this action, and the court did not undertake to settle his and appellant's rights and claims to the 149 acres of this 200-acre survey.

Wherefore, the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

HILL, EX'OR, &c. v. MAYES, GUARDIAN.

(Filed March 16, 1904.)

1. Settlement of estates—Liens—Where one holding a lien note assigned it to another who in action to settle the estate which the lien note affected remained silent as to having the note, made no claim against the estate and permitted the suit to settle it to go off the docket without presenting the claim, is limited in an attempt to recover the value of the note to an action against the legatees and distributees of the estate.

2. Constructions of statutes—By sections 428, 430, 432 and 434, Civil Code, requiring in an action brought to settle an estate that all persons having liens be made parties, and the making of an order directing all such persons to appear before the commissioner to prove claims, and that creditors who fail to so appear and prove their claims shall be concluded by the final judgment, all of these provisions being complied with a judgment of distribution is binding, whether a creditor has notice of the pendency of the action or not.

H. W. Rives for appellants.

T. S. Mayes for appellee.

Appeal from Marion Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

T. J. West died in Marion county, Kentucky, in the year 1895, and left a small amount of personal property and three tracts of land. On one of the tracts there was a lien in favor of one Bricken, who had died, upon whose estate J. M. Knott had administered. One of the tracts was purchased by T. J. West of Adeline Mackin for the price of $700, for which he executed two notes, one for $300, the other for $400. This last note Mrs. Mackin, prior to 1895, sold and assigned to one Rosetta Johnson, testate of appellant herein. Mrs. Mackin, when she transferred this note to Rosetta Johnson, failed to note this fact on the margin of the deed book as required by section 498a of the Kentucky Statutes. The record stood as showing that she was still the holder of the lien notes.

One Robert Parrott qualified as the administrator of T. J. West, and on December 30, 1895, he instituted an action, by virtue of section 423 of the Code of Practice, to settle decedent's estate. He made, as defendants, the children of decedent West and the creditors, Adeline Mackin, J. M. Knott and J. M. Bricken, administrators of Alex. Bricken, Martin Horan and Catherine Horan. He alleged in his petition that these were all the creditors of the decedent known to him. He also alleged that the decedent was the statutory guardian of his children, and as such was indebted to them, as shown by his last settlement, which settlement was made part of his petition, in the sum of $973, with interest from the year 1890. It also appears that J. M. Knott, some time in the month of February 1896, was appointed by the county court as guardian for the children of the decedent, West, who were made defendants in the action. But before he was summoned and made a party to the action as guardian, and on the 21st of February, 1896, the court rendered a judgment for the sale of the three tracts of land mentioned. The court first directed the commissioner to offer the three tracts separately and then as a whole, accepting the bid or bids which result in the most money to the estate and closed the judgment with these words: "All valid claims and liens against the land, or either of said tracts, shall attach to the proceeds thereof, and said lienholders shall not be prejudiced by the sale of this land as herein offered." The commissioner reported that he offered the three tracts separately. The bid offered for one was $323, another $162, and the other, or the Mackin land, $126. He then offered the whole, and John Horan bid the sum of $1,800, which bid was accepted and the court confirmed this report. Horan paid all the purchase price, and the deed was made to him.

The court, by an order made at its February term, by virtue of section 430 of the Code, referred the action to the master commissioner to advertise, take proof and report all claims against the estate. At the next term of the court he made his report, in which he reported a claim due Mrs. Mackin for something over $200, and reported it as a preferred claim on the land, and sold by her to West, and reported the claim due the Bricken estate of $150 as a preferred lien on one of the other tracts, and reported that the children of West had a preferred claim against their father's estate of $1,242; that this money had been expended by their father in purchasing the two tracts of land other than the Mackin survey. He reported that he had advertised for claims, as required by section 430 of the Code and the order of court, and no claims were filed which were preferred claims other than those mentioned; that five or six persons, holding general claims, amounting in all to about $200, had proven and filed their claims, which were each set out in his report. This report was confirmed, and the court directed the cost of the action to be paid, and that the claims of Bricken, Mackin and the children be paid and the balance of $37 be distributed pro rata among the general creditors. This was done, and the case stricken from the docket in the year 1897.

It appears that Mrs. Rosetta Johnson did not personally know that she had any claim against the estate of West; that J. M. Knott, who was the cashier of a bank, was her agent and transacted all her business, and actually made this transaction with Mrs. Mackin, by which she received this note for $400 and collected the interest for her for one or two years from West. It also appears that neither Parrott, the administrator of West, nor any of the other parties to that action other than Knott and Mrs. Mackin had any knowledge or information of the existence of this $400 note, or that Mrs. Rosetta Johnson held that claim, or any other claim, against the estate of T. J. West. There is not an intimation in the whole of the proceedings of Parrott to settle that estate that she had any claim against it of any kind or character.

In the year 1901, after the death of Rosetta Johnson, her executor, the appellant herein, filed his affidavit and moved the circuit court that the action of Parrott to settle the estate be reinstated on the docket and for a rule against the guardian, Mayes, the appellee herein, requiring him to refund of the amount that the children had received enough to pay the $400 note, with its interest. Before this motion was heard by the court appellant dismissed this proceeding without prejudice, and immediately instituted this action.

In his petition he made John Horan, the purchaser of the land, and Mrs. Adeline Mackin, defendants. He made all the necessary allegations to enforce the lien on the tract of land sold by Mackin to West. Horan alone answered. He referred to all the proceedings of Parrott to settle the estate of West, and made the same a part of his answer and pleaded the judgment of the court therein as a bar to the prosecution of this action against him, and made his answer a cross action against the guardian of the West children, and asked that in the event he be compelled to pay this $400 note to appellant, that appellee, the guardian, be compelled to refund that amount to him. Appellee answered this cross petition and also referred to the Parrott settlement suit, and claimed that the judgments rendered by the court therein were final judgments, and that these children received the fund due them by reason of these judgments of the court, and that they were final and could not be collaterally attacked by this action, and asked that this proceeding be dismissed. The pleadings were completed, issues made, proof heard and the court adjudged that the petition of appellant Hill and the cross petition of Horan, in so far as they affected appellee, be dismissed, and adjudged appellee his costs against appellant. The appellant asked a reversal of this judgment.

The appellant claims that Mrs. Rosetta Johnson is not bound by the judgment in the Parrott suit for the reason that she was not a party thereto. He also contends, even admitting that Parrott and all the parties to that action other than Knott and Mackin had no notice of the existence of the claim of Rosetta Johnson, yet as it was shown by the proof that T. J. West in his lifetime knew that Mrs. Johnson held his note, and as these children and their guardian claimed through and under him, they were bound by his knowledge of the assignment to Mrs. Johnson, even if no one of them had been informed of it after his death. This last proposition is true, provided they had relieved the sum paid them as heirs, legatees or devisees. But as they received it as preferred creditors of the estate, these principles can not apply to them in this case.

As a general rule appellant's first proposition is a correct one, that is, no person is bound by a judgment in an action unless he be a party or privy thereto. But the settlements of the estates of deceased persons are governed by special Code provisions which, in our opinion, alters the general rule stated. By section 438 it is required that the representative or other person authorized to bring an action for the settlement of an estate make as defendants the real representatives, and all persons having liens upon or interest in the property left by the decedent and the creditors of the decedent, so far as known to the plaintiff. By this action it is presumed that the party bringing the suit may not know all the creditors and persons holding liens upon the property of the decedent. For the purpose of obviating this difficulty, and to give every creditor notice of the action, section 480 was enacted, directing the court to make an order for the creditors of the decedent to appear before a commissioner and prove their claims before a certain day to be named in the order, notice of which should be given by advertisement in a newspaper; or if none be published in the county, then by such other modes as the court may judge best calculated to give such creditors actual notice of the order; and in addition to the advertisement in the newspaper the court may direct publication in other modes.

By section 432 it is provided a creditor appearing before a commissioner and presenting his claim becomes thereby a party to the action and is concluded by the final judgment of the court allowing or rejecting his claim. It is provided in section 433, creditors failing to appear and prove their claims agreeable to such order, shall have no claim against the executor or the administrator who has actually paid out the estate in expenses of administration, and to creditors, legatees, or distributees. By section 434 it is provided, legatees and distributees shall be liable to a direct action by a creditor to the extent of estate received by each of them, notwithstanding the failure of the creditor to appear and the discharge of the personal representative as prescribed in the preceding section; and that liability shall continue during the same period that the liability of the personal representative would have continued but for said discharge.

It is apparent from all these Code provisions, taken together, that if an estate of a decedent be settled and these provisions be substantially complied with, then the judgment of distribution should be final and binding upon all creditors whether they had actual notice of the pendency of the action or not. And if a creditor did not appear in such an action and file his claim or move to set aside, vacate or modify the judgment of the court as prescribed by section 518 of the Code, then his claim is lost unless he can recover it against the legatees or distributees as provided by section 434 of the Code. As to the executor, administrator and creditors who file their claims, the advertisement in the newspaper or by such other means or modes as the court may order, must be conclusively presumed to have notified all creditors of the pendency of the action. For it is provided by section 483 of the Code, that creditors failing to appear and prove their claims agreeably to such order, shall have no claim against the executor or administrator who has actually paid out the estate in expenses of administration and to creditors, legatees or distributees. The next section expressly limits the right of creditors who file the claims, to a recovery from the legatees and distributees of the estate, thereby impliedly relieving the creditors, who have, by order of the court, received the amount of the claims, from the contribution to those who may have failed to file claims.

We are of the opinion that, taking all these provisions together, this is a reasonable construction of them. Otherwise it never could be known when an estate was settled. Those creditors who had filed their claims would be afraid to receive any sums adjudged to them by order of court, for fear that many creditors had failed to present their claims, and that they might thereafter be harassed by a dozen of more suits for contribution. Hence the reason for limiting the right of such creditors to proceed against only the legatees and distributees of the estate.

For these reasons the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

COMMONWEALTH v. REINECKE COAL MINING CO.

(Filed March 17, 1904.)

1. Indictment—Constitutional law—Upon an indictment charging a coal mining company with "willfully failing and refusing on or before the 15th and 30th days of August, 1902, to pay within fifteen days of the aforesaid 15th and 30th days, respectively, in full amount of wages," etc., returned pursuant to subsection 1, section 2739, Kentucky Statutes, Held—That the act as amended contains nothing that is not germane to subject expressed in the body thereof and in the title, and is not violative of section 51 of the Constitution, and the indictment properly charging an offense denounced by the statute is sustained.

2. Same—An indictment need not follow the language of the statute upon which it is based. It is sufficient if it use the words of the statute, or words of similar import.

3. Same—It is a well established principle in this State that as long as the legislature does not exceed the limits fixed by the Constitution in the enactment of a statute, the courts have no right to interfere on the ground that an act violates the natural principles of justice and right.

John L. Grayot and Clifton J. Pratt for appellant.

Gordon, Gordon & Cox and C. J. Waddill for appellee.

Appeal from Hopkins Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle.

On October 7, 1902, the grand jury of Hopkins county found and returned in the circuit court of that county an indictment against the appellee, Reinecke Coal Mining Co., which was in words and figures as follows:

"The Commonwealth of Kentucky
 "vs. Indictment.
 "Reinecke Coal Mining Co.

} Hopkins Circuit Court.

"The grand jurors of the county of Hopkins, in the name and by the authority of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, accuse the Reinecke Coal Mining Co. of the offense of unlawfully and willfully failing and refusing on or before the 15th and 30th days of August, 1902, to pay, within fifteen days of the aforesaid 15th and 30th days respectively, in full amount of wages in lawful money of the United States of America, due a person engaged and employed by said company in the mining industry. Said company employed the services of more than ten persons in the mining industry, committed in manner and form as follows, to wit: The said Reinecke Coal Mining Co., in the said company of Hopkins, on the 15th day of August, 1902, and before the finding of this indictment, did unlawfully and willfully fail and refuse on or before the 15th and 30th days of August, 1902, to pay, to within fifteen days of the aforesaid 15th and 30th days of August, respectively, in lawful money of the United States of America, the full amount of wages due Ben Anderson, a servant and employe of the said Reinecke Coal Mining Co., and to whom money was due by the said company for services rendered said company in August, 1902, for work done in the mining industry. The said Reinecke Coal Mining Co. was, during the months of July and August, 1902, engaged in the mining industry, to wit, mining coal, and did have in its employment during said months and engaged in mining coal at one and the same time and place, persons in greater number than ten. Said Reinecke Coal Mining Co. was at that time, and is now a corporation doing business in Hopkins county, Kentucky, and said company was not prevented from paying said wages in said months by unavoidable casualty. Against the peace and dignity of the Commonwealth of Kentucky."

The lower court sustained a demurrer to and dismissed the indictment, and from that judgment the Commonwealth has appealed.

The offense for which appellee was indicted was created by subsection 1, section 2739, Kentucky Statutes, which reads as follows: "That all persons, associations, companies and corporations, employing the services of ten or more persons in any mining work or mining industry, in this Commonwealth, shall, on or before the 15th and 30th days of each month, pay to within fifteen days of the aforesaid 15th and 30th days, respectively, each servant or employe in lawful money of the United States, the full amount of wages due each such servant or employe rendering such service, unless prevented by an unavoidable casualty: Provided, however, That if at any time of payment any servant or employe shall be absent from his place, he shall be entitled to such payment at any time thereafter on demand."

Subsection 2 of section 2739, forbids the blacklisting of their employes by any person, company or corporation, engaged in the business of mining, or the coercing of such employes to trade at any particular store. And subsection 3 of the same section, declares that a violation of any of the provisions of the act shall be deemed a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction, the persons, company or corporation so offending shall be fined not less than $50 nor more than $100 for each offense.

As originally enacted, subsection 1, section 2739, of the statute supra, dif-ferred somewhat from that subsection as it now appears, in that it provided for the payment to the employe on or before the 16th day of each month, of his wages for the month previous. And contained this further provision, which is not found in the present statute, viz.: "But if such person, corporation or company, after using due diligence, is unable to make said payment as above required (i. e., on the 16th of each month), he or it shall, within fifteen days thereafter, make out a pay-roll and statement of account due each employe and also a due bill for said sum bearing interest from said 16th day of the month and deliver same to each of said employes."

The original act was amended by an act approved March 21, 1902 (Acts 1902, page 125). The enacting part of which is as follows:

"Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky:

"That section 1 of an act entitled 'An act concerning the employes and servants in mining work or industry in this Commonwealth,' which was received by the governor, March 2, 1898, and became a law at the expiration of ten days without the governor's approval, be, and the same is, hereby repealed, and the following is enacted in lieu thereof."

Then follows the language constituting the present subsection 1 of section 3739, which is accurately quoted in the foregoing part of this opinion. We are not advised as to the grounds upon which the lower court sustained the demurrer to the indictment, as the judgment is silent upon that subject, but take it for granted that it was sustained upon one or more of the several grounds argued in the brief of counsel for appellee. It is contended that the indictment charges two offenses, for which reason the demurrer was properly sustained. We question the soundness of this contention. There seems to be but one offense set out in the indictment. Reduced to the briefest statement, the charge in substance is that appellee, on the — day of August, 1902, unlawfully failed and refused on or before August 15th and 30th, 1902, to pay to within fifteen days of those dates, respectively, in lawful money, the full amount of wages due Ben Anderson, its employe, among more than ten others, for labor performed by him in its business of mining. We, therefore, incline to the opinion that the demurrer should not have been sustained on this ground. But if we are mistaken in this conclusion, and should concede that the demurrer ought to have been sustained because two offenses are charged in the indictment, nevertheless it would have been error for the court to dismiss the indictment on that ground, for when a demurrer is sustained to an indictment because of its charging two offenses, the proper practice is to allow the Commonwealth's attorney to elect for which of the two offenses he will prosecute the defendant in the indictment.

It is insisted for appellee that the indictment is defective because it does not allege that Ben Anderson was at his place of labor at the time his wages were payable under the statute, or if absent, that he did, upon his return, demand of appellee his wages. This objection is urged in view of the proviso contained in the statute which declares, "that if at any time of payment any servant or employe shall be absent from his place of labor, he shall be entitled to such payment at any time thereafter on demand."

It is not necessary for an indictment to negative a state of facts that may be relied upon as a defense. If appellee can shield itself behind the proviso of the statute it must do so by way of defense. An indictment need not follow the language of the statute upon which it is based. It may use the words of the statute, or words of similar import; consequently, the indictment in the case at bar is not, as argued, defective, because it does not follow the precise language of the statute upon which it is based. (Commonwealth v. Soroggan, 22 Ky. Law Rep., 1338; Connor v. Commonwealth, 13 Bush, 721.)

As it sets forth the offense with such certainty as to apprise the appellee of the nature of the accusation upon which it is to be tried, and to constitute a bar to a subsequent prosecution for the same offense, it is sufficiently specific. (Paynter v. Commonwealth, 81 Ky. Law Rep., 1563.)

It is also contended in argument that the amendment of 1902, under which the indictment in this case was found, was not enacted in compliance with the provisions of section 51 of the Constitution, which declares that: "No law enacted by the general assembly shall relate to more than one subject, and that shall be expressed in the title; and no law shall be revised, amended, or the provisions thereof extended, or conferred, by reference to its title only, but so much thereof as is revised, amended, extended or conferred, shall be re-enacted and published at length;" and it is claimed that the title of the act of 1902 is defective in that the amendment of the act of 1898, is the subject thereof, and such subject does not appear in its title, and because, as further contended, it amends the act of 1898, by a reference to its title only, and without republishing the act as amended.

The title of the amendment of 1902 is as follows: "An act concerning the employes and servants in mining work or industry in this Commonwealth." The general subject of the amendment, as of the original act of 1898, is the better protection of employes and servants in mining work or industry, and the object in view is their payment in lawful money for services rendered. The act, as amended, contains nothing that is not germane to the subject expressed in the body thereof and in the title, and its meaning is so plain that any person of ordinary intelligence can readily understand it. Nor is it true that the act in question amends that of 1898, by a reference to its title only, and without republishing the act as amended. The act of 1902 sets forth in explicit terms that section 1 of the original act is repealed, and that the single section constituting the amendment shall be and is substituted therefor. No other section or provision of the original act was amended by the act of 1902, and as section 1, enacted in lieu of the one repealed, is set out in full, that is, "published at length," in the act of 1902, such publication was and is a substantial compliance with section 51 of the Constitution.

In Purnell v. Mann, &c., 105 Ky., 95, this court, in construing the section of the Constitution, supra, said: "The question then arises how to construe the provision 'but so much thereof as is revised, amended, extended or conferred, shall be re-enacted and published at length,' so as to substantially comply with that section. We think the manifest intention was that the provision should apply only to so much of the law as, after passage of the new act, remains in force amended." * * * (Herndon v. Farmer, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 1049.)

The act of 1902 as passed and published, is full and specific enough as to the subject embraced by it to show for what part of the law of 1898 it is substituted, and, moreover, the part for which it is substituted being in express terms repealed, the residue of the law of 1898 is unaffected, and left in full force.

It is further contended by counsel for appellee that the statute, as amended, is class legislation, also special legislation, and not a just exercise of the police power, for any and all of which reason it is unconstitutional, and should be so declared by this court. The questions raised by the foregoing objections have been heretofore settled by this court in favor of the validity of the statute, and its constitutionality upheld, in the case of the Commonwealth of Kentucky v. Hillside Coal Co., 22 Ky. Law Rep., 549, and without taking time to quote from the opinion, or to discuss it in detail, we hereby express our approval of its reasoning and conclusions.

In truth, section 244 of the Constitution, which provides that "all wage earners in this State employed in factories, mines, workshops, or by corporations, shall be paid for their labor in lawful money," authorized the enactment by the legislature of the statute in question. It is true that Commonwealth v. Hillside Coal Co., supra, was decided before the passage of the act of 1902, whereby the law of 1898 was amended. But the points of difference between the statute in its original and amended form we have already indicated. They are not material, and the opinion of the court in Commonwealth v. Hillside Coal Co. is just as applicable to the present as it was to the former statute.

We can find no ground for the appellee's contention that an enforcement of the statute, supra, would interfere with vested rights, impair the obligation of contracts, or impose a penalty for the nonpayment of debt. It is a well established principle in this State that so long as the legislature does not pass the limits fixed by the Constitution, the courts have no authority to interfere on the ground that the act in question violates the natural principles of justice and right. (Tiedman Lim. Police Power, section 8.)

The subjects for the exercise of the police power are, first, preservation of the public health; second, preservation of the public morals; third, regulation of business enterprises; fourth, regulation of civil rights of individuals, and, fifth, the general welfare and safety of the citizens. All business must be subject to reasonable regulations, and as the legislature in enacting the statute under consideration seems to have kept within the purview of section 244 of the Constitution, we are constrained to hold that the statute in all of its parts is valid. Consequently, the lower court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the indictment.

Wherefore, the judgment is reversed and cause remanded for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

GRIFFIN v. GINGELL, &c.

(Filed March 16, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Mortgage liens—Prior equities—In an action to enforce a mortgage lien on land, on which there are numerous liens for purchase money and subsequent mortgages, Held—That as between equities, that which is prior in time is regarded as best and takes precedence over any which may be subsequently created.

2. Notice—Estoppel—On the facts of this case, Held—That notice given by Griffin, one of the cross plaintiffs, is not sufficient to create a lis pendens, or that H. and G., lien debtors, are estopped thereby to prevent the claim of the plaintiff from being first enforced against their lands.

8. Contested claim—No proof—The complaint of Millie Reed, wife of George Reed, that her claim for $1,350, assigned to her by the building and loan association, was dismissed, can not be considered because it was contested as being fraudulent, and as the proof heard on the trial is not copied in the record, we must presume that it was sufficient to authorize the lower court in deciding against her claim.

Brown & Vance for appellant Griffin.

Givens & Givens for appellant Millie Reed.

R. H. Cunningham for appellee Gingell.

Appeal from Henderson Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

In the year 1898, George L. Reed purchased from the Mutual Life Insurance Co. of Kentucky 150 acres of land for the price of $2,100, and executed therefor his five notes for the purchase price; four of them for $400 each, and the last one for $500. The insurance company reserved a lien on this land for the payment of these notes, and on that day took a mortgage from Reed and wife, as additional security, on two other tracts of land then owned by Reed; one known and will hereafter be called the 65-acre tract, and the other the 104-acre tract. Reed had paid on these notes up to the time that the judgment complained of herein was rendered, all the interest, and reduced the principal of them to about $2,000. Soon after the sale of this land to Reed, he sold and conveyed to one T. C. Larue 120 acres of this 150-acre tract at the price of $1,900. He paid $300 in cash. The balance was to be paid in three equal annual payments. These notes were sold and assigned by Reed to appellant, P. H. Griffin. Afterward Reed sold the 65-acre tract to I. W. Gingell at the price of $2,000, of which $1,100 was paid cash and land and the balance on time. At the time of the judgment complained of Gingell had paid all of the purchase price except $847.65, and one McKain held these notes. It appears that shortly before Reed sold the 65 acres to Gingell he sold the 104-acre tract and the balance of 30 acres, the remainder of the 150-acre tract purchased from the insurance company, to one John R. Hayne at the price of $2,400, of which $300 was cash, and the balance in five notes. These notes were sold and transferred by Reed to Mann Bros.

It appears from the record that all these purchasers, Larue, Gingell and Haynes, had no actual notice or knowledge of the mortgage of the insurance company upon these lands at the time they purchased, and when the insurance company enforced its mortgage lien the lower court adjudged that each of these purchasers should pay the insurance company its debt in proportion to the value of each of the tracts so purchased by them, and the parties all agreed that the court might fix the value at the prices each of them agreed to pay for the land, to wit: Larue's, $1,900; Gingell's, $2,000, and Haynes' land, $2,400, and fixed the amount Larue should pay to the insurance company at $603.44, and adjudged that he was entitled to a credit on the notes he had executed, and which were in the hands of P. H. Griffin for that amount, and gave P. H. Griffin a personal judgment against Reed for this sum, and adjudged that the Illinois Life Insurance Co., assignee of the Mutual Life Insurance Co., had a superior lien on the Haynes tract of land for the sum of $762.24, but as John R. Haynes had been discharged in bankruptcy, no judgment was given against him. It appearing that Reed had transferred the purchase money notes of Haynes to Mann Bros., it is adjudged that they have a lien inferior to the lien of the company, and directed that if Mann Bros. paid this sum of $762.24, that the company should assign its lien to Mann Bros., and they should thereafter control the sale of the Haynes land. The court also adjudged that the insurance company had a lien on the Gingell 65-acre tract for the sum of $635.20, and that Gingell then owed $347.65 as the balance of the purchase price, and that McKain held these notes. The court ordered that these notes be applied as a credit on the $635.20, leaving $237.55 due to Gingell from Reed and wife. The court gave Gingell a personal judgment against Reed for this sum, and cancelled the notes held by McKain.

It also appears from the record that Geo. L. Reed became indebted to a building and loan association in a sum in excess of $1,500, and prior to the sale to Gingell and Haynes he and his wife executed a mortgage to the building and loan association on the 65 and 104-acre tracts of land. This association brought an action against Reed and wife to enforce the mortgage lien. It appears from an order of court in that action that the association's claim was settled by Geo. L. Reed paying all of the debt except $1,350, and his wife, Millie Reed, paid this sum to the association, and took an assignment of its lien to that extent for her benefit. Millie Reed, in this action, filed her pleading, alleging these facts, and asked the court to adjudge her a lien on these two tracts of land for the payment of the sum paid by her. Gingell and other parties to this action controverted her claim, and alleged that in fact the whole of this building and loan association debt was paid by Geo. L. Reed; that she did not pay anything thereon, and that this alleged payment by and assigned to her was a fraud, and done with the intention to defraud and defeat the claims of the creditors of Geo. L. Reed.

The lower court adjudged against her, and she has appealed from that judgment. It further appears from the record that when Gingell and wife purchased the 65-acre tract of land from Geo. L. Reed, $1,000 of the purchase price was paid by a conveyance by Gingell and wife to Reed and wife of a house and lot in the city of Henderson. After this Reed purchased from the Ohio Valley Banking and Trust Co., 100 acres of land and paid part of the purchase price in cash and gave his notes for the deferred payments, and also executed to this trust company a mortgage on this house and lot in Henderson as additional security. Mann Bros. had sued Geo. L. Reed and recovered judgment against him as assignor of the Haynes land notes. Mann Bros. had execution issued on this judgment, and had it levied on this house and lot subject to the mortgage of the trust company. After this Reed and wife executed a mortgage to Yeaman & Yeaman and Givens & Givens, law firms of Henderson, on this house and lot to secure them in a reasonable fee for their services rendered and to be rendered Reed and wife in several suits pending in the Henderson Circuit Court.

Gingell and wife contend that the consideration failed to the extent of $237 that they received for this house and lot, by reason of the fact that they were compelled to pay for Reed and wife this sum, to relieve the 65-acre tract of land of the lien of the insurance company, and that they have, as between them and Reed and wife, a lien on the house and lot for that sum, and that their lien extends back to the date of their deed, and that their lien is prior to all liens on this house and lot except the lien of the Ohio Valley Bank and Trust Co.; that their lien and equity is prior to the execution lien of Mann Bros., and that the court erred in refusing them a lien on this house and lot, subject only to the lien of the trust company, and that it should have been required to exhaust its claim and lien, first against the 100 acres of land sold by it to Reed, and for the balance, allowed a lien on the house and lot.

We are of the opinion that the court erred to the prejudice of Gingell and wife. They, as between themselves and Reed and wife, had a lien on the house and lot to the extent of $287, which was subject, however, to the lien of the Ohio Valley Bank and Trust Co., and it should have been first required to exhaust the property of Reed in the 100 acres of land and then collected the balance, if any, from the proceeds of the house and lot.

In the case of Swigert v. Bank of Kentucky, 17 B. M., 226, the court said: "The doctrine is well settled that if one creditor have a lien on two funds, and another have a lien of a younger date upon one only of the two funds, the latter will have an equitable right to have the debt of the prior creditor paid out of the fund to which the lien of the latter does not extend."

This rule applies where the debtor or the person who placed a lien on the funds or the fund upon which the junior lien holder has not a lien is still the owner.

Mann Bros. have only an equity by reason of the levy of their execution on this house and lot, they having not, before notice of the equity of Gingell, perfected their lien by a sale of the property levied on and have one inferior to that of Gingell. As between mere equities, that which is prior in time is regarded as best, and takes precedence over any other which may be subsequently created. (See the case supra, page 230.)

The appellant, Millie Reed, complains because the lower court adjudged that her claim for $1,350, assigned her by the building and loan association, was dismissed. Her claim was contested on the ground that it was a fraudulent claim. By consent the proof taken and heard on the trial below was not copied and made part of the record. We have no means of knowing what the proof was upon this issue, and must presume that the proof was sufficient to authorize the lower court in deciding against her claim. The appellant, Griffin, complains at the action of the lower court in not requiring the insurance company to first exhaust the two tracts of land purchased by Haynes and Gingell before proceeding to collect any part of its claim from the tract of land sold T. C. Larue, on which he held the purchase money notes assigned him by Reed, which he became the owner of prior to the sale of the two tracts of land to Haynes and Gingell. Griffin had no lien on any land except the 130 acres sold by Reed to Larue, and if Reed had still owned the Haynes and Gingell tracts, then the court should have required the insurance company to have first sold these two tracts and looked to the Larue tract for the balance of its claim. But as Reed had sold and parted with both tracts, it was the duty of the court to require that the owner of each tract should pay the mortgage debt ratably, according to the value of the property held by each.

In the case of Diokey v. Thompson, 8 B. M., 814, this court said: "We are satisfied that the burden of the mortgage debt should not have been thrown exclusively upon the last purchasers, but should have been distributed ratably among all according to the value of the property held by each. Each of the vendees purchased absolutely, paid a full price for his purchase, and expected, no doubt, that the mortgage debt had or would be paid by the mortgagor, and that each would acquire an absolute estate in the parcel purchased. Either being disappointed, should not be made to bear the entire loss of his purchase, but only to bear the burden of the unpaid debt, equally, according to the value of the parcel acquired by him."

Griffin, prior to the sale of the two tracts of land by Reed to Haynes and Gingell, filed in the office of the county clerk of Henderson county the following notice:

"Notice is hereby given that in action numbered 599 and styled T. C. Larue v. Geo. L. Reed, in the Henderson (Kentucky) Circuit Court, the undersigned has filed a cross action affecting the right, title, claim and interest of the following persons, namely, Geo. L. Reed, M. A. Reed and T. G. Larue, in the following tracts of land in Henderson county, Kentucky, namely, one tract containing 65 acres, and the other 104½ acres and 4 poles, conveyed to Geo. L. Reed by James Miller and others by deed recorded in Deed Book No. 19, page 471, Henderson county clerk's office.

"P. H. GRIFFIN, by Attorney."

He claims that by reason of this notice a lis pendens was created, and that Haynes and Gingell were estopped by reason thereof to prevent the claim of the insurance company from being first enforced against their lands. Waiving the question as to whether or not the description of the land given in the notice was sufficient, the facts, as appear of record, are that Griffin held the Larue notes as assignee of Reed, and they were not a lien on either of the tracts sold to Haynes and Gingell, but were only a lien on the Larue tract. We are of the opinion that this did not create a lis pendens, or operate to give appellant a lien on either of the tracts, nor operate to authorize appellant Griffin to require that the Gingell and Haynes tracts of land bear the burden of the payment of the mortgage debt of the insurance company. The contention of appellant Millie Reed and Griffin, that the courts' order at its May term, 1903, in setting aside the judgment of the court rendered at the February term, 1902, was void, is not well taken, for the reason that the order to that effect was unnecessary, as the court, at the February term, 1902, when it had full and complete power over its judgments in equity, entered an order suspending the judgment, which had the effect to vacate it.

Wherefore, the judgment of the lower court is affirmed on the appeal as to Griffin and Millie Reed, and reversed on the appeal of Gingell, and remanded for further proceedings consistent herewith.

LOUISVILLE AND EVANSVILLE MAIL CO. v. CLARA BARNES' ADM'R.

(Filed March 16, 1904.)

1. Joint tort feasons—Part satisfaction by one—Liability of others—In an action against two defendants, charging joint concurring negligence, in causing the death of plaintiffs' intestate, the fact that the plaintiff, before the trial, dismissed the action without prejudice, against one of the defendants, in consideration of $1,000, paid as part compensation for the damage sought to be recovered, does not bar the plaintiff from prosecuting his suit against the other defendant for a sum sufficient to make his entire recovery full and complete.

Powers & Anderson for appellant.

G. W. Jolly and W. T. Owens for appellees.

Appeal from Davless Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

This appeal is from a judgment of the Davless Circuit Court rendered at its October term, 1902, against the appellant, Louisville and Evansville Mail Co., and in favor of John T. Barnes, administrator of Clara R. Barnes, deceased. The judgment was for $2,000.

The facts of the case as they appear of record are in substance as follows: About 11:30 o'clock on the night of the 12th of July, 1901, Clara R. Barnes lost her life by drowning in the Ohio river at Owensboro, Ky. The young lady, together with about 400 other persons, embarked early in the night on an excursion boat of the Marsden Co., called the "Fawn," with two barges attached, for a pleasure trip up the Ohio river to Rockport, Ind., and return. On the return, and for the purpose of disembarking its passengers, this steamer landed at Owensboro, Ky., at the upper end of appellant's wharf boat, the barges lying "head on" at the forward end of the wharf boat; the proof of appellee showing that the barges were properly and securely fastened to the wharf boat with a rope attaching the "Fawn" to the bank or shore to keep her from swinging out into the stream. In this situation there was no space between the barges and the wharf boat. The passengers left the barges by stepping down fifteen or sixteen inches on to the front of the wharf boat. About fifty of the passengers had disembarked when the deceased, Clara Barnes, in attempting to make this step from the barge to the wharf boat, fell between them and was drowned. According to appellee's proof this separation was caused by one of the boats of appellant coming into the wharf boat "head on," striking the wharf boat at the upper end, thereby forcing the separation at the place and the time she made her step; that this was an improper and negligent landing of the appellant's boat; that those in charge of it saw the situation of the boat and barges of the Marsden Co., and the disembarkation of its passengers. On the other hand, appellant claims that it did not make its landing in that manner, that it made a proper, easy and safe landing, and did not cause the separation of the barges and the wharf boat; that the separation was produced from some other cause; that in fact the deceased fell between the two and lost her life before appellant's boat made its landing, or even touched the wharf boat; that the deceased lost her life by reason of the negligence of the Marsden.

Co. in making an improper landing at the wharf boat, by failure of the Marsden Co. to use a stage plank for the use of the passengers to pass from the barge to the boat, or by the contributory negligence of the deceased herself in not using ordinary care for her own safety.

Appellee sued both companies, charging joint and concurring negligence, but just before the trial dismissed, without prejudice, his petition against the Marsden Co., and proceeded with the trial against the appellant. The appellant complains that the court erred in overruling its motion for a peremptory instruction to the jury at the conclusion of the evidence. In this the appellant is mistaken. There was proof introduced by many witnesses that the landing made by the appellant with its boat was a very unusual, unsafe and dangerous one, and that the force with which it struck the upper end of the wharf boat forced the separation of the boat and barge just at the moment the deceased was making her step from the one to the other and caused her death.

The appellant complains that the court failed to give a proper instruction on the question of contributory negligence on the part of the deceased. There is not anything in the record showing the slightest neglect or want of care on the part of the deceased, by which she lost her life, and if the court had failed to give any instruction on this point it would not have been prejudicial to appellant, as there was no evidence upon which to base it. Appellant also complains of the following words in the first instruction: "And if they shall further believe that said drowning was caused by the negligence in whole or in part of the defendant, Louisville and Evansville Mail Co.'s officers or servants, etc."

In the case of Louisville and Cincinnati Packet Co. v. Mulligan, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 1288, the court, in discussing an instruction with similar words embodied in it, said: "Appellee being a passenger on the 'White Dove,' and having no control over the boat, may recover of the Cincinnati, although those in charge of the 'White Dove,' were more negligent than those in charge of the Cincinnati. For the negligence of a carrier is not imputed to a passenger who is injured by the concurrent negligence of the carrier and another, and he may recover against both. (Danville, & Co. v. Stewart, 59 Ky., 119; Louisville & Co., R. R. Co. v. Caseys' Adm'r, 72 Ky., 728; 7 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law, 446, and cases cited. * * * The court, by its instructions, told the jury that both boats were governed by the same rules and regulations. * * * Also that appellant was not liable to appellee unless the plaintiff was injured by reason of the negligence in whole or in part of the officers in charge of the Cincinnati."

The court in that case approved this instruction. The most serious question involved in this case grows out of an issue made by an amended answer which was filed during the trial in the lower court, in which it was in substance alleged that the appellee had, in consideration of $1,000 paid to him by the Marsden Co., dismissed his action against the Marsden Co., this appellant's joint tortfeasor, and had accepted the $1,000 in satisfaction of his cause of action; that he had no further right to prosecute his action against this appellant. This was traversed by the appellee, and the proof introduced upon this question showed the following state of facts: The president of the Marsden Co., prior to the convening of the court when the trial was had, desired to avoid further litigation of the matter, and authorized the attorneys for the Marsden Co. to endeavor to bring about a settlement and compromise of the litigation in so far as it was concerned, and authorized them to pay as much as $1,000, if it took that much to effect a compromise, and placed this money in a bank subject to the order of its attorneys. These attorneys approached the attorneys for appellee, and made a proposition for a compromise, and eventually offered the $1,000. The attorney for the appellee refused, stating that while they believed that the Marsden Co. was possibly not liable for any negligence, at least they believed its negligence was not as great as that of appellant company's, yet they were afraid if they accepted this compromise settlement appellee's right to prosecute the action against the appellant, their joint tortfeasor, would be barred. Thus matters stood until six or seven days after verdict and judgment against appellant, when the attorneys for the Marsden Co. paid the attorneys for the appellee this money, and they immediately entered a credit upon the judgment against the appellant for this amount of $1,000.

We are convinced from all the proof in the case that there was an understanding between the attorneys for the Marsden Co. and the appellee's attorneys, prior to the trial, that this amount was to be offered and accepted and the Marsden Co. was to be released, and the case dismissed against it. And that the dismissal was in conformity with this understanding. The question to be determined is whether this operated as a release of the appellant, it being a joint tortfeasor.

Our opinion is, that if the appellee had accepted this $1,000 in satisfaction of his cause of action or claim for damages, then it would have operated as a release and a bar to any other proceeding against appellant on account thereof. But it is shown by the proof, without contradiction that it was accepted as only part satisfaction, and a release of the Marsden Co., but not in satisfaction of his cause of action and claim for damages. It is a universal rule of law that joint tortfeasors are jointly and severally liable to the injured party. He may sue any one or all at his election, but when he once receives satisfaction for the injury done him from one or more of the tortfeasors, he is barred from proceeding against the other joint tortfeasors. This is upon the idea that he is only entitled to one satisfaction, and to avoid his getting more than one compensation for his injury. There are authorities in many States which hold that any satisfaction from and a release of one joint tortfeasor, releases all. But on a close investigation of these cases, or at least the most of them, it will be found that they were cases where the proof showed that the injured parties had received full satisfaction for their injuries or cause of action. Such are the cases of Dulaney v. Buffum, 73 S. W., 125; Hubbard v. St. L. & M. R. R. Co., 72 S. W., 1078; 8 Allen, 474; 57 Cal., 270, 15 Am. Dec., 534; 102 Ga., 40, and other cases cited in these opinions. The sole reason given in these opinions for the rule as stated is that it is to prevent the injured party from receiving more than one compensation or satisfaction for his injury.

We are unable to understand why a part satisfaction and release of one tortfeasor can be considered as complete satisfaction of his claim for damages, and operate as a bar to his cause of action against the other tortfeasors. There can be no good reason for this. The collection of part satisfaction from one tortfeasor is a benefit to the others. Under the law there is no right of contribution existing between tortfeasors. The law does not look with favor upon wrongdoers, and they are unlike obligors in an ordinary contract, where the right of contribution is given. The law ought not to be that a release of one tortfeasor, by his making a partial satisfaction for the wrong done, that this should operate as a release of the other wrongdoers. The law looks with favor upon compromises and settlements. It is not the intention of the law to force people into litigation and prevent settlements out of court.

To uphold the rule contended for by appellant, such a result would follow. If ten persons commit a joint tort, and injure a person to the extent of $1,000, and if nine of them recognize that fact, and were willing to pay $100 each for the purpose of remunerating the injured party, and to avoid the expense and annoyance of litigation, and the tenth man refused to pay his $100, according to appellant the injured party could not accept the $900 in part satisfaction, and sue the stubborn tenth man. He would plead the settlement as a satisfaction and a bar. Such a construction of the law would be unreasonable and unjust. All that such a person should be allowed to take advantage of would be to require that in any judgment that should be rendered against him, it should be rendered for one satisfaction of the claim for damages less any sums that might have been paid by his joint tortfeasors as a partial satisfaction.

In the case of Ellis v. Esson, &c., 50 Wis., 153, the court said: "The contract set up in this case shows that the plaintiff did not receive the $200 from Comstock in satisfaction or as full compensation for the injury he had sustained by the trespass, and that it was not the intention to release the other joint trespassers from liability for the trespass. The plaintiff's agreement not to sue Comstock for the trespass, under the circumstances disclosed by the evidence in this case, does not, therefore, discharge the other joint trespassers except pro tanto. The court below properly rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the damages he had sustained by reason of the trespass, less the sum of $200 received of Comstock. This rule is, we think, supported by the great weight of authority, as will be seen by an examination of the large number of authorities cited" (10 N. H., 92; 8 Me., 568; 2 Vt., 209; 41 Vt., 110; 49 Vt., 823; 3 Robt., 712; 3 W. Va., 893; 22 Pick., 807; 1 Gray, 630-636; 9 Cow., 37; 38 N. J. L., 359; 15 Abb. Pr., 378; 6 Eng. Com. Law, 11, 54 Id., 551; 37 Barb., 319, and 45 Md., 60)

Again, in the same case, the court said: "Certainly the receipt of a partial satisfaction from one of two joint tortfeasors is no injury to the other who is afterwards sued for the trespass. On the other hand, it is to his benefit, as he has the advantage of what was paid by his associate in the wrong in reducing the judgment against him. The party injured is under no duty to the joint wrongdoer to proceed at all against his associate, and his refusal to proceed against him is no ground of defense. As it is wholly optional with the injured party to proceed against one or two wrongdoers for the whole of his damages, there is no equity in holding that, because he has received a part satisfaction for his injury from the one not proceeded against, upon an agreement not to sue him for the wrong, the other may set up such receipt as a complete defense to the action. He is benefitted and not injured by such proceeding."

The case of Snow v. Chandler, 10 N. H., 93, was one where Chandler and one George Holt committed an assault and battery upon Snow; Holt being a minor applied to one White to procure a settlement with Snow for the injury he had received. Snow accepted $90 as part satisfaction of his cause of action and injury, and agreed to look to Chandler for the balance of his compensation. Snow sued Chandler, and this settlement with Holt was pleaded in bar of the prosecution of the action, claiming that the release of Holt released him. The court said: "The evidence is that at the time of receiving the money from Holt the plaintiff declared that he would not settle with Chandler for $500. The substance of the arrangement betwixt the plaintiff and Holt seems to have been this, that the plaintiff was willing to receive a small portion of the damage from Holt, either for the reason that he conceived him to be less to blame than the defendant, or that he was less able to pay his proportion of the damage; and on condition of receiving this sum, the plaintiff engaged to pursue the defendant for the remainder of his claim. It is clear that the sum paid was not received in satisfaction of the damage, but only in part satisfaction; and the fact that it was coupled with the engagement not to sue Holt does not alter the case. It is still but a part satisfaction of the damage, and the plaintiff may sue or omit to sue whom he pleases, by contract or otherwise. The other trespasser has no equitable or legal claim to prevent such arrangement; he remains liable for the whole damage until satisfaction is made. If the individual receiving the injury sees fit to visit the penalty upon any one guilty individual, rather than another, such individual has no right to complain. It is part of the necessary liability that he incurs in committing the trespass, and should serve to deter him from such wrongful acts. At the same time, any partial payment by a cotrespasser avails so far for his benefit. Such was the ruling in this case. To this extent the defendant can avail himself of plaintiffs' arrangement with his cotrespasser, but there was nothing in that contract which constitutes a bar to this suit."

The case of Lovejoy v. Murray, 3 Wallace, 17, was one in which Murray had recovered judgment on a claim for damages for several thousand dollars and had received $800 thereon. He then sued the other joint wrongdoers, Lovejoy, etc., and they pleaded the judgment and Murray's acceptance of $800 thereon in bar of his right to prosecute the action against them. The case was appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States. In an opinion by Justice Miller, the court said: "But in all such cases, what has the defendant in such second suit done to discharge himself from the obligation which the law imposes upon him, to make compensation? His liability must remain, in morals and on principle, until he does this. The judgment against his cotrespasser does not affect him so as to release him on any equitable consideration. It may be said that neither does the satisfaction by his cotrespasser, or a release to his cotrespasser, do this; and that is true. But when the plaintiff has accepted satisfaction in full for the injury done to him, from whatever source it may come, he is so far affected in equity and good conscience that the law will not permit him to recover again for the same damages. But it is not easy to see how he is so affected, until he has received full satisfaction, or that which the law must consider as such. We are, therefore, of opinion that nothing short of satisfaction, or its equivalent, can make good a plea of former judgment in trespass, offered as a bar in an action against another joint trespasser, who was not party to the first judgment."

In the case of Bloss v. Plymale, &c., 3 W. Va., 409, the court said: "As the cause of action is against all the joint trespassers, the plaintiff may sue all or either of them at his election; and he is entitled to full satisfaction, but he is entitled to but one satisfaction. So where there are different findings in the same verdict when all the trespassers are sued, the successful party must choose de melloribus damnis, he can not claim to collect all. It follows then if the damages are satisfied in part by payment or compromise with some of the defendants, the plaintiff may still proceed against those who remain in the record. And in such case it was but right and proper that the jury should deduct in their finding whatever sum the plaintiff had already received on account of the alleged trespasses from any of the joint parties, who were afterwards dismissed. This would be the just application of the rule that there can not be a double remuneration for the same wrong."

We have been unable to find where the precise question before us has been considered or passed upon by this court, but the trend of the cases seem to support the conclusion at which we have arrived. The two cases of 1 A. K. M., 433, and Id., 458, in effect decide that in suits on tort, where several are liable, nothing short of a full satisfaction from one will be a bar to further proceedings against the other joint tortfeasors.

In the case of the United Society of Shakers v. Underwood, &c., 11 Bush, 272, this court quoted with approval the quotation above from Lovejoy v. Murray, supra, and then said: "It thus appears that while the plaintiff may maintain separate actions and recover separate judgments against joint trespassers, and may elect to take the largest sum assessed, or to proceed against the solvent defendant, or, in case no one of them is able or can be compelled to pay the whole of the judgment rendered against him, may accept part satisfaction from one and still look to the others for such balance as may be necessary to give him full legal compensation for the wrong suffered, yet ordinarily, when he has made his election, he will be concluded by it. The collection of one judgment extinguishes the entire claim for damages."

In the case of Sellards, &c. v. Zomes, 5 Bush, 91, the court said: "The liability of joint trespassers is several, and any one or all of them may be sued for the entire wrong; consequently, since our statute of 1886, authorizing several judgments, a dismissal or release of one or more who are sued can not, per se, release the others."

In view of the fact that the $1,000 received from the Marsden Co. was received only as part satisfaction of appellee's cause of action, and not in full satisfaction thereof, the appellee was not barred from proceeding further against appellant.

Wherefore, the judgment of the lower court is affirmed, with damages.

WILLIAMS V. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed March 17, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Criminal law—Practice—The Commonwealth has the right to introduce evidence after a plea of guilty has been entered.

2. Section 174 of the Criminal Code, providing that "at any time before judgment the court may permit the plea of guilty to be withdrawn, and a plea of not guilty substituted," it was error in a prosecution for the trial court to refuse to permit the withdrawal of such plea upon the conclusion of the testimony for the Commonwealth.

John M. Letterle and M. Barnett for appellant.

N. B. Hays and Loraine Mix for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Criminal Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

The indictment charges the appellant with the offense of attempting to commit rape upon an infant under twelve years of age, and upon a plea of guilty the jury fixed his punishment at confinement in the penitentiary for a period of twenty years. After the indictment had been returned the appellant, on the 20th day of September, 1903, was brought into court and plead not guilty to the charge. The case was assigned for the 20th of October for trial, and on that day the appellant withdrew his plea of not guilty, and entered one of guilty. At that point in the proceedings Mr. Goldsmith, representing the Commonwealth, announced his intention to introduce evidence notwithstanding a plea of guilty thereupon. The court stated that it had not been customary on pleas of guilty to introduce evidence in that court. The court then asked appellant if he desired to plead guilty, whereupon he replied in the negative. The appellant then withdrew with his attorneys, and upon returning to the court room his counsel withdrew the plea of not guilty, and he entered a plea of guilty. After the Commonwealth had introduced its testimony the appellant moved to withdraw his plea of guilty, and enter one of not guilty. The court refused to permit it to be done.

Section 174, Criminal Code of Practice, provides: "At any time before judgment the court may permit the plea of guilty to be withdrawn, and a plea of not guilty substituted."

Under this provision of the Code the court was authorized to permit the appellant to withdraw his plea of guilty and allow the plea of not guilty to be substituted. The appellant was evidently induced to change his plea from not guilty to guilty upon the idea that the court would require the Commonwealth to observe the custom prevailing in that court, not to allow the introduction of evidence on a plea of guilty. The Commonwealth had the right to introduce evidence after the plea of guilty had been entered. (Mounts v. Commonwealth, 89 Ky., 278.) In view of the circumstances under which the plea of guilty was entered, we are of the opinion that the court erred in not allowing the appellant to withdraw the plea of guilty and substituting a plea of not guilty.

The judgment is reversed for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

RHODES, &c. v. THE FRANKFORT CHAIR CO.

(Filed March 17, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Jurisdiction—Appeals—By section 850, Kentucky Statutes, an appeal will not lie to the Court of Appeals where the value in controversy is less than $200 exclusive of interest and costs, and the fact that $25 was allowed the commissioner in this action does not affect the amount in controversy, such amount being part of the costs of the action.

Thos. E. Ward for appellants.

Yeaman & Yeaman for appellee.

Appeal from Henderson Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

Deducting credits entered previous to January 1, 1900, and one on that day, the judgment is for $192.17, with interest from January 1, 1900. An attachment was sued out and levied upon real estate, and the court in passing on the attachment when the judgment was rendered put therein the following provision: "It is adjudged that the attachment herein be, and the same is, sustained, and on plaintiff's motion the lien created thereby is waived."

On the threshold we are confronted with the question, has the court jurisdiction to revise the judgment?

Section 950, Kentucky Statutes, provides: "No appeal shall be taken to the Court of Appeals from a judgment for the recovery of money or personal property, if the value in controversy be less than $200, exclusive of interest and cost."

The recovery in this case is less than $200, and the statute provides that the court can not revise the judgment where the recovery of money is less than $200. It is, however, suggested that as there was a judgment for $25 for costs allowed the commissioner of the court, that amount should be added to the $192.17, and the sum being greater than $200, the court has jurisdiction. The answer to that suggestion is, that the amount allowed the commissioner of the court is part of the cost of the action, the same as the sheriff's and clerk's costs, and under the statute costs are to be excluded. The title to land is not involved, because the plaintiff declined to have the lien enforced which was created by the levy of the attachment. The court did not decree a lien existed and enter an order that it should be enforced. The effect of the order was to say that the plaintiff had sustained its grounds for an attachment (the attachment was obtained upon the ground that the defendants were nonresidents, and they did not controvert it), but the plaintiff declined to have its right enforced. The title to the land is not involved, and no order was entered as to the attachment from which an appeal could be prosecuted, as no relief was given by virtue thereof. If personal property was seized under an order of attachment of less value than $200, the action of the court in sustaining or discharging the attachment could not be brought here for review. It is urged that the plaintiff abated its judgment with a view of depriving this court of its jurisdiction. The only judgment it could have had which would have been effective would have been a judgment giving a lien and ordering its enforcement. As no such judgment was entered there was no abatement.

The motion to dismiss the appeal is sustained.

MULLINS v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed March 17, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Criminal law—Presumption—Where there was no objection at the time made to a statement of a Commonwealth's attorney as to what he would prove on the trial, and no proof adduced as was referred to in the statement, it will be presumed that the jury disregarded the statements which were not substantiated by evidence.

2. Same—Evidence—Where no shots were heard from the point where deceased was found dead, and accused shortly after the homicide stated that he believed he had killed deceased, and when asked how, stated that he had knocked his brains out, and deceased was found lying in the road with his skull crushed and a broken shotgun lying near his body, a plea of self-defense was overthrown.

Coyle & Clark for appellant.

N. B. Hays and Loraine Mix for appellee.

Appeal from Jackson Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

Appellant was indicted for the murder of James Singleton. When the case was called for trial at the September term of the court the defendant filed an affidavit stating that after the last May term of the court he had been convicted in the Rockcastle Circuit Court on another indictment, and sentenced to the penitentiary for nine years for manslaughter; that he had been confined in the penitentiary until brought out to attend his trial in Jackson county, and had, therefore, been unable to prepare his case; that he could prove by twelve witnesses who were absent, and who had been subpoenaed for him at the May term, facts material to his defense. On the filing of this affidavit the court set the case over to the tenth day of the term. Four of the witnesses referred to were convicts in the penitentiary; the court ordered them brought out. The court also appointed a special bailiff and sent after the other witnesses named in the affidavit. When the case was called on the tenth day of the term all the witnesses named in the affidavit were present except William Robinson, Ambrose Williams and Greeley Mize, Williams being returned as in Ohio, and Robinson that he could not be found. The defendant then filed an affidavit for a continuance because of the absence of Henry Hellard, Isaac Lainhart and Walter Mullins, the two last not having been summoned. The court overruled the motion for a continuance, but allowed the affidavit to be read as the deposition of Greeley Mize and Henry Hellard, refusing to allow it to be read as the deposition of the other witnesses. Of this action of the court appellant complains.

In stating his case to the jury the attorney for the State said that the Commonwealth would be able to show to the jury that the deceased was an important witness against defendant in the Rockcastle Circuit Court, where defendant was charged with murder, and that defendant had killed Singleton in order to get him out of the way as a witness; that the proof would be such that the jury would have no trouble in bringing in a verdict of death against the defendant. No objection was made to the statement at the time, and no proof of this sort was made on the trial. In his grounds for new trial the defendant assigned this statement as a reason for the verdict being set aside.

The proof on the trial showed that the deceased, Singleton, was working for Mullins in Jackson county, getting out timber; that they both boarded there in the same house, and were friendly; that a few days before the homicide they both went to their homes in Rockcastle county, Singleton riding one of Mullins' mules, which he lent him. After they reached home Mullins lent him the mule to haul wood. They started back together from Rockcastle county. On the way they bought a quart of moonshine whisky, and stopped at another place and bought three bottles of bitters. After this they stopped again to warn; both were drinking. It was now after night, and some time later a man living on the roadside heard some shots to the west of his house. A while after this Mullins appeared at the house where he boarded and said he believed he had killed Singleton. They asked him how. He answered he had knocked his brains out. He ate his supper, and then, with three other men from the house, went back to where Singleton was. As they came along that evening Mullins had a shotgun and Singleton a pistol. When they got back to where Singleton was they found him lying in the road, dead, with the pistol empty near him, and the shotgun, broken at the breech, also lying nearby. He had a fracture of the skull over the right eye, and another on the upper part of the head. From the signs on the shotgun these wounds were inflicted with it. Mullins' statement was that as they were going along, Singleton having his gun, which was empty, began shooting at him, and he then wrenched the gun from him, and knocked him down with it. The evidence failed to show previous malice, but the jury were warranted in concluding that a quarrel came up between them, and that Mullins had killed Singleton in the quarrel, due to their both being drunk. No shots were heard from the point where Singleton was found dead, and the circumstances did not sustain Mullins' plea of self-defense. The witnesses who heard the shots locate them in a different direction from that where Singleton was found.

The witness, William Robinson, as stated in the affidavit, would, if present, have testified to the bad character of Singleton for violence, and of one Alex. Allen for truthfulness. But the character of Singleton was shown by a number of other witnesses, and there was no effort on the part of the Commonwealth to show the contrary. Alex. Allen was not introduced as a witness on the trial. Ambrose Williams was one of the men who went back that night with Mullins to where Singleton lay. There were four or five other men along who were introduced on the trial, and testified to the same facts as proposed to be shown by him; besides, this witness was in Ohio. The witnesses, Lainhart and Mullins, were not included in the first affidavit, no subpoena had been issued for them, and no reason was shown for the apparent want of diligence as to them. We, therefore, conclude that the court correctly ruled as to these matters.

The statement of the prosecuting attorney as to what he expected to prove was perhaps based on evidence that he was misled about. At any rate, there was no exception, and it must be presumed that the jury disregarded statements made by the attorneys in opening the case which were not substantiated by the evidence. We can not reverse for a matter of this sort unless it is affirmatively shown that there was misconduct on the part of the attorney prejudicing the substantial rights of the defendant. This does not appear. It is only shown that the attorney said that he would prove more than he did prove on the trial, which is often the case in jury trials.

On the cross-examination of Cleo Mullins, a witness for the Commonwealth, the defendant's attorney asked her if she did not steal a lot of clothing on one occasion from P. C. Hoskins. The court sustained an objection to this question. There is no avowal as to what she would have stated; the exception is, therefore, not available. The defendant also offered to prove by an officer that he had arrested her for the offense referred to. This evidence was properly excluded. A witness can not be impeached in this way.

The court limited the argument of the case to an hour and a half on a side. Considering the nature of the evidence, and the few facts on which the case turns, this was not an unreasonable limit of time for arguing it to the jury. The instructions of the court are not complained of, and on the whole case we see no reason for disturbing the verdict.

Judgment affirmed.

KENTUCKY DISTILLERIES AND WAREHOUSE CO. v. LEONARD.

(Filed March 17, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Damages—Instructions—In an action for damages for personal injuries against the appellant by the appellee, who was employed as foreman by the Ansonia Copper and Sheet Iron Works Co., which company had a contract with appellant to make certain repairs upon its distillery, the facts showing that appellee having a receipt for board which he desired to deliver to the acting superintendent of the distillery, and also to order some bolts which he needed in his work, not finding the superintendent at the office, went upon the second floor of the warehouse and in coming down on the elevator with four barrels of whisky, a rope giving way the elevator fell, injuring him, which injuries are the basis of this action. Held—In this action the court should have instructed the jury "that if the jury shall believe from the evidence that plaintiff, while in the employ of the Ansonia Copper and Sheet Iron Works, and while engaged for it in the repairing of defendant's distillery plant, it became necessary, as an incident to said employment, to use the defendant's elevator, and while using the same, with ordinary care for his own safety, said elevator fell and injured plaintiff by reason of the defective condition of its appliances, of which he had no knowledge and of which he could not have known by the use of ordinary care, and which was known to the defendant," * * * they should find for him in such damages as sustained not to exceed the sum sued for.

2. Same—In action to recover damages resulting from injury on going into a warehouse, instructions were erroneous which permitted a recovery without regard to plaintiff's right to be in the warehouse.

D. W. Lindsey, Joyes & Jarvis and Morton V. Joyes for appellant.

B. G. Williams for appellee.

Appeal from Franklin Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

Appellant owns the Saffell Distillery, situated about one mile south of Frankfort. The property consists of a distillery, a warehouse and an office building, all on the same premises and within a short distance of each other. After appellant bought the property it began to repair it, and made a contract with the Ansonia Copper and Sheet Iron works Co. to make certain repairs on the pipes, stills, worms, etc. Appellee Leonard was the foreman of the copper works in the employment of the Ansonia Co. Appellant paid the board of appellee and his crew, delivering to him the checks to the boarding-house keeper weekly, and requiring him every Monday morning to deliver to it the receipt which he had taken for the board. James Saffell was the superintendent of the distillery for appellant; but he being away for a large part of the time, Linton Tanner acted as superintendent in his absence. When anything was needed in the way of material Leonard would apply to Saffell, or, in Saffell's absence, to Tanner. In passing from the distillery to the office he would pass by the warehouse. On the Monday morning in question Saffell was not at the distillery, and Tanner, as usual, was there. Leonard had the receipt from the boarding-house keeper, which it was his duty to deliver to appellant. He and his men were at work in the distillery; some small bolts were needed in the work; Leonard went up to the office to deliver the boarding house keeper's receipt and to order the bolts, and not finding either Saffell or Tanner there, he came back by the warehouse and inquired where Tanner was. He was informed that Tanner was up stairs on the second floor of the warehouse. The only means of going up to the second floor of the warehouse was by means of an elevator, or by climbing up a post to which some strips were nailed, and going through the elevator hole on the second floor. The elevator was used to carry whisky up and down, and also by the hands, or any one having occasion to go up in the warehouse. They climbed the post when the elevator was not running. Leonard went up on the elevator, which was in charge of Tanner, and operated by him. When he reached the second floor he gave the receipt to Tanner, made the requisition for the bolts, got a drink of whisky, and got on the elevator to go down. There were four barrels of whisky on the elevator, and as it was lowered the ropes gave way, precipitating Leonard and the whisky to the basement. By the fall his ankle was seriously injured. The plaintiff's proof showing these facts, the court overruled appellant's motion for a peremptory instruction to the jury to find for it, and the case being submitted to the jury, they found for the plaintiff a verdict for $1,500.

The proof for the defendant was to the effect that Leonard was drinking heavily on Saturday night, and though sober Monday morning, wanted very much a drink of whisky, and went up in the warehouse to get a drink of whisky. It was conceded that he gave Tanner the receipt while there, but the defendant's proof was that this should have been given to Saffell, and not to Tanner, and that he made no requisition on Tanner for the bolts; also that Tanner was only a foreman of the hands in Saffell's absence, and had nothing to do with Leonard; that the bolts were really on hand; that there was a sign at the bottom of the elevator "Keep Off," and that one of the men at the top told Leonard not to get on.

While there was some conflict in the evidence, the proof warranted the jury in concluding that the rope which held up the elevator was old and rotten and the pulleys out of order; that the rope was frazzled and insecure, and that the insecure condition of the elevator was known, or might have been known, by ordinary care on the part of the defendant. The proof also as to the severity and permanent character of the plaintiff's injuries warranted a recovery for $1,500, if he was entitled to recover at all. While the evidence was conflicting as to the extent of Tanner's authority in Saffell's absence, the proof for the plaintiff warranted a submission of the case to the jury, for if the facts shown by the plaintiff were true, Tanner was acting as superintendent in Saffell's absence, and as Saffell was absent so large a part of the time, and the business was done in this way, appellant must be deemed under the facts shown by the proof to have held Tanner out as having this authority. Tanner was operating the elevator himself. He saw Leonard come up on the elevator, and if he allowed Leonard to get on the elevator to go down, it can not be said that Leonard was using the elevator without the defendant's consent. The elevator was evidently used to carry both the whisky and persons having business in the warehouse from one floor to another, the hands often going down on it with the whisky; but at the time in question there were other hands below to receive the whisky, and there was no one on the elevator but Leonard when it fell. Leonard denied that he was warned not to get on the elevator, and also denied that he got on it after it started, as shown by the defendant. Leonard had not been in the warehouse before, and knew nothing of the condition of things there. At the conclusion of the evidence the plaintiff asked the following instruction, which was objected to by the defendant, and refused by the court:

"1st. The court instructs the jury that if they shall believe from the evidence that the plaintiff while in the employ of the Ansonia Copper and Sheet Iron Works, and while engaged for it in the repairing of defendant's distillery plant, it became necessary for him, as an incident to said employment, to use the defendant's elevator, and while using same with ordinary care for his own safety, said elevator fell and injured the plaintiff by reason of the defective condition of its appliances, of which he had no knowledge and of which he could not have known by the use of ordinary care, and which was known by the defendant, or could have been known to it by the exercise of ordinary care, in time to have prevented said injury, they shall find for the plaintiff such sum in damages as will reasonably compensate him for the injury sustained by said fall, not to exceed the sum of $3,000."

The defendant asked the following instruction, which was objected to by the plaintiff, and refused by the court:

"A. Unless the jury believe from the evidence that plaintiff, at the time he received his injuries, was in defendant's warehouse on the second floor thereof, in the necessary performance of service for which he was employed by defendant or its contractor, the Ansonia Copper and Sheet Iron Works, and that the elevator, when loaded with four barrels of whisky, was the proper means of descent from the second floor to the first floor, and said elevator, or its mechanical appliances, was in a dangerous or defective condition, and that such condition was known to defendant, its agents or employees superior in authority to plaintiff, or could have been known to them by the exercise of ordinary diligence, and was not known to plaintiff, or could not have been known to him by the exercise of ordinary diligence, and by reason of such defective or dangerous condition said elevator fell, thereby causing plaintiff's injuries, and that there was no caution or warning printed or written on said elevator directing persons to keep off, which was seen by plaintiff, or might have been seen by him by the use of ordinary care, and that the plaintiff did not by his own negligence so far contribute to his own injuries that but for such negligence on his part he would not have been injured; they shall find for defendant."

The court of its own motion gave the jury the following instructions:

"1st. If the jury believe from the evidence that the plaintiff was by the carelessness and negligence of the defendant, or by its authorized agents or employes, injured by the fall of the elevator in the defendant's whisky warehouse, they ought to find for the plaintiff, unless they further believe from the evidence that the plaintiff by his own negligence contributed to his own injury, and in which case they ought to find for the defendant.

"2d. If the jury believe from the evidence that the plaintiff went to the defendant's warehouse and was permitted by the superintendent of said warehouse to use said elevator, when said superintendent knew, or by the exercise of ordinary care could have known, that said elevator was unsafe for use, they ought to find for the plaintiff, unless they further believe from the evidence that the plaintiff knew, or by the exercise of ordinary care could have known, that the same was unsafe, and in which case they ought to find for the defendant.

"3d. If the jury believe from the evidence that the plaintiff got aboard of said elevator while the same was being lowered with its usual load of freight without the knowledge of the party operating said elevator, or if they believe from the evidence that at or about the time he boarded said elevator he was warned by any of the defendant's employes not to get on said elevator, and not heeding said warning, if any, they ought to find for defendant."

Appellant complains of the charge of the court because it fails to submit to the jury the question whether Leonard was using the elevator in the necessary performance of the service for which he was employed, and makes the defendant liable if he was permitted by the superintendent to use it when the superintendent knew, or by the exercise of ordinary care could have known, that the elevator was unsafe. It also complains that the court did not give the instruction asked by it.

(The instruction asked by defendant, among other things, required the jury to find for the defendant if there was a warning printed or written on the elevator directing persons to keep off, which was seen by plaintiff, or might have been seen by him by the use of ordinary care. There would be more force in the position that the defendant would not in this event be responsible if Leonard had been hurt on the upward trip, before the superintendent knew he was thus using the elevator. But when he reached the top and the superintendent knew of his use of the elevator, and knew of his getting on it to go down, it can not escape liability because of the warning printed on the elevator, for the reason that the defendant might waive the restriction, and it can not be allowed to consent to the use of the elevator by Leonard, and then to escape liability because it had a printed warning on it for persons to keep off.) Besides, we think the printed warning properly meant for all persons to keep off except those allowed by the defendant to use the elevator, for the proof clearly shows that the elevator was used by the hands or other persons having occasion to go up in the second story. The instruction, therefore, would have misled the jury, and was properly refused.

If the plaintiff went up in the warehouse for his own purposes, and not as an incident to his employment, the defendant owed him no duty to keep its elevator safe for his use. The elevator was not intended to carry passengers, but only freight and those having business in the warehouse in the discharge of their duties. If the plaintiff was not in the warehouse pursuant to the course of his employment, or on business incidental thereto, he had no right there at all, and the defendant owed him no duty except to avoid injuring him after his danger was perceived. The foreman's allowing him to get on the elevator to go down did not create an obligation on the part of defendant to have the elevator safe. There was no express or implied invitation for him to use the elevator unless he was in the warehouse in the course of his employment. We, therefore, conclude that in lieu of the first and second instructions given by the court, the first instruction asked by the plaintiff should have been given, and instruction A. asked by the defendant should have been given with the omission of the following words: "When loaded with four barrels of whisky;" also these words: "And that there was no caution or warning printed or written on said elevator directing persons to keep off, which was seen by plaintiff, or might have been seen by him by the use of ordinary care."

Instruction A. thus modified should have been given in lieu of No. 3, given by the court. For if the plaintiff was in the line of his duty in the use of the elevator, the defendant owed him the duty to exercise ordinary care to keep it safe, and the fact that one of the hands said to him not to get on would be only a fact to be considered with the other facts in the case in determining whether the plaintiff exercised ordinary care, for this hand was not in charge of the elevator, and the conduct of the foreman who was present must be considered in connection with the way the elevator was loaded and the other facts in determining whether the plaintiff was negligent in getting on the elevator as he did.

The instructions given by the court were erroneous in permitting a recovery by the plaintiff without regard to his right to be in the warehouse, if he was permitted to come down on the elevator. And although the defendant objected to the instruction which the plaintiff asked, the same idea was embodied in instruction A., which it asked. The case was tried by the jury on an issue which did not control the result.

The judgment is, therefore, reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

LOUISVILLE & NASHVILLE R. R. CO. v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed March 17, 1904—Not to be reported.)

C. J. Waddill and B. D. Warfield for appellant.

John L. Grayot and N. B. Hays for appellee.

Appeal from Hopkins Circuit Court.

Judge Barker delivered the following response to petition for rehearing

Although the statute provides no penalty for its violation, it forbids the obstruction of the street for more than five minutes, by trains or cars. The city council could not, by ordinance, legalize what the statute forbids; and the ordinance was, therefore, incompetent, as evidence on behalf of the defendant. The only question to be determined is, did the defendant obstruct the highway with its train of cars for an unreasonable time? It is a common law proceeding, and is to be tried on common law principles, without regard to the provisions of the statute, or the ordinance referred to (Illinois Central R. R. Co. v. Commonwealth, 20 Ky. Law Rep., 115), except that no obstruction for less than five minutes is unlawful.

Petition overruled.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK, &c. v. LOUISVILLE & NASHVILLE R. R. CO.

(Filed March 17, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Railroads—Bonds—Where a railroad company was proceeded against for not keeping a roadbed in order, pursuant to the terms of a certain lease, and judgment recovered against it, it is entitled to recover its pro rata on bonds which it holds; and the fact as to whether the suit was brought in the name of the trustee for all the bondholders, or under section 25 of the Code of Practice, is not material; and the fact that it denied the breach and resisted the action did not preclude it from sharing in the bonds of the leased road.

Simrall & Doolan and W. S. Pryor for appellants.

Helm, Bruce & Helm for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery Branch, First Division.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

The Louisville & Nashville R. R. Co. allege in their petition in this case that A. L. Schmidt, as trustee of the bondholders of the northern division of the Cumberland & Ohio R. R. Co., recovered a judgment against it in the Shelby Circuit Court for failure to keep its roadbed in order, as required by the terms of a certain lease; and that in satisfaction of this judgment, they paid to Schmidt, as trustee, $29,796.24 that Schmidt deducted from this sum the cost and expense incident to the prosecution of the suit, and deposited the balance in the First National Bank of Louisville to the credit of Clint McClarty, as trustee, for a pro rata distribution to the owners of the bonds, two hundred and fifty in number. It further alleges that it is the owner of twenty of the bonds, which it presented to McClarty at the bank and demanded their pro rata which the defendant refused to pay, for which they pray judgment.

The defendants answered in three paragraphs. In the first they deny that the suit was instituted by Schmidt as trustee for all the bondholders of the northern division of the Cumberland & Ohio R. R. Co.; but in his own right and for other bondholders of the Cumberland & Ohio, having a common interest with him, under section 25 of the Civil Code; second, they deny plaintiff's right to recover for the reason that their breach of contract, occasioned the litigation in which the judgment was rendered. In the third, they plead that it was the duty of the railroad company to have set up their claim in the former suit. A general demurrer was sustained to each paragraph of the answer, and defendant's declining to plead further, judgment was rendered for plaintiff in accordance with the prayer of their petition, and the defendants have appealed. It is immaterial whether the suit was instituted in the name of Schmidt as trustee for all the holders, or was brought under section 25 of the Code. In either case it was prosecuted for the benefit of all the bondholders, and the mere fact that plaintiff denied the alleged breach of contract and resisted recovery in the former suit, did not preclude them from asserting claim for their pro rata of the recovery on the bonds held by them. And it seems to us that defendants have no right to complain because they paid the entire judgment and only asked for their pro rata after the payment of the cost and expense of the litigation instead of pleading such ownership in the former suit. In that case they denied all liability, and certainly could not, in advance, have determined what the amount of the recovery of the cost and expense incident to the litigation would be. We, therefore, conclude that the trial court properly sustained a demurrer to the answer.

Judgment affirmed.

HUNT v. KENTUCKY WESTERN RY. CO.

(Filed March 17, 1904—Not to be reported.)

M. C. & G. D. Givens for appellant.

J. M. Dickinson, Pirtle & Trabue and W. E. Bourland for appellee.

Appeal from Webster Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

The issues involved on this appeal are substantially as were those in Curry v. Kentucky Western Ry. Co., &c. (opinion delivered February 3, 1904), and Page v. Southern Construction Co., &c., ante, 1634, and by the authority of the opinions delivered in those cases at the present term, the judgment is affirmed.

MUTUAL LIFE INS. CO. OF N. Y. v. LUCAS.

(Filed March 18, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Insurance—Where an application for a life insurance policy contained the provision that the insurance should not take effect until the first premium shall be paid during the continuance of the good health of the applicant, and the applicant was killed before the delivery of the policy, to wit, on June 18, 1903, in an action upon the policy by the personal representative of the deceased, where it appeared that the agent without authority of the company agreed with the applicant that if he would take the insurance he would hold the policy until the 1st of July, when one-half of the premium should be paid and that his note would be taken for the remaining half, such agreement was not sufficient to waive prepayment, but was only an agreement to hold policy until the 1st of July, and then deliver upon condition that half of the premium be paid and a note executed for the remainder and this contingency, never happening, the policy never became effective.

Grubbs & Grubbs and Field McLeod for appellant.

W. O. Davis and B. G. Williams for appellee.

Appeal from Woodford Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

On the 22d day of May, 1903, William P. Lucas, of Midway, applied on one of appellant's printed blanks through their local agent, C. W. Parrish, for a policy of insurance on his life for $1,000, payable at his death to the appellee, Mary E. Lucas. The application contained this provision: "I hereby agree that all the following statements and answers, and all those I make to the company's medical examiners, in continuation of this application, are by me warranted to be true, and are offered to the company as consideration of the contract, which I hereby agree to accept, and which shall not take effect until the first premium shall have been paid during my continuance in good health, and the policy shall have been signed by the secretary of the company and issued."

This application was forwarded to the home office of the company, and about the first day of June a policy issued in conformity to the application reached the hands of the local soliciting agent, Parrish, to be delivered to the applicant upon the payment by him of the first annual premium of $38.56. Before the delivery of this policy, or the payment of the first premium due thereon, the insured, Lucas, was killed on the 15th of June, 1903. Thereupon the policy was, at the request of the company, returned to them by Parrish, the local agent, and cancelled. Subsequently the appellee, Mary E. Lucas, offered to pay the premium, made the usual proofs of the death of the insured, and upon appellant's failure to pay, instituted this suit for the recovery of the amount of the policy, and alleges by way of avoidance of the provision of the policy "that it should not take effect until the first premium had been paid during the continuance in good health," that at the time the contract was entered into between the insured and G. W. Parrish, acting for the company, that it was agreed that the first premium of $38.56, should be paid on the 1st of July, 1903, but that the insurance should take effect and be in force from the 22d day of May, 1903, and that the policy was issued by the defendant in accordance with this agreement, and dated on the 22d of May, 1903, the day on which the application was made, and the agreement made with the local agent, and that the policy was issued pursuant to this agreement, and transmitted to Parrish for delivery to the insured. Demurrer was filed to this petition, which was overruled. Thereupon an answer was filed to this petition, which denied the alleged agreement with Parrish, and relied upon the conditions of the policy hereinbefore recited, and further alleged that C. W. Parrish was a mere soliciting agent, and had no authority to waive the conditions as to the payment of the first premium, and the delivery of the policy during the continuance in good health of the insured. The issues were made up by reply, traversing the affirmative allegations of the answer, and alleging that the delivery of the policy to Parrish was in effect a delivery to Lucas. The trial court held the company liable, and they have appealed.

To support their contention that C. W. Parrish, the local soliciting agent of the company, had waived the provisions of the policy relied on to defeat recovery, he was introduced by plaintiff, and testified in substance that previous to the 22d of May, 1903, he had solicited Lucas to take out the policy; that Lucas objected to doing so because he had no money to pay the first annual premium of $38.56, and would not have until he collected his salary from the government on the 1st of July thereafter; and that it would not suit him to pay more than one-half of the premium in cash at that time; that he, "Parrish," then proposed that if he would make his application for the policy and it was issued by the company and sent to him for delivery, that he would hold it for him, until the 1st day of July; and that at that time, he could pay one half the first premium in cash and give a note for the balance; that Lucas accepted this proposition, and made his application, which was duly forwarded by him to the general agency of the company in Louisville, and thence to the office of the company in New York, and the policy issued thereon, which was returned to him for the collection of the premium and delivery of the policy about the 1st of June thereafter. The witness testified that the company had no knowledge of this agreement on his part with Lucas; that he had frequently made similar agreements in order to procure insurance, and had himself paid the first premium to the company before he had received it from the insured; that whilst Lucas was insolvent, he was getting a salary from the government, and his impression was then that if Lucas had requested it, he would have taken his note at the date of the application for the entire amount of the premium and receipted therefor, and delivered the policy, but that he had not done so because the agreement between them only called for the delivery of the policy upon the payment in cash of one-half the premium on the 1st of July. It also appears from his testimony that local agents were permitted to hold policies as much as sixty days. The testimony of Parrish does not, in our opinion, establish an agreement to waive the prepayment of the first premium but only shows an agreement to hold the policy for the insured until the 1st day of July, and then to deliver it upon the condition that he paid one-half the first premium in cash and executed his note for the balance. If he had relied solely upon the promise of Lucas to pay on the 1st day of July, there was no reason why the policy was not delivered when Lucas came and examined it after its arrival and before his death.

This court has in a number of cases decided that where a local agent accepted a note in payment of the first premium due upon the policy, and the policy itself was delivered to the insured, that this was a waiver of the conditions of the policy as to payment in cash, and was binding upon the company. (National Life Ins. Co. v. Tweddell, 29 Ky. Law Rep., 881.) They have also held that where the agent of a life insurance company collected the premium in cash at the date of the application and issued a receipt therefor, stipulating for insurance from the date of the receipt, that the contract of insurance was completed by the approval of the application, and a recovery could be had although the policy was not actually delivered to the beneficiary prior to his death. (Lee v. Union Mutual Central Life Insurance Co., 19 Ky. Law Rep., 608.) The facts of this case do not bring it within the rule of either class of cases. Here there was neither a payment of the premium or a delivery of the policy; but a mere naked agreement to hold and deliver the policy upon condition that one-half of the premium was paid in cash and a note executed for the remainder. It seems to us that this case falls within the rule announced in the St. Louis Life Insurance Co. v. Kennedy's Adm'r, 69 Ky., 450, and Dickerson's Adm'r v. Pruential Savings Life Assurance Co., &c., 21 Ky. Law Rep., 611, and the Mutual Life Ins. Co. of New York v. Sinclair, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 1543.

Being of the opinion that the testimony wholly fails to support the conclusions reached by the lower court, the judgment is reversed and cause remanded for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

ALBIN CO. v CITY OF LOUISVILLE.

(Filed March 18, 1904.)

Taxes—Board of Equalization—Constitutional law—In an action by appellee to collect taxes of appellant the contention that section 135 of the Constitution was violated because the Board of Equalization acted as a legislative court, was not sustained. A board of equalization which passes on the question of the value of property listed for taxation with power to approve, or increase the same or decrease it is not a legislative court.

H. M. Lane and A. T. Burgevin for appellant.

H. L. Stone for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery Branch, First Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

This was a suit by the appellee to recover taxes upon personal property of appellant for the years 1895, 1896 and 1897. The following defenses were presented: First, a traverse denying the authenticity of the tax bills. The city proved the authenticity of the bills by its assessor, and, under the charter, a prima facie case was thus made out, which was not overcome by the defendant. (Section 2996 of the Kentucky Statutes, and 95 Ky., 254.)

The appellant, by the second paragraph of its answer, averred that it handed in, to the city assessor, schedules of its property subject to assessment for city taxes for the years 1894, 1895 and 1896, which schedules were brought by the assessor before the Board of Equalization of the city, and the board rejected the schedules so furnished by the appellant, and arbitrarily fixed the amount of taxes which the appellant should pay. It is nowhere alleged in the answer, nor in any pleading, what was the value of this property as contained in these schedules for each of the years, nor is it alleged that these schedules were sworn to before the assessor or one of his assistants, as required by section 2983 of the Kentucky Statutes.

The reply denies that any schedule of any kind was handed to the city assessor or to one of his assistants by the appellant, or any one for it, for any of these years. We are of the opinion that the defense on this point was insufficient; but admitting its sufficiency, it appears that appellant never complained to the assessor, but appeared before the Board of Equalization, upon notice from the board, concerning the tax for 1896 only. The board raised the valuation after hearing the appellant. It is true that appellant claims that it was before the board for the other years, but it did not establish that fact to the satisfaction of the court, nor is it material, since it does not appear that the assessment was increased for either of the other years over the amount fixed by the assessor.

Appellant alleged that the action of the Board of Equalization in fixing the amount of taxes which it should pay on its property, "was arbitrary, contrary to the evidence before it, and was entirely unsupported by the evidence." It was not stated in the pleadings in what manner or particular this board was arbitrary, except that it rejected the evidence of appellant and reached its conclusions without any evidence. It may be that the conclusion reached appeared arbitrary to appellant, when, in fact, it was not arbitrary, but it admits that its officers appeared before the board and testified. This board had the right to give such weight to this evidence of appellant's officials as it deemed proper, and if, upon the whole facts and circumstances presented, it fairly concluded the assessment made was proper, then it was the duty of appellant to pay same. The statute confides these questions of value to the Board of Equalization, and the court has no power to review its conclusions in that respect, unless the Board has proceeded corruptly or fraudulently, which is not alleged or claimed in this case.

It is further claimed by appellant that in fixing the valuations, the Board of Equalization acts as a legislative court, contrary to section 135 of the Constitution, which section reads as follows: "No courts save those provided for in this Constitution shall be established." It also refers to the case of Pratt v. Breckinridge, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 1856, for authority to support its contention. The direct point decided in this case was simply that the State Board of Contest, composed of three commissioners, was a legislative court, within the meaning of this section of the Constitution.

In our opinion, this decision does not furnish authority for holding that a mere Board of Equalization, which passes on the question of value of property listed for taxation, with power to approve, increase or decrease the same, is a legislative court. It certainly was not contemplated by the framers of the Constitution to do away with such tribunals, which had never before, by any decision of this court, been held to be a judicial tribunal, or vested with the powers and duties of a court. If the legislature is powerless under the present Constitution to provide for such a tribunal as a Board of Equalization, then the whole revenue system of the State, counties and municipalities, must give way, and hereafter when a question is made as to the value of property fixed by the assessor for taxing purposes, the only remedy will be to provide for an appeal to the regular courts, and thereby make the judges thereof the final assessors. In our opinion, such is not the proper construction of section 135 of the Constitution.

Wherefore, the judgment of the lower court is affirmed, with damages.

EAST JELLICO COAL CO. v. GOLDEN.

(Filed March 19, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Damages—Master and servant—A judgment for $1,500 as damages for injuries sustained by appellee as a result of rock and dirt falling upon him from the roof of appellant's coal mine will not be disturbed where it appears from the evidence that the injury occurred in a part of the mine where it was not the duty of appellee to keep the roof propped so as to prevent its falling, and in a place twenty or twenty-five feet from the point where he was engaged at work at the time, it being, therefore, the duty of the appellant to have kept the roof propped so as to prevent the roof from falling which resulted in the injury to appellee.

2. Same—Negligence—In an action against appellant for damages it was the province of the jury to determine whether the injuries sustained were caused by the negligence of it or appellee, and the verdict being for appellee, and the court being unable to say there was no evidence to support the verdict, it will not be disturbed.

3. Pleading—Variance—In an action for damages where the petition fixes the place of the accident at one point, but the proof establishes the fact that it was at another, no objection being made by the adverse party to this proof at the time, the variance was not material because before the taking of any proof the plaintiff offered to file an amendment showing the true place of the injury, and upon the amendment being refused proof was offered without objection.

James D. Black and P. D. Black for appellant.

B. B. Golden for appellee.

Appeal from Knox Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle.

This is an appeal from a verdict and judgment of $1,500, recovered in an action by appellee against appellant in the Knox Circuit Court, for injuries to his person by the falling upon him of a rock and dirt from the roof of appellant's coal mine, where appellee was at the time at work "drawing stumps;" it being averred in the petition that his injuries resulted from the negligence of the appellant in failing to keep the roof of its mine in a safe condition.

There can be no doubt from the evidence but that appellee's injuries were both painful and permanent, for his hip and spine were crushed and his person otherwise so hurt, as to produce partial paralysis of the bowels, and impairment of his general health. It appears from the record that in mining operations, large blocks or stumps are left in certain places in the mines, as supports for the roof over the room in which the miners work, with spaces to allow passing around them. When the coal in any division or section of the mine has been exhausted, all the miners are withdrawn from that particular place, and the stumps or pillars are taken out for the coal they contain. In removing them props of timber are used to support the roof. The removing of these pillars or stumps is called "drawing the stumps," and it is a work of more or less danger.

The work of drawing the stumps in the mine of appellant was solicited by appellee of the mine superintendent, Hansford, who informed appellee of the danger attending it, and expressed to him the fear that he was not sufficiently skilled in mining to undertake it, but appellee told him that he understood the danger and could do the work, and his employment by the superintendent followed. Appellee then began and proceeded with the work, until he was injured by the falling upon him of rock and dirt or slate from the roof of the mine, the weight of which was about one thousand pounds. Much of the work of removing the stumps was done by blasting with powder. In removing the stumps it was the duty of appellee to prop the roof at that place with timbers to prevent same from falling when left without the support of the stumps, but it was the duty of appellant to furnish timber for that purpose. The point of difficulty in this case arises in determining from the evidence whether the place of the accident was in that part of the mine where appellee was charged with the duty of keeping the roof securely propped, or at a point where it was the duty of appellant to do so.

If the debris fell upon appellee in a part of the mine which did not include the stumps he was removing, and the propping of which he was not charged with the duty of attending to, it was the duty of appellant to keep its roof at that point in a reasonably safe condition, and if it failed to do so, and by reason thereof the debris fell upon and injured the appellee, such failure was negligence, and appellant is responsible to appellee for such damages as he may have sustained thereby. But, upon the other hand, if the place where appellee was injured was a part of the mine from which he was removing stumps, it being his duty to keep the roof there securely propped, if he negligently failed to do so, and by reason of such negligence received his injuries, appellant is not liable therefor. Furthermore, though the place of the accident was not that part of the mine from which appellee was removing stumps, but was a part thereof that appellant was required to keep propped, if it was in such close proximity to that part of the mine from which appellee was removing stumps, as to be affected by the blasting done by appellee upon the stumps, and the blasting caused the debris by which appellee was injured to fall, when it would not otherwise have done so, the appellant is not liable therefor, unless its mine superintendent knew, or by the use of ordinary care, could have known that such blasting would cause the top of the mine at that place to fall, and with such knowledge, or means of knowledge, negligently failed to guard against its doing so, by more securely propping the same, and appellee did not know, or by the use of ordinary care could not have known, that such would be the effect of the blasting.

In other words, it was the primary duty of appellant to keep that part of its mine through which appellee had to pass to reach the place of the stumps, securely propped so as to make it reasonably safe for his use, but after informing him of the danger of the work of removing the stumps, it was under no duty to protect him in that part of the mine where the stumps were situated, from danger resulting from his manner of doing his work. (Crabtree Coal Mining Co. v. Sample's Adm'r, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 1703; Ashland Coal Co. v. Wallace, 19 Ky. Law Rep., 849; Gibson v. Ry. Co., 46 Mo., 163.)

While the evidence is conflicting as to the place of the accident, we think the weight of it conduces to establish the fact that it occurred at a point twenty or twenty-five feet from the stump that appellee at the time was removing, and in a part of the mine where it was not his duty to prop the roof to keep it from falling.

The evidence also conduces to prove that the falling of the roof was caused by the blasting done by appellee upon the nearby stump. If so, the appellant is not liable unless it was shown by the evidence that it knew, or by the use of ordinary care could have known, that the blasting would cause the roof to fall, in time to have secured it against falling; and further that appellee did not know, and by the use of ordinary care could not have known, that the blasting would have such effect. It was the province of the jury to determine whether appellee's injuries were caused by the negligence of appellant, or by his own negligence. They found that appellant was the negligent party, and as we are unable to say that there was not some evidence to support the verdict, it will not be disturbed. The instructions, though not in full accord with the view of the law herein expressed, were more favorable to appellant than was proper, for they in effect informed the jury that appellee was not entitled to recover, even if the accident occurred in that part of the mine where appellee was not at work, and where appellant was alone charged with the duty of keeping the roof of its mine in a safe condition, unless it knew or by the use of ordinary care could have known of the danger to appellee from overhanging rock or slate at the place of the accident, and that appellee did not know or by the use of ordinary care could not have known of such danger, in time to have prevented his injuries. As we have already stated, it was the duty of appellant to keep entrances and passways in the mine in a reasonably safe condition for the use of its employees, and appellee in using such passways had the right to rely upon the assumption that appellant's mine superintendent had properly performed his duty in that respect.

It is insisted for appellant that there can be no recovery in this case because it is alleged in the petition that appellee was injured in the main entrance of appellant's mine, whereas the evidence shows it was received in the first side right entrance, and that the variance is fatal.

We can not accept this view of the case. It is true that the petition fixes the place of the accident as in the main entrance, and that the proof shows it to have occurred in the first side right entrance, but no objection was made to the evidence by appellant. In fact, its own evidence was directed to showing that it was in the first side right entrance.

Section 129, Civil Code, provides that "no variance between pleadings and proof is material which does not mislead a party to his prejudice in maintaining his action or defense upon the merits. A party who claims to have been so misled must show that fact to the satisfaction of the court; and thereupon the court may order the pleadings to be amended upon such terms as may be just." (Gaines v. Deposit Bank, 19 Ky. Law Rep., 171.)

Section 130, Civil Code, provides that "If such variance be not material, the court may direct the fact to be found, according to the evidence, and may order an immediate amendment." (Woodcock v. Farrell, 1 Met., 437.)

After the beginning of the trial, and before the taking of the evidence had progressed to any considerable extent, the appellee offered to file an amended petition in which, among other things, it was averred that the injury to his person occurred in the first right side of the main entry, but the lower court refused to allow the amendment to be filed. Such refusal, under the circumstances, was error, but only prejudicial to appellee. In view of the offer to file the amendment, and of the fact that without objection from appellant, the proof was allowed to be made to show the true place of the accident, just as if there was no issue made by the pleadings on that point, and of the further fact that the rights of the appellant were not prejudiced thereby, we are of opinion that it is estopped to raise the question of variance now relied on.

For the reasons indicated the judgment is affirmed.

LOGSDEN v. WESTERN BRICK CO.

(Filed March 18, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Damages—Instructions—In an action by appellant against appellee for the recovery of damages sustained by receiving injuries resulting by the falling of a wall of dirt upon him while he was engaged in filling a gondola, the evidence showing that the place was not a safe one, which fact was, or could have been known by the master, and was unknown to plaintiff, and could not have been, known by him with ordinary care, an instruction should have been given embodying this view of the law.

J. D. Reed and W. W. Thum for appellant.

O'Neal & O'Neal and Forcht & Field for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Common Pleas Branch, Second Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

Appellant sued appellee to recover for personal injuries received in its service. The testimony tended to show that he was employed in appellee's brick yard and was directed by the foreman to go to another part of the yard than that in which he was at work and assist in shoveling some dirt in cars. While he was thus engaged near a high bank it caved in on him, inflicting serious injuries. The proof was conflicting as to the cause of the caving in of the bank. The jury found for the defendant. The chief complaint on the appeal relates to the instructions given by the court, which, so far as material, were as follows: "The court instructs the jury that if they shall believe from the evidence that while the plaintiff was at work in the pit in the evidence mentioned, the defendant's agents or servants superior to the plaintiff in its service by or through their gross negligence caused a portion of the clay bank in the evidence referred to to fall upon him, and that the plaintiff thereby sustained the injuries by him alleged, then the law is for the plaintiff, and the jury should so find, unless the jury shall believe from the evidence that the plaintiff by negligence on his part so far contributed to his injury that but for such negligence he would not have been injured, in which latter event the law is for the defendant, and the jury should so find."

It is complained that the instruction should have been that it was the duty of the master to furnish a safe place for the servant to work and if the place was dangerous and this was known to the master or ought to have been known to it and was unknown to the servant, and by reason of this he was hurt, he could recover. (Ashland Coal and Iron Co. v. Wallace, 20 Ky. Law Rep., 853; VanDyke v. Memphis, &c., Co., 24 Ky. Law Rep., 1283.) When the case was before us originally we reached the conclusion that the instruction given by the court was correct in view of the allegations of the petition; but upon reconsideration of the record and in view of the amended petition and the answer we conclude that the case was before the jury on the merits. The proof for the plaintiff shows that he was an inexperienced man, had been in the pit only a short time, and was working under the bank about eight or ten feet high, shoveling the dirt into a gondola. The bank had been dug into to the depth of about three feet and to the height of about two and a half feet, and one witness testified that when the accident happened, he saw wooden gluts which had been driven into the bank above and saw a negro man prying the bank with a crow bar just a few minutes before it fell. The evidence for the defendant contradicted this, and was to the effect that the bank was moist from recent rains and only a little of it fell off, and plaintiff was not hurt much. The proof for the plaintiff warranted the jury in concluding that the place assigned to the plaintiff to work was not safe, and that this was known to the master, or could have been known to it by the exercise of ordinary care, and was unknown to plaintiff, and could not have been known to him by ordinary care. An instruction submitting the case to the jury on this idea should have been given. The instruction quoted should not have been given.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded for a new trial.

COMMONWEALTH, BY, &c. v. AYER & LORD TIE CO.

(Filed March 18, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Frank A. Lucas for appellants.

Campbell & Campbell for appellee.

Appeal from McCracken Circuit Court.

Judge Hobson delivered the following response to petition for rehearing:

Section 4141, Revised Statutes of the United States, provides that the home port of vessels should be that at, or nearest to, which the owner, if there be but one, usually resides. Sections 4178 and 4334 require that the name of this home port should be painted upon the stern of the vessels, with appropriate penalty for disobedience. The act of 1884 prescribes that the word "port," as used in sections 4178 and 4334, in reference to painting the name and port of registered or licensed vessels on their sterns, should be construed to mean, either the port where the vessel is registered or enrolled, the place in the same district where the vessel was built, or where one or more of the owners reside.

The argument of counsel for appellee, that the act of 1884, while changing the meaning of the word "port" in sections 4178 and 4334, left it unchanged, as used in section 4141, amounts to this; that the Congress of the United States, after a policy continued throughout a century, requiring the name of the home port to be painted on the stern of vessels, suddenly changed that policy, without any apparent reason, and permitted the name of a port, which was not the home port, to be painted thereon.

We think that Congress required the name of the home port to be painted on the stern of the vessel for a wise and useful purpose, enabling all persons, who had dealings with them, to know where they belonged; and we are not willing to lightly adopt a construction, that it was intended by the act of 1884 to leave the place where the owner resides as the home port of the vessel, and yet permit the name of another port to be painted upon the stern. This construction would not only fail to enable persons dealing with vessels to know, of certainty, their home port, but it would absolutely mislead by permitting false information to be hung out under governmental sanction.

Petition for rehearing overruled.

(Filed March 18, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Fairleigh, Straus & Fairleigh and Kohn, Baird & Spindle for appellant.
M. A., D. A. & J. G. Sachs for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Common Pleas Branch, Second Division.

Judge Hobson delivered the following response to petition for rehearing:

On a reconsideration of instruction four asked by appellant, we conclude that it is subject to the criticism made by appellee, and that on another trial the court should modify it so as to read, "the court instructs the jury that if the plaintiff alighted," etc. It should also be modified in the next clause so as to read, "That the plaintiff was thereafter injured by a backward movement," etc. With this change we see no objection to the instruction, and on the whole case we think a new trial should be ordered. Complaint is made of the petition, and complaint is also made of the answer, but we think the issue is substantially presented. (L. & N. R. R. v. Harrod, ante, 250.)

Petition overruled.

JONES v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed April 13, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Criminal law—Evidence—The defendant being on trial for feloniously breaking into the dwelling house of J. G. Fusen and taking two sides of bacon and a ham therefrom, while testifying as a witness on his own behalf, was asked by the attorney for the Commonwealth this question: "Did you on the former trial of this case, when you were convicted of this offense, swear that you met James Bray on the Sunday night that you say you started back home, the night the meat was said to have been found in your crib," which the court required defendant to answer over the objection of his counsel, but after the examination was completed the court admonished the jury that the form of the question was improper, and that they should not consider the fact that defendant had been theretofore convicted. Held—While the question was improper we can not believe in the face of the admonition of the court, that it could have been prejudicial to defendant.

S. B. Dishman for appellant.

N. B. Hays and Lorraine Mix for appellee.

Appeal from Knox Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

The appellant was indicted for feloniously breaking into the dwelling house of J. G. Fusen, and taking therefrom two sides of bacon and a ham, by the grand jury of Knox county, and upon his trial before a petit jury was found guilty, and his punishment fixed at two years confinement in the penitentiary. Appellant testified as a witness in his own behalf, and upon cross examination, the Commonwealth's attorney propounded the following question to him: "Did you on the former trial of this case, when you were convicted of this offense, swear that you met James Bray on the Sunday night that you say you started back home, the night the meat was said to have been found in your crib?"

The defendant, by counsel, objected to the form of the question, which the court overruled, and required him to answer. He thereupon answered as follows: "I did not swear on the former trial about having met James Bray on that night because nothing was asked me about having met him. Bray was present as a witness on the former trial, but did not testify."

After the examination was completed, the trial court admonished the jury that the form of the Commonwealth's attorney's question was improper, and that the jury should not consider the fact that the defendant had been theretofore convicted, nor permit it to have any weight with them in the decision of the case. It is insisted for the appellant that the admonition to the jury by the trial court did not cure its error in failing to sustain the defendant's objection to the form of the question, and cite the case of Tully v. Commonwealth, 18 Bush, 142. In that case the trial court permitted the entire record of a previous trial to be read to the jury; and that case certainly presented a very different question from the one at bar. While it was clearly improper for the Commonwealth's attorney in framing his question to have referred to the fact of appellant's conviction upon a former trial, we can not believe in the face of the admonition of the court that this slip could have been prejudicial to the defendant. In Pierce v. Commonwealth, 10 Ky. Law Rep., 180, the defendant was on trial for killing one Monroe, and upon the trial of the case a copy of an indictment against the defendant for killing one Thomas was permitted to go to the jury over the defendant's objection; but before the conclusion of the trial, was withdrawn, and the jury told that they had no right to consider it for any purpose in making their verdict. Upon appeal this error was relied on for a reversal, but this court held it insufficient, saying: "We have no right to presume that appellant was prejudiced by reading that indictment. For to do so requires the assumption that the jury disregarded their oath and duty to try the case according to the evidence."

We are of the opinion that this error does not afford ground for reversal. A reversal is asked for the additional reason that the testimony of the Commonwealth was not sufficient to warrant a verdict of guilty. It was very clearly shown by the testimony that the dwelling of J. G. Fusen was broken into on the night of January 12, 1903, and two sides of bacon and a ham taken therefrom while the family were absent; and that Fusen went to the house of appellant and informed him that he intended on the next morning to have every man's premises on the creek searched for the missing property; and that on that night he and John Jones, a brother-in-law of the defendant, went to his premises, saw him enter his stable, heard him throwing corn up against the walls of the crib, saw him emerge from the stable, carrying a box on his shoulder, which he set down in the field and began to open; that Fusen called out to the defendant, and fired his pistol; that defendant thereupon took to his heels, and an examination of the box disclosed the missing meat. They also went to the stable and discovered a hole in the pile of corn from which the box had been taken. Whilst the defendant introduced very strong evidence conducing to prove an alibi, we think there was sufficient evidence on which to found the verdict of the jury. Upon the whole case we perceive no error prejudicial to the substantial rights of the defendant.

Judgment affirmed.

PRITCHETT v. CONTINENTAL CASUALTY CO.

(Filed April 13, 1904.)

1. Accident insurance—Ratable indemnity—Installment payments of premiums—Assignment of wages—Forfeiture—Notice to company—Loss of foot—On November 7, 1902, appellant, a locomotive engineer, in the service of the N. & W. Ry. Co. contracted with appellee for an accident policy for $750 indemnity against the loss of a foot, agreeing to pay $51.84 premium in five equal monthly installments, beginning January 1, 1903, and, as a part of the contract assigned to the company the sum of $51.84 of his claim for salary against said N. & W. Ry. for services rendered and to be rendered, payable in installments of $10.37 each, the first installment to be deducted out of his wages for December, 1893. These installments provided for his insurance for ratable periods, the first for two months, the second for three months, the third for three months and the fourth for five months, and if the first four were paid the fifth should be paid by the railway company provided appellant remained in its service when it became due. In default of any payment, when due, all rights under the policy to be void and can only be reinstated by tendering payment at the general office, and no claim can be made between date of forfeiture and reinstatement. In case appellant ceased to be in the employ of said railway company before the first installment became due then his rights to cease, unless he notified the secretary of the company within three days thereafter and remitted said installment. The policy was issued and accepted. Appellant was discharged by the railway company December 18, 1903, and was paid his wages except $10.37, which he left in the hands of the paymaster for appellee, but did not within three days thereafter notify appellee, in writing, or remit to it the first installment of his premium. He then entered the service of the C. S. Ry. Co., and on January 29, 1903, had his foot cut off by accident. On January 31, 1903, the N. & W. Ry. Co. paid appellee the $10.37, which it had retained out of appellee's wages. Held—On these facts that appellant was entitled to recover the indemnity of $750 from the insurance company.

2. Same—The contract sued on, not being a Kentucky contract, is not affected by the provisions of our statute.

W. Don Forman and Forman & Forman for appellant.

Breckinridge & Shelby for appellee.

Appeal from Fayette Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

On November 7, 1902, appellant, Pritchett, who was a locomotive engineer in the service of the Norfolk & Western R. R. Co., at Columbus, O., applied to appellee for an accident policy. The application among other things contained the following:

"I agree to pay therefor (that is, for the insurance applied for) $51.84 in equal installment payments of $10.37 without notice; the first installment payment of $10.37, to be paid on the 1st day of January, 1903, and one payment of like amount due the same day of each of the next succeeding four months. In default of any payment being made by 12 o'clock, noon, standard time, of the day when due, as above specified, all my rights under said policy, and the rights of the beneficiary thereunder, shall then and thereby become void, and can only be reinstated by tendering payment at the general office, and, if accepted, the reinstatement takes effect from and after the date of such payment, and no claim can be made between the dates of such forfeiture and such reinstatement. Any and all payments, as above agreed, may be deducted from any claim I may have on account of my insurance.

"I agree that any order or assignment given by me to the company in lieu of the installment payments above stipulated for, shall be and form a part of my contract with the company, and that the company does not accept or incur any responsibility for the collection thereof."

On the same day he signed and delivered to it a paymaster's order, which reads as follows:

"In lieu of payments provided in my application for accident insurance in the Continental Casualty Co., of Chicago, Ill., I hereby assign to said company the sum of $51.84 of my claim against the N. & W. Ry. for services rendered and to be rendered by me, due and payable in five monthly installments as follows: First installment of $10.37, to be paid and deducted from my wages for the month of December, 1902; second installment of $10.37, to be paid and deducted from my wages for the month of January, 1903; third installment of $10.37, to be paid and deducted from my wages for the month of February, 1903; fourth installment of $10.37, to be paid and deducted from my wages for the month of March, 1903; fifth installment of $10.37. It is understood and agreed that the installments above provided for, respectively, shall provide for my insurance under a policy to be issued to me by said company and bearing even date and number herewith, for ratable periods, to wit: The first installment, two months; the second installment, two months; the third installments, three months, and the fourth installment, five months, in their successive order as herein given; with the further understanding and agreement that if the first, second, third and fourth installments be paid when due, respectively, the fifth installment shall be paid by the railway company, provided I remain in the service of said railway company when same becomes due.

"I agree that failure to deduct any of the above installments by said paymaster, from any cause, is at my risk, and if any installment be not deducted as above provided, all my rights and rights of my beneficiary under said policy issued to me shall be void. I hereby waive for myself and my beneficiary under said policy any notice of the payment or nonpayment of any installment provided for, and I further agree that in case of default upon any of the above installments, the same may be deducted from my wages in any succeeding month, at the option of said Continental Casualty Co., but such deduction shall only reinstate me from the date of such deduction and for the insurance covered by it.

"I agree that should I be discharged from or cease to be in the service of said railway system before the first of said installments becomes due, then all my rights and rights of my beneficiary in said policy shall immediately cease, unless I notify the secretary of said Continental Casualty Co., in writing, within three days after leaving said service, and remit said installment with said notice, and said reinstatement shall take effect only from the date of said company's receipt therefor. No agent shall alter or waive any of the conditions of this order."

The papers were forwarded to the company, and at its office in Chicago it issued a policy of date November 7, 1902, insuring Pritchett for twelve months, among other things in the sum of $750 against the loss of a foot. The policy contained this clause:

"The consideration for this policy is the warranties and agreements contained in the application herefor, which is made a part hereof, and the paying when and as authorized by the company in writing of the premium specified on the reverse hereof, or in the insured's assignment of wages or order on the paymaster therefor. * * *

"It is further agreed that no indemnity shall accrue for any injury sustained subsequent to any default in the payment of premiums as herein provided and previous to any reinstatement of this policy which may subsequently be effected."

Pritchett continued in the service of the Norfolk & Western Ry. Co. until December 18, 1902, when he was discharged by it. He then received his wages due him from the company, except the sum of $0.87, which he left in the hands of the paymaster for appellee, pursuant to the order he had given, quoted above; but he did not within three days after leaving the service notify the appellee in writing and remit to it the first installment of his premium. He then entered the service of the Cincinnati Southern Ry. and at Lexington, Ky., on January 29, 1903, had his foot cut off in an accident. On January 31 the Norfolk & Western Ry. Co. paid appellee the $10.37, which it had retained out of Pritchett's December wages. On these facts Pritchett sued appellee to recover the indemnity of $750, and it pleaded in defense of the action that he had ceased to be in the service of the Norfolk & Western Ry. Co. before the first installment of his premium became due, and that he had failed to notify it in writing within three days after leaving the service, or to remit the first installment with the notice, setting out the clause of the paymasters order providing that in this event the policy should immediately cease, and alleging that the policy was not in force at the time of the accident in which the plaintiff lost his foot. The court held the plea good, and dismissed the petition. The plaintiff appeals.

The application, the paymaster's order and the policy are all dated November 7. Each of the papers was manifestly made with a view to the other two, and all three must be read together, as one instrument, in determining their meaning. While it is stipulated in the application that the first installment of the premium is to be paid on the first day of January, 1903, it is stipulated in the paymaster's order that in lieu of the payments provided for in the application the insured assigns to the company his claim against the Norfolk & Western Ry. for services rendered and to be rendered by him in five monthly installments, four to be deducted from his wages for the months of December, January, February and March; the fifth installment to be paid later. The insured was not, therefore, in default in the payment of the first installment of the premium, and no defense is made by the company on the ground that this money was not paid to it by the railway company until January 31. For the assignment of the claim on the railroad company under the paymaster's order being in lieu of the payments specified in the application, the company took the assignment and agreed to look to the railroad company for the money, provided the assured left the amount out of his December wages in the hands of the railroad company for it. It is stipulated in the order that the failure of the paymaster to deduct any of the installments from his wages is at his risk, and if any installment is not deducted all rights under the policy shall cease, but there is no provision as to the time when the railroad company is to pay appellee, and the necessary effect of the contract is that the insured is not affected by the delay of the railroad company in paying over the money after it has been deducted. When, therefore, appellee was hurt, he was not in default in the payment of any part of the premium. The second installment was not due until February 1. He had done all he was required to do as to the first installment if he had remained in the service of the Norfolk & Western Ry. Co. But he had not remained in the service of that company, and the question to be determined is what effect shall be given to the clause of the contract providing that if he left the service of the railroad company before the first installment became due, then all rights under the policy should cease, unless he notified appellee in writing within three days after leaving the service and remitted that installment with the notice. It will be observed that this clause only refers to his leaving the service of the railway company before the first installment became due. If he left the service of the company after the first installment became due, it has no application. In that event, he was required to give no notice of his leaving the service of the railroad company in order to preserve his rights. It was certainly not contemplated by the contract that when the railroad company retained in its hands the first installment, the insured was also to remit the amount to appellee with a notice stating that he had left the service of the railroad company. While the proper construction of the contract is a matter of difficulty, taking it as a whole we think it evident that this clause was only inserted as a security for the payment of the first installment. The contract is an unusual one. It took effect from November 7, and yet nothing was to be paid upon it until the insured's December wages were earned, and then he was to leave in the hands of the railroad company the amount of the first installment. If he had left the service of the railroad company before the month of December appellee would have had no security for the payment of its money, and yet would have been compelled to carry the risk until default was made in the payment of the first installment but for this clause of the contract. It, therefore, required him, if he left the service of the company, at once to give notice to it of that fact, and immediately pay the first installment.

It is stipulated in the order not only that the failure of the paymaster to deduct the installments from his wages was at his risk, but also that if any installment was not deducted as therein provided, all rights under the policy should be void. When, therefore, Pritchett settled with the railroad company on December 18 he was bound to leave the amount of the first installment in its hands, or lose all rights under the policy. When the deduction was made the railroad company held the money for appellee. The contract is silent as to when the deduction from his wages should be made, and necessarily means that this should be done when his wages for the month should be settled. It is immaterial whether the settlement was made before or after the 1st of January. The first installment became due out of his wages when his wages for December were settled by the railroad company, and if it was not then deducted the policy ceased. It is not stipulated that if he should be discharged before the first installment was paid, then notice in writing in three days must be given, accompanied with a remittance of the first installment. The words, "before the first of said installment becomes due," are evidently used with reference to the preceding part of the order by which his wages so far as necessary are assigned to appellee in lieu of the payments provided for in the application. The meaning of the clause is, if he should leave the service of the railroad company without leaving the first installment in its hands, he must then give the notice, and remit with it the amount; for in that event appellee would have no security for its money. To hold that he lost his insurance unless he left the amount in the hands of the railroad company, and also lost it if he did not in addition remit the amount to appellee himself in three days, would be to force him to pay this installment twice to preserve his rights. Contracts must be construed reasonably, and in case of doubt conditions like this are construed against the insurer, for he prepares the contract and his liability should not be defeated by doubtful phrases. The purpose of the contract is indemnity, and the insured will not be adjudged to have lost his indemnity unless this is the fair meaning of the contract. The giving of the notice that he had left the service of the railroad company and the remitting of the amount of the first installment with the notice stand together. He was not required to give the notice unless he was also required to remit the amount of the first installment with it. There was no necessity for him to remit to appellee money which, by the terms of the contract, he had left in the hands of the railroad company for it, and as the remittance was to accompany the notice, when no remittance was required, no notice need be given. The notice only went with the remittance. The policy is silent upon the subject. The condition is inserted only in the order assigning the wages, and apparently relates merely thereto. It does not appear to have been regarded as material what railroad company the insured worked for, for no notice was required if he left the service of the railroad company after the first installment became due, thus showing that the insurer intended to guard only against the loss of its security for the payment of the first installment. In Lyon v. Travelers Insurance Co., 54 Am. R., 357, the court said of a similar contract, where the railroad company had not paid over the money: "It is true nonpayment of the premium for any one of the periods suspends the enforcement of the policy; but the insured in a case like this, when he has provided

For the payment when due and the premium made is in the possession of the defendant, or under its control, payment will be deemed to have been made until the insured is notified by the defendant to the contrary."

In Fidelity and Casualty Co. v. Johnson, 80 L. R. A., 206, the court, in response to a similar defense, said: "The assured's duty as to the payment was fully performed when he left the installment in the hands of the paymaster." (1 Coy., 242; Eury v. Standard Ins. Co., 10 L. R. A., 584.) The case of Travelers Insurance Co. v. Bane, 85 Ky., 677, was where the insured was in default in the payment of his premiums. So also are the cases of McMahon v. Travelers Ins. Co., 77 Iowa, 229; Landis v. Standard Ins. Co., 6 Ind. App., 502.

We, therefore, conclude that the clause relied on by the defendant does not defeat a recovery where the amount of the first installment was deducted from the December wages and left in the hands of the railroad company for appellee. The contract sued on not being a Kentucky contract, is not affected by the provisions of our statute.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

WOODLAND CEMETERY CO. v. ELLISON.

(Filed April 13, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Appeals—Judgment—Where upon the return of a case to the lower court where the value and use of certain property is in controversy such value and use was determined as directed in the reversal of the case, and a judgment entered by the chancellor in accordance therewith, the finding of the chancellor will not be disturbed.

R. S. Crawford for appellant.

Tye & Denham for appellee.

Appeal from Whitley Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

The facts of this case are set out in the opinion on the former appeals. (Finley v. Hill, 19 Ky. Law Rep., 989; Woodland Cemetery Co. v. Ellison, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 2222.) When the case was last here the court said, after holding that the sale to Ellison was void: "But inasmuch as the corporation has received the benefit of his purchase money, they should be required to repay it to him. The court will ascertain the value of the use of the property by Ellison and the damages done to it, if any, by him, and set it off against the interest and purchase price."

On the return of the case to the circuit court proof was taken by the parties on the questions indicated, and on final hearing it was adjudged that Ellison had done no damage to the land, and judgment was entered in his favor for his purchase money with interest, subject to a credit of $5 a year for the use of the land. The plaintiffs again appeal. The rule is that ordinarily the chancellor will not order a cemetery sold; but there were only two graves on the land bought by Ellison, and the cemetery company had not paid Freeman the purchase money. Freeman had a lien on the land for his purchase money, and when Ellison paid Freeman he became entitled by substitution to the benefit of Freeman's lien, for the cemetery company and those who bought from them took subject to Freeman's lien, and this was not divested by the payment made by Ellison to Freeman in his purchase from the company. The proof sustains the chancellor's finding that the land is in as good condition as when received by Ellison. While he cut some trees from it, he also put the land in grass. The trees were not well suited for shade, and if shade trees are desired they can be set out. The cleaning up of the land and getting it in grass were of as much value to it as the trees which were cut.

The court properly allowed Ellison interest. The proof as to whether the money was tendered to him was conflicting. But, admittedly, the tender was not kept good. A tender to be effective must be kept good. Besides, it was held on the last appeal that Ellison was entitled to his money, with interest, and that opinion is the law of the case. The proper method of computing rents in the case of vendor and vendee where the sale is rescinded is a matter of some difficulty. It depends somewhat on the facts of each case, the effort being as nearly as possible to place the parties in statu quo, and do justice between them. The proof is conclusive that Ellison spent a good deal on the land. He improved it on the idea that it was his, and got very little out of it. He was allowed nothing for his improvements or expenses. On all the facts, and giving some weight to the chancellor's judgment, we conclude that we ought not to disturb his finding on the question of rents.

Judgment affirmed.

McKOWN v. GETTYS & GILBERT.

(Filed April 12, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Contracts—Sale by broker—Appellant, a Louisville broker, wired appellees, St. Louis brokers, offering to sell them 5,000 cases tomatoes, futures, at so much, which offer was accepted, and the details of the transaction completed by letters between them. Appellant failing to carry out his contract, appellees had to fill their contracts made as a result of this one, at advanced prices. In an action by appellees against appellant for the amount they lost by reason of his failure to perform his contract, Held—that the contract to deliver the tomatoes at the price named was absolute and appellees are entitled to recover upon it.

R. C. Kinkead for appellant.

W. W. & J. R. Watts for appellees.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Common Pleas Branch, Third Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

The appellant, W. M. McKown, is a merchandise broker in the city of Louisville, Ky. The appellees, Gettys & Gilbert, are engaged in the same business in St. Louis, Mo.

On the 9th day of July, 1901, the appellant telegraphed to appellees as follows: "We offer for immediate reply by wire 5,000 cases of 3 lb. standard tomatoes futures, 77½ cts. delivered East St. Louis, regular terms. St. Louis proper 2 cts. hundred higher." Upon receipt of which appellees wired appellant: "Will take 5,000 cases 3 lb. standard tomatoes futures, 77½ cts. delivered East St. Louis. Quote more."

"Seventy-seven and one half cents" meant per dozen cans, there being two dozen cans in each case. By "futures" was meant tomatoes which had not, at the time of the contract, been packed, the packing season not opening until some time after the dates of the telegrams, and ending late in the fall.

Immediately after wiring their reply, appellees wrote appellant as follows:

"W. H. McKown,

"St. Louis, Mo., July 10, 1901.

"Louisville, Ky.:

"Gentlemen—Your telegram received, quoting 5,000 cases 3 lb. future Indiana tomatoes at 77½ cts. delivered E. St. Louis. We wired you promptly that we would take the 5,000 cases with division of brokerage, and now await your confirmation with contracts. Kindly write us full particulars in regard to the factory, giving us all the information you can as to their responsibility, character, etc.; also endeavor to get the privilege of label, allowing $1 per thousand, if it should be desirable. Give us an 80 per cent. contract guaranteed. If you have anything more to offer in future tomatoes, please wire us promptly.

"Yours truly,

"GETTYS & GILBERT."

On the 12th of July, appellant wrote appellees as follows:

"Louisville, Ky., July 12, 1901.

"Messrs. Gettys & Gilbert,

"St. Louis, Mo.:

"Gentlemen—So far we have succeeded in placing 5,000 cases tomatoes for your account with the Lexington Canning Co., Lexington, Ind., and will furnish the regular association contract for these goods. These good people are thoroughly responsible, and pack a nice line of goods, and you need anticipate no fears in reference to them. Please send us the names of the several buyers, and we will have contracts made out accordingly. * * *

"Yours truly,

"W. M. McKOWN."

Within two or three days after the receipt of this letter, appellees claim to have resold the tomatoes to various parties, thereby obligating themselves to deliver the goods to their customers at the proper time. Afterwards, the Lexington Canning Co. repudiated the contract for the tomatoes, which appellant assumed to make for it, and consequently, at the end of the packing season, appellees were compelled to go upon the open market and purchase other tomatoes at a largely advanced price, in order to fill the contracts they had made based upon the supposition that they would in due time receive the 5,000 cases from the Lexington Canning Co.; after which, they instituted this action against appellant, setting up in their petition substantially the foregoing facts, and alleging that, at the time they were forced to purchase the tomatoes to supply their customers, the market price had advanced from 77½ cents per dozen cans to $1.15 per dozen cans, and that they had by reason of appellant's breach of contract, been damaged in the sum of $3,750, that being the difference between the contract price at which they had purchased them of appellant and the market price which they had been forced to pay because of his failure to comply with the terms of the contract.

Appellant, in his answer, admitted the sending of the telegram, and the receipt of the answer thereto, above quoted, but denied that it constituted a contract of sale between him and appellees, and also denied the material allegations of the petition. By a second paragraph in his answer, he alleged that the transaction between him and appellees was merely the business of broker with broker, and not intended by him, or understood by them, to be an absolute sale, but that it was only an offer on his part of goods, which, upon acceptance by them, had to be reported to his principal, the Lexington Canning Co., and approved and ratified by it before it constituted a contract of sale; all of which appellees well knew and understood at the time; that they well knew that it was then, and is now, "a custom and usage of trade, particularly applicable to the business carried on by the plaintiffs (appellees) and this defendant (appellant) that brokers' quotations of prices are, and were, subject to change or revocation, and that no quotation offered by one engaged in the business that this defendant and plaintiffs were at the time mentioned engaged, are binding either upon the broker or principal until reported by the broker to the principal, and the acceptance of such quotation formally had by the principal. That this defendant (appellant) states that he did report to his principal, the Lexington Canning Co., the conditional acceptance of the quotation on the tomatoes as mentioned in the petition, and that said principal declined to accept said offer, or to enter into any contract whatever with plaintiffs, or to ship or to deliver to said plaintiffs any of the tomatoes as set out in the petition. Defendant further states that there never was any contract by this defendant to deliver to the plaintiffs any of the tomatoes or goods mentioned in the petition, except on the ratification and confirmation of such price by his principal, the Lexington Canning Co., which, as hereinbefore stated, they refused to accept or ratify or confirm."

By reply appellees controverted all of the affirmative allegations of the answer, thus completing the issues. A trial resulted in a verdict in favor of the appellees in the sum of $1,250, of which appellant is now complaining.

The testimony of appellees fully sustain their theory of the case, that they regarded the telegram from appellant to them, and their reply thereto, as an absolute contract, just as it appears on the face of the transaction, although they did not know whether appellant was acting for himself, or was dealing for another. The correspondence between the parties, which is in evidence, beginning with the letter of the 12th of July from appellant, shows that he considered that the Lexington Canning Co. was bound by the contract, evidenced by the telegrams; on July 17, he wrote: "In reference to the Lexington matter, we feel that we are fully right, and we propose to stand just as pat on this deal, as if we had their signature to a contract.

"We have their word, to sell the goods; we have their letter of acceptance at the price quoted you; the only thing, their acceptance was for another party than your good selves; but we had a perfect right to change the buyer even after the contract was passed, and we propose to hold them for their trade."

On the subject of its liability on the contract made by him, appellant wrote to the Lexington Canning Co. on the 17th of July, 1901:

"Referring again to the question of your position in relation to 5,000 cases of 3 lb. tomatoes. We beg to advise you that we have two other transactions that were going through at the same time; they were similar to yours. Both of these packers have forwarded their contracts, one of them getting his contract here only this morning. Now, we trust you will look at the fairness of this deal, and will forward your contract immediately for signature of the buyer, and thus save expense and annoyance of trouble to yourselves and to the buyer."

In his testimony appellant said, frankly, he had no authority to bind the Lexington Canning Co., and it was not bound to appellees by his acts in the transaction involved in this litigation. By his telegram to appellees, and their acceptance of its terms, appellant made with them what purported, on its face, to be an absolute contract to deliver the tomatoes at the price named; by his letter of the 12th of July, 1901, he represented to them that he had placed their order with the Lexington Canning Co. All that appellees desired was a responsible principal, and it was immaterial whether appellant or the Lexington Canning Co. occupied that position. As it turned out that appellant had no authority to act for the canning company, he was liable as principal, provided appellees were ignorant of this want of authority. (Sanford v. McArthur, 18 B. Mon., 421; Murray v. Caruthers, 1 Met., 71.)

The trial court instructed the jury as follows:

"No. 1. If the jury believe from the evidence that when plaintiffs Gettys & Gilbert on July 10, 1901, wired their acceptance of defendant's offer contained in his telegram of July 9, 1901, they knew that defendant's said offer was made by him as a broker, and that such offer, by reason of defendant's limited authority, would not be binding until ratified and confirmed by defendant's principal, and that defendant's principal refused to ratify and confirm such offer, they shall find for the defendant.

"No. 2. If the jury believe from the evidence that said plaintiffs did not purchase the goods embraced in defendant's offer of July 9, on their own account, or if the jury believe from the evidence that when plaintiffs wired their acceptance of defendant's offer they knew said offer was made by defendant as a broker, and if they further believe from the evidence that at that time there existed among merchandise brokers a well defined, uniform and universal custom known to plaintiffs, or which they ought to have known, that when an offer is made by a broker like that contained in said telegram of July 9, 1901, it is of no binding effect until ratified and confirmed by such broker's principal, and if they further believe from the evidence that defendant's principal refused to ratify and confirm said offer, they shall find for the defendant.

"No. 3. If the jury believe from the evidence that when plaintiffs wired their acceptance of defendants' offer they did not know that said offer would not be binding until ratified and confirmed by defendant's principal by reason of defendant's limited authority, and if they further believe from the evidence that no custom among merchandise brokers as defined in instruction No. 2, existed at the time of said offer, and if they further believe from the evidence that plaintiffs accepted said offer on their own account, they shall find for the plaintiff.

"No. 4. If the jury find for the plaintiffs, they shall award them such sum as represents the difference if any, between the market price of the tomatoes mentioned in defendant's offer under the conditions of said offer at the time plaintiffs first learned of defendant's refusal to deliver said tomatoes, if he did so refuse, and the price fixed in said offer, not to exceed the sum of $3,750, the amount claimed in the petition."

This presentation of the law was as favorable to appellant as he was entitled, if not more so. There was no variance between the contract sued on, and the cause of action established in the evidence. It is sometimes a question of some nicety to determine whether in questions of the liability of agents to third parties the form of the action should be for a breach of contract or for deceit; but in cases such as this, the right of the injured party to sue in contract is beyond question. The contract is contained in the telegrams; it is absolute in terms, and purports on its face to be the contract of appellant personally; to relegate the appellees to an action against some one else, it was incumbent on him to show a legally bound principal, which he failed to do. The rule is that where an agent acts without authority, and uses apt words to bind himself, he is liable on the contract. (Mechem on Agency, section 550.)

The trial court did not err in admitting the evidence of the custom among the brokers of St. Louis to use a different form of words when contracting in their own name, and when contracting subject to the confirmation of others. Under the issues in this case, it was material to show what appellees understood by the words of appellant's telegram, it having been pleaded that they knew the contract tendered was not absolute, but subject to confirmation; it was also competent, as tending to defeat the universal custom among brokers, pleaded and relied on by appellant as a bar to appellees' action. The evidence adduced fully sustains the verdict.

For the reasons indicated the judgment is affirmed.

JOHNS v. CUMBERLAND TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH CO.

(Filed April 13, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Damages—Evidence—Instructions—In an action against a telephone company for damages for trespass to land, the petition setting out ownership and possession and that the telephone company had wrongfully, forcibly, maliciously and against his will trespassed upon his land, the defendant company failing to deny ownership and possession in its answer, the evidence supporting the allegations of the petition the plaintiff was entitled to a peremptory instruction for damages done to his property.

J. H. Shelton for appellant.

Fairleigh, Strauss & Fairleigh for appellee.

Appeal from Hickman Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

This action was instituted by appellant to recover damages of appellee for an alleged wrongful trespass upon his land situated in Hickman county, Kentucky.

In his petition appellant alleges that at the time of the trespass he was the owner and in possession, and that he is now the owner and in possession of thirty-three and one-third acres of land, set out by metes and bounds, and that appellee, by its agents and servants, on the — day of May, 1902, and on various other days thereafter, prior to the commencement of the action, wrongfully, forcibly, maliciously, and against his will and consent, trespassed upon his land, digging holes therein, and erecting telephone poles thereon, destroying the soil and grass, etc.; that these wrongs were done over his protest, and were committed forcibly, unlawfully, and maliciously; that by reason of same his property was injured, and he was insulted and humiliated, and damaged in the sum of $250.

Appellee's answer fails to deny the ownership and possession of appellant of the land in question: nor does it deny that the holes were dug and the poles erected on appellant's land; it being merely denied that the alleged trespass was maliciously, wrongfully and unlawfully done. An analysis of the pleading shows that its denials are limited to the words of aggravation used in the petition, leaving the actual trespass admitted.

By the second paragraph it is affirmatively alleged that appellee had had possession of the strip of land in question for six years last past. This plea is bad, and appellant's general demurrer to it should have been sustained. Upon the trial of the case the evidence showed that the agents and servants of appellee came upon the land admitted in the pleadings to be the property and in the possession of appellant, and, over his protest, and against his will and consent, dug holes in it, and erected poles thereon; that they, without pretending to know to whom the land belonged, in the presence of appellant, and despite his protest, wilfully committed the trespass complained of in the petition.

The learned trial judge, overlooking the admissions in the answer as to the ownership and possession of appellant of the property, and the defects in the denials as to the trespass, evidently concluded that appellant had failed to establish his ownership and possession, and gave the following instruction: "The jury are instructed that inasmuch as the proof in this case shows that the poles of the defendant were on the outside of plaintiff's fence, said defendant had the right to put up their poles where they did along plaintiff's fence and had the right also to plant their guy pole and 'dead man' where same, from the evidence, were planted. Therefore, you will find for defendant in this case unless you believe, from the evidence, that the 'dead man' planted near plaintiff's fence was put in in such a negligent and careless manner as to cause a wash under plaintiffs' fence and in his field, in which event you will find for the plaintiff such actual damages as you may believe from the evidence he has sustained, if any, from planting said 'dead man' by defendant's employes where it was planted, not exceeding $250."

Under the pleadings and evidence in this case, appellant was entitled to a peremptory instruction for the actual damage done his property by the action of appellee's agents and servants, and also to an instruction that, if the trespass was done in a high-handed, malicious and oppressive manner, he was entitled to recover punitive damages. (Ohio Valley Telephone Co. v. Myer, 22 Ky. Law Rep., 36.)

Upon the return of this case, appellee, if it desires, should be permitted to amend its answer.

The judgment is reversed for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

BROWN v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed April 15, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Criminal law—Instructions—Appellant having been indicted under section 1166, Kentucky Statutes, for willful and malicious cutting and wounding, an instruction to the jury that they should find him guilty of malicious cutting if the same was done "feloniously and with malice aforethought" was erroneous, and an instruction that they should find the defendant guilty of cutting in sudden heat and passion if the same was done in sudden heat and passion and without previous malice has been condemned by the Court of Appeals because it does not follow the language of the statute, the words "sudden affray" not being synonymous with the words "in sudden heat and passion."

H. A. Schoberth for appellant.

N. B. Hays and Lorraine Mix for appellee.

Appeal from Woodford Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

Appellant was tried at the October term, 1903, of the Woodford Circuit Court on a charge of willful and malicious cutting and wounding of Mack Layton with the intent to kill him. He was found guilty and his punishment fixed at three years confinement in the penitentiary. The appellant asks a reversal, claiming that the court erred in instructing the jury and for the further reason, as he claims, that the evidence did not authorize the verdict.

The offense with which appellant was charged, as shown by the witnesses, was committed about as follows: On one night in the month of September, 1903, the prosecuting witness, Mack Layton, and three or four friends of his were in a saloon known as the Botkin saloon in Versailles. At the moment when the appellant entered the saloon, Layton and his friends were examining some kind of puzzle when appellant, walked up and rested his weight upon Layton and looked over at the puzzle. Whereupon Layton pushed him and told him that there was plenty of room without pushing him. Appellant answered, "O go to h—l." Layton picked up a salt stand, threw it at appellant striking him on the head. It bounced, struck the wall and fell to the floor breaking in pieces. Appellant then started toward Layton. Botkin, the saloon keeper, then ordered him out of the house. He went out of the back door into the alley and returned to the door and said to Layton, "you wont come out here and do that." Botkin again made him go away. He soon returned to the door and said to Layton, "you come out here and I'll show you what I'll do to you." Layton immediately went out and they engaged in a fight, appellant cutting Layton on the cheek near the ear. Layton was not confined to his bed by reason of his wound, but it was serious enough to require being sewed up by the doctor. This in substance was proven by four or five witnesses. The appellant agreeing to it, except he claimed that he did not know what took place between the time he was struck with the salt stand and the time when Layton reached him in the alleyway when they commenced the fight, and said he only cut him with the knife to defend himself.

If the appellant was conscious of his acts in calling and daring Layton out into the alleyway to fight, he can not claim a case of self defense. This the jury evidently believed. If he had used the knife at the moment when the salt stand was thrown, the case would be different. The appellant contends that the court failed in its instruction to use the word "willfully." In this, he is mistaken. The court said to the jury, "if they believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant in this county and before the finding of the indictment herein did willfully and maliciously cut and wound one Mack Layton with a knife, they ought to find him guilty; guilty of malicious cutting and wounding, if the same was done feloniously, with malice aforethought and with intent to kill the said Layton." This instruction was more favorable to the appellant than he was entitled to. The words "feloniously" and "with malice aforethought" were improperly used in the instructions and unfavorable to the Commonwealth. This prosecution was under the statutory offense and defined in section 1166 of the Statutes.

The court gave an instruction on sudden heat and passion and one directing the jury to find him guilty of the lesser offense if they had any doubt of the offense he was guilty of and also one on self-defense in the usual form and the usual instruction on reasonable doubt. The court told the jury that they should find the defendant guilty of cutting in sudden heat and passion if the same was done in sudden heat and passion and without previous malice. This instruction was condemned by this court in the case of Violett v. Commonwealth, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 1720. In that case the court said: "It will be observed that the instruction of the court defining the offense does not follow the language of the statute. By the instruction of the court, the offense consists in shooting in sudden heat and passion without previous malice. By the statute, it consists in shooting in a sudden affray or in sudden heat and passion without previous malice and not in self-defense."

The words "in sudden affray" are not synonymous with the words "in sudden heat and passion," the statutory offense is, therefore, different from that defined in the instruction.

Section 1166 defines the statutory offense of the willful and malicious shooting or cutting of another with the intent to kill. Section 1243 of the statutes defines the offense of shooting or cutting another in a sudden affray or in sudden heat and passion and the court in its instructions should have defined these offenses as herein stated. (Hardin v. Commonwealth, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 1540.)

For these reasons the judgment of the lower court is reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings consistent herewith.

CITY OF COVINGTON v. ASMAN.

(Filed April 14, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Damages—Appeal—In an action for damages against a city for injuries sustained in consequence of a defective sidewalk, upon a return of the case to the lower court upon a former appeal, the instructions meeting the requirements of the law, and the evidence authorizing the verdict against the city, such verdict upon a second appeal will not be disturbed.

F. J. Hanlon for appellant.

B. F. Graziana for appellee.

Appeal from Kenton Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

On the night of the 4th of September, 1900, the appellee, Emma Asman, while walking along the sidewalk of one of the streets of the city of Covington, stepped into a hole therein, by which she was thrown down, severely wrenching and spraining her ankle, inflicting serious bodily injury upon her, and from which she suffered great pain. To recover damages for this injury, she instituted this action. This is the second appeal of the case; the opinion on the first appeal is contained in the 24th volume Ky. Law Rep., 415.

Upon the first appeal, the judgment was reversed, because the instructions did not submit to the jury, for their determination, whether the sidewalk, at the time and the place the injury occurred, was in a reasonably safe condition for the use of persons of ordinary care and prudence. Upon the return of the case to the lower court, a second trial resulted in a verdict for the appellee for the sum of $1,500. The instructions of the learned trial judge were amended to meet the requirements of the opinion on the first appeal, and contain a correct exposition of the law applicable to the case. The evidence upon the second trial was substantially that produced upon the first, except that it tendered to show that appellee's injury was greater, and of a more permanent nature, than at first supposed. The facts of this case and the rules of law flowing therefrom are fully set out in the former opinion, and it is not necessary, therefore, that they be repeated here. A careful reading of the record convinces us that the appellee was entitled to the verdict awarded her by the jury.

The judgment is affirmed.

DAVIS v. BOONE COUNTY DEPOSIT BANK, &c.

(Filed April 14, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Pleading—Bills of exchange—In an action upon a note by a bank which it had discounted, the allegation in the petition that "The said obligation was during the business hours of this plaintiff, at its regular place of business, and while the said obligation was alive, and before the maturity thereof" discounted at, by and to this plaintiff" was sufficiently explicit, the term

"discounted" having a well-defined legal meaning, which involved the meaning that the note had been bought by the bank and paid for.

J. G. Vallandigham and John A. Lee for appellant.

H. G. Botts for appellee.

Appeal from Owen Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

The record establishes the fact that appellant executed to appellees, Swope & Hartsough, a negotiable note which before its maturity, was discounted by the appellee bank.

The discounting was for value in the usual course of the bank's business.

Appellant defended the suit by denying that the note was discounted, and by pleading that it had been procured by the payees' fraudulent misrepresentations, and was without consideration. All the evidence showing that the note had been discounted as stated, there being no conflict on this point, the court properly instructed the jury peremptorily to find for the bank. The only attempt in the record to charge the bank with notice of the infirmity of the paper was the claim that its attorney, who was the same president of the corporation for whose benefit the note is alleged to have been taken, was in a position to know, and presumably knew of the lack of consideration. Even if it be conceded that the attorney actually knew of the facts alleged in the answer as constituting the fraud perpetrated on appellant by the payees of the note, the facts show, as far as they show anything on that point, that the attorney's interest was hostile to that bank, and, therefore, is no presumption that he gave the bank the information on that subject that he might have had. This evidence alone was not enough to charge the bank with notice. The petition alleged: "The said obligation was during the business hours of this plaintiff, at its regular place of business, and while the said obligation was alive, and before the maturity thereof, discounted at, by and to this plaintiff, and it has ever since been and now is the sole, only, and exclusive owner thereof."

It is complained that this averment is defective, and fails to show a discounting of the note so as to place it upon the footing of a foreign bill of exchange under the Statute, section 483, because it does not state when or how the note was discounted, nor the consideration paid for it. We are of opinion that the averment was sufficiently explicit, the term "discounted" having a well known legal definition, which involved the statement that the note had been bought by the bank and paid for, it deducting and reserving interest. The word discount has as true illegal significance, and is as well understood as the word "paid." The motion to make the petition more definite and specific on this point was properly overruled.

In an amended answer appellant sought to make his answer a cross petition against the payees of the note, who had discounted it to the bank, namely Swope & Hartsough, claiming that if it should develop that the note in fact had been discounted by the bank so as to cut off appellant's defense, then appellant should be allowed to recover against the payees whatever judgment might be recovered against him by the bank. The circuit court dismissed this cross petition without prejudice, and we think properly so. Until the maker of the note, appellant had been adjudged to pay it to the bank, or had paid it, he had no cause of action against the original payees for their alleged fraud; his cause of action had not accrued at the time he tendered the cross petition.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

BOARD OF PARK COMMISSIONERS OF THE CITY OF LOUISVILLE
v. MARRETT.

(Filed April 13, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Recitals in deed—Consideration—Estoppel—The appellee, by a clause in his deed to appellants, located the Demange fourteen acres, which appellants had previously purchased out of the same survey, as having seven acres lying south of it, which necessarily makes the tract he sold appellants adjoin the Demange tract; the consideration for the deed was $2,250, and, presumably this consideration was paid for all that the deed conveyed, and by his deed appellee is estopped to say that Demange fourteen acres does not lie north of and adjoining the seven acres as he now contends. On the evidence the court should have peremptorily instructed the jury to find for the defendant (now appellant).

Kohn, Baird & Spindle, H. L. Stone, C. M. Lindsay and R. L. Greene for appellant.

A. E. Willson and M. B. Gifford for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Common Pleas Branch, Third Division.

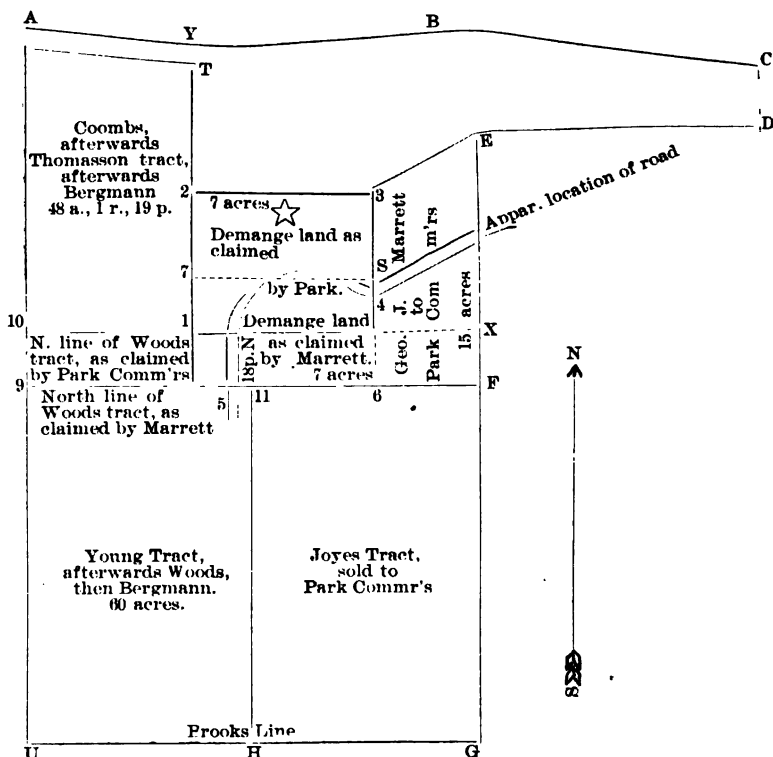

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

Roman Marrett owned a tract of land in Jefferson county conveyed to him in 1845 by Stephen Sanders, who bought it at a commissioner's sale in a chancery action to foreclose a mortgage given by William Sanders in 1836, the tract conveyed to Marrett being known as lot 12 in that sale, the whole tract consisting of 363 acres and being cut up into smaller tracts for the purposes of sale. Sanders had sold 100 acres to Walter Young, and the remainder of the land not paying the mortgage debt, 60 acres on the north end of the Young land was sold and purchased by Churchill, who conveyed it to James Woods. On August 25, 1856, Marrett conveyed fourteen acres off his tract to his sister, Rose Demange, and on September 29, 1866, he conveyed to his son, the appellee, George Marrett, the tract conveyed to him, less the land conveyed to his sister. Rose Demange on July 8, 1891, conveyed her tract to the board of park commissioners of the city of Louisville, who had previously bought from Patrick Joyes a tract lying south of it, and about the same time or a little afterward bought from George Marrett fifteen acres lying east of the Demange tract. This controversy turns on the proper location of the Demange tract of fourteen acres, which in the deed to her is 'bounded as follows:

"Beginning at said Marrett's corner in James Woods' line, also corner to Wm. P. Thomasson, a stake, and running thence with said Thomasson's line north 32 poles to a stake; thence east 70 poles to a stake; thence south 32 poles to a stake on the side of a hill in said Woods' line; thence with said line west 70 poles to the beginning."

Thomasson's land lay west of Marrett's and north of the Woods tract. The situation is shown on the following map on which the Marrett tract is represented, as claimed by appellee, by the lines A, Y, B, C, D, E, F, 6, 5, 7, T, A, the Thomasson tract lying west of it, the Woods tract south of Thomasson's, the Joyes tract east of Woods and the Demange tract, as claimed by appellee, being represented by the lines 5, 6, 8, 7:

On the other hand, appellants maintain that the Demange tract was actually located on the lines 1, 4, 8, 2. The controversy is over the seven acres embraced within the lines 2, 3, 8, 7. If the line 2, 3, is the north line of the Demange tract, the land in controversy is the property of appellant. But if the north line of the Demange tract is from 7 to 8, the seven acres is the property of appellee. The proof shows that when the park commissioners bought the land of Mrs. Demange, both she and George Marrett showed them the lines of her tract as claimed by the park commissioners and indicated on the map by 1, 4, 8, 2. The corners were pointed out at 2 and at 8 as well as at 1 and 4, and there was no question then as to this being her land. It was surveyed by a surveyor employed by the park commissioners and Marrett also pointed out to him the corners. Mrs. Marrett testifies that her brother sold her to the line 2, 8, and that she had always held up to this line, which included some apple trees which were recognized as hers. About the time of the trade with Mrs. Demange the park commissioners were on a trade with Marrett for fifteen acres of his land lying east of her tract, and when this land was surveyed out it was discovered that the calls of Marrett's deed took him from E to F and from T to 5. He then set up claim to the park commissioners that his line ran from 5 to F and not from 1 to X, as had been supposed. The line J, H, G is established and undisputed. The Joyes deed called to run 178 poles from this line and so did the Woods deed. One hundred and seventy-eight poles will take you to the line 10, 1, X. It will thus be seen that there was a lap between the deeds. The park commissioners were claiming up to the line 1, X, so when Marrett and wife made them a deed for the fifteen acres embraced within the lines 8, E, F, 6, these words were embraced in the deed: "Also convey without warranty all their interest in a tract of land of about seven acres lying immediately south and adjoining the south line of the fourteen acres heretofore conveyed by Rose Demange to the said second party by deed dated July 8, 1891, and recorded in deed book 817, page —, Jefferson county clerk's office."

The consideration for the deed was $2,250. On the trial of the case Marrett introduced proof showing that his father and he had held up to the line F, 6; that a marked tree stood at 6, also at 11, and that from 11 westward to 9 there was an old fence, and the marks of the old fence row could still be seen upon the ground. After the survey was made of this line Marrett claimed it as the south line of his tract, and claimed that the Demange tract should be run out from the point 5 as the beginning corner. He showed that the point 6 is on the side of the hill, while 4 is near the foot of a ridge, and that a man who entered under Mrs. Demange had cut the timber down to the line 5, 6, and that this line was then recognized by those living on the Woods tract. On the other hand, appellants showed that after they bought the Demange tract and were cleaning it up, Marrett showed them the line 2, 8 as the north line of the Demange tract, but when in February, 1892, they began to put a fence along the line Marrett claimed the land as his, and forbade the building of the fence. The deed from Mrs. Demange to the park commissioners was made on July 8, 1891, and the deed from Marrett to them was made on July 16, 1891. The surveys had been made some time before the deeds were executed. It is conceded that the corner of Thomasson's tract is at 1. The point is marked by a stone which has been set there for years, and is undisputed. Thomasson claimed no land below the line 1, 10, and there was an old fence also along this line. The call of the Demange deed, beginning at Marrett's corner in James Woods' line, also corner at Thomasson's, must be at the point 1, unless we reject part of the description of this beginning corner. It is earnestly argued that this should be done, and that the parties at the time thought this corner was at 5 and intended the deed to begin at 5, being mistaken in supposing that Thomasson's corner was at 5. But whatever might be thought in this regard of the description contained in the deed made in 1856 to Mrs. Demange, it is perfectly clear that the description contained in her deed to the park commissioners, made just eight days before Marrett's deed to them, undoubtedly refers to the point 1 on the plat as its beginning corner. The proof shows not only that both she and George Marrett pointed out the corners of the land before it was bought, but that after this the park commissioners had the tract surveyed, and the deed was made by the survey and pursuant to it. To suppose that in this deed the parties referred to any other land than the tract indicated on the plat by the figures 1, 4, 3, 2, is to shut one's eyes to the facts. The description in the deed begins with these words: "Beginning at what was formerly Marrett's corner in James Woods", now G. T. Bergman's, line, at a stake." This corner of Bergman undoubtedly is at 1, and the proof leaves no question that this is the beginning point as contemplated by the parties in the deed which Mrs. Demange made to the park commissioners; and in the deed which Marrett made to the park commissioners, as shown above, only eight days afterwards he conveyed to them without warranty all his interest "in a tract of land of about seven acres lying immediately south and adjoining the south line of the fourteen acres," conveyed by Rose Demange. This seven acres can not be any other land than the seven acres shown on the map by the figures 1, 4, 6, 5, for there is no other seven acres south of and adjoining the south line of the Demange fourteen acres as described in her deed. Besides, George Marrett claimed no land south of the line 5, 6. He had made a survey by which he claimed the line 5, 6, F as his south line, and the proof leaves no doubt that the purpose of the clause quoted from his deed to the park commissioners was to settle all disputes between him and them as to the location of his south line. By this clause in his deed he located the Demange fourteen acres as having seven acres lying south of it. This necessarily makes the line 1, 4 the south line of the Demange tract. The tract had been surveyed and had been conveyed on the idea that the line 1, 4 was its south line, and his quit claim of the land south of this line, describing it as adjoining the Demange land on the south, could not have been understood by the park commissioners as meaning anything less than that the line 1, 4 was the south line of the Demange tract. He testified on the trial that he did not understand this clause of the deed to amount to anything, and received no consideration for it. But both the parties with whom the transaction was had are dead, and he can not testify for himself as to any transaction with a person who is dead. The consideration for the deed was $2,250 in hand paid, and presumably this consideration was paid for all that the deed conveyed. We, therefore, conclude that by his deed he is estopped to claim the land indicated on the plat by the figures 1, 4, 6, 5, or to say that the Rose Demange fourteen acres does not lie north of and adjoining this seven acres; for if the Demange fourteen acres included this seven acres as he now contends, it could not have been described in the deed as lying south of and adjoining the Demange fourteen acres.

The court should, therefore, at the conclusion of the evidence have peremptorily instructed the jury to find for the defendant.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded for further proceedings consistent herewith.

MULDOON v. MERIWETHER.

Plaintiff declared in special assumpsit that defendant promised to pay him $500 for procuring a settlement of certain life policies. The proof showed that the agreement of settlement was procured, but before the money was paid defendant changed his mind and declined to carry it into effect.

1. Variance—Failure of proof—Under the provisions of Civil Code, sections 129, 130 and 131, this is not a failure of proof, but even if a variance, material or immaterial, as there was no objection or showing made to the court on that score, it is waived by such failure.

2. Burden of proof—The allegations of the petition were denied and an affirmative defense interposed upon which an issue was joined. If there had been no proof introduced plaintiff would have lost and, therefore, had the burden of proof and closing argument.

3. Errors not excepted to—The motion for a new trial did not complain of the instructions given by the court nor of the court's refusal to give instructions asked by appellant except as to the peremptory instruction. We can not, therefore, pass upon alleged errors in the giving and refusing instructions other than the peremptory.

Chatterson & Blitz for appellant.

B. F. Washer and Chas. H. Shield for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Common Pleas Branch, First Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

The motion for a new trial in the circuit court did not complain of the instructions given by the court, nor of the court's refusal to give instructions asked by appellant, except as to the peremptory instruction. We can not, therefore, pass upon alleged errors of the trial court in the giving and refusing of instructions, other than the peremptory.

Appellant contends that there was a material variance between the petition and the proof, and that the peremptory instruction asked for at the close of the evidence should have been allowed. Plaintiff declared in special assumpsit that defendant promised to pay him $500 for procuring a settlement of certain life policies held in the Mutual Life Insurance Co. of Kentucky by defendant. The proof for plaintiff showed that the agreement of settlement between defendant and the insurance company was procured, but before the money was paid defendant changed his mind, and declined to carry it into effect. The money was not actually paid defendant under the settlement.

Section 129 of the Civil Code provides that no variance between pleadings and proof is material, which does not mislead a party to his prejudice in maintaining his action or defense upon the merits. Before a party can claim the benefit of that provision as to a material variance by the terms of the section, he must satisfy the court of the prejudicial effect of the surprise, and then the court must allow amendments to pleadings so as to conform to the facts, on such terms as may be just. By section 130 Id., if the variance is immaterial the court may direct the fact to be found according to the evidence. By section 131, Id., "If, however, the allegation of the claim or defense, to which the proof is directed, be unproved, not in some particular or particulars only, but in its general scope and meaning, it is not to be deemed a case of variance within the last two sections, but a failure of proof."

Under the definitions given, we are of opinion that this is not a case of failure of proof, but, even if a variance, material or immaterial, as there was no objection or showing made to the court on that score, it is waived by such failure. (Anderson v. Rogers, 1 Bush, 200; Gaines v. Deposit Bank, 10 Ky. Law Rep., 171; Woodcock v. Farrel, 1 Met., 437.)

The allegations of the petition in several material particulars were denied by the answer. In addition an affirmative defense was interposed, upon which an issue was joined. As the pleadings were framed, if there had been no evidence introduced, plaintiff would have lost, and, therefore, had the burden of proof and the closing argument. (Civil Code, section 526.)

Judgment affirmed, with damages.

COMMONWEALTH v. AYERS.

(Filed April 14, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Indictment—An indictment charging that the defendant in Daviess county before the finding of the indictment unlawfully, willfully, feloniously and maliciously shot at Tom Jackson with a pistol, a deadly weapon, intending to kill him, but without wounding him, said pistol being loaded with powder and bullets or some other hard substance, is good and sufficient.

Clifton J. Pratt, N. B. Hays and Loraine Mix for appellant.

Appeal from Daviess Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

The appellee, Andy Ayers, was indicted under section 1166 of the Kentucky Statutes for the offense of willfully and maliciously shooting at another without wounding.

The indictment is as follows: "The grand jury of Daviess county, in the name and by the authority of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, accuse Andy Ayers of the crime of unlawfully, willfully, feloniously and maliciously shooting at another with a pistol, a deadly weapon, intending to kill such person, but without wounding him. Committed in manner and form as follows, to wit, the said defendant did in the county of Daviess and before the finding of this indictment unlawfully, willfully, feloniously and maliciously shoot at Tom Jackson with a pistol, a deadly weapon, intending to kill him, but without wounding him. Said pistol was loaded with powder or bullets, or some other hard substance, contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the Commonwealth of Kentucky."

A general demurrer to this indictment was sustained by the trial court, and the Commonwealth has appealed.

Section 1166 of the Kentucky Statutes reads as follows: "If any person shall willfully and maliciously shoot at another without wounding * * * with a gun or other instrument loaded with leaden bullet or other substance * * * with the intention to kill, he shall be confined in the penitentiary not less than one nor more than five years."

The indictment charges every act essential to constitute the crime created by the statute and substantially follows its language, and is direct and certain as regards the party, the offense, the county and the circumstances of the offense as required by sections 122 and 124 of the Criminal Code, and was good and sufficient.

For reasons indicated the judgment of the trial court is reversed and cause remanded, with instructions to overrule the demurrer and for other proceedings consistent with this opinion.

ILLINOIS CENTRAL R. R. CO. v. JACKSON, &c.¶

(Filed April 14, 1904.)

1. Railroads—Mistake of agent in selling ticket—Passenger ejected before reaching destination—Action of conductor—Excessive verdict—Appellee, nineteen years of age, bought a ticket from Central City to Gilbertsville, on appellant's train, for $2.25. The agent, by mistake, gave him a ticket to Greenville. The conductor put him off at first station beyond Greenville, refusing to carry him further. Held—That the appellee is entitled to recover compensatory damages in which is included mortification and humiliation consequent upon the wrongful ejection, and a verdict for $350 will not be disturbed.

2. Special damage—Filing amended plea during trial—The court did not err in allowing appellee to file an amended plea for special damage during the trial, alleging loss of contract for labor.

3. Failure of appellant to offer instructions—The appellant was entitled to an instruction upon its theory of the case, but it did not offer one, and, therefore, can not complain of this error.

Jonson & Wickliffe, J. M. Dickinson and Pirtle, Trabue & Cox for appellant.

R. Y. Thomas for appellee.

Appeal from Muhlenberg Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

The appellee, by his next friend, brought this action against appellant for damages, alleging that he was wrongfully ejected from a passenger train on which he was being carried as a passenger by appellant. He recovered a judgment for $350, of which appellant complains.

The facts as they appear of record were, in substance, as follows: Appellee, who was about nineteen years of age, called for and paid for a ticket from Central City to Gilbertsville, Ky. He boarded one of appellant's trains, the conductor took up his ticket, and after passing Greenville, Ky., the first station after leaving Central City, the conductor called upon him again for a ticket, or his fare, which he did not furnish, and he was ejected from the train at Dupoy, the second station from his starting point. There is no dispute in the evidence that appellee for the price of $2.35 purchased a ticket which should have entitled him to ride to Gilbertsville. A ticket was delivered to him, which he testified he did not understand; that it had the name of all the stations on it, and was not straight on one edge. The proof shows that it was known as a "simplex ticket."

Appellee's version of what occurred between him and the conductor after leaving Greenville is in substance as follows: The conductor asked him for a ticket and he told the conductor that he had given him his ticket and that he was going to Gilbertsville. The conductor moved on a short distance in the aisle and then returned and said to appellee that he would have to pay his fare or get off of the train. Appellee again told him that he had given him his ticket which he had bought at Central City for Gilbertsville, and that he had paid $2.35 for it, and then the conductor used the following language: "And he said, I never; and I told him to look and see, and he said, 'no, by G—d,' he was running that train, and he took me by the arm and told me to get off, and the train stopped and he led me off."

He also told the conductor he did not have any money to pay another fare to Gilbertsville. Appellee stated further that he was on his way to Gilbertsville to meet a man with whom he had contracted to labor on his farm at the price of $20 per month during the crop season; that this man lived nine miles in the country from Gilbertsville and had promised to meet that train and take him to his home; that by his failure to go on this train he had lost this contract; that he had endeavored to get other work, but had failed for three months to get a place to labor. He further stated that on his return to Central City the agent had returned to him his $2.35.

Appellant admits that appellee had paid for a ticket to Gilbertsville, but that the agent at Central City, by mistake, gave him a ticket to Greenville. The conductor's version of what took place between himself and appellee was in substance as follows: He stated that when he took up appellee's ticket, he announced the name "Greenville," but that he did not know whether or not appellee heard it; that after leaving Greenville he asked appellee for a ticket or fare. Appellee replied that he had given him a ticket which entitled him to be carried to Gilbertsville. The conductor said to him that he was mistaken; that it was possible that the agent at Central City had made a mistake in giving him the ticket to Greenville, and then offered to let appellee ride to Nortonville without charge, and he (conductor) would then ascertain whether the agent at Central City had sold appellee a ticket to Gilbertsville, and, if so, he would carry him on to that point. Appellee refused this offer, stating that he would get off at Dupoy, as he had acquaintances there, but that all were strangers to him at Nortonville. When the train arrived at Dupoy, appellee got off; that he did not touch or insult appellee; did not use the language attributed to him by appellee, or any similar language. Appellee, in rebuttal, testified that the conductor did not say anything about a possible mistake of the agent at Central City in selling and delivering him a ticket, nor offer to take him on to Nortonville; that there was not anything said of that kind or character, nor did he say he would get off at Dupoy for the reason that he had acquaintances there, or anything like that. He stated that he had never been to Dupoy in his life before that occasion, and all who lived there were strangers to him.

Appellant first complains of the action of the lower court in allowing an amended petition to be filed during the trial, in which it was alleged that, by reason of his being put off of this train, he lost his contract for labor, and asked special damages by reason thereof. The only limitation upon the discretion of the court in allowing amended pleadings is that they must be in furtherance of justice and must not change substantially the claim or defense. This court has in several cases decided that the lower court did not abuse its discretion in allowing amended pleadings to be filed during the trial, and in one case, at least, approved the action of the lower court in permitting an amended petition to be filed after all evidence had been introduced, and the court had instructed the jury. (Section 184, Civil Code; Kearney v. City of Covington, 1 Met., 339; 15 B. M., 564 and 91 Ky., 368-444.) The amendment in this case set forth an item of special damage, and if the appellant had made it known to the court by affidavit or otherwise that it could not proceed with the trial, that it desired time to investigate the matter set forth in the amended pleading, we have no doubt that the court would have granted its request. But the appellant, on the filing of this amended petition, did not ask for a continuance, or for further time for preparation; therefore, it has no cause for complaint. At the conclusion of the evidence for the appellee, and again when all the evidence had been introduced, the appellant offered and asked the court to give a peremptory instruction to the jury to find for it, which the court refused. Under the proof, appellant was bound to pay appellee at least actual compensation for the reason that it admitted it made a contract with appellee and received the fare to transport him to Gilbertsville on that day and failed and refused to do so. But it says that its conductor had the right to put him off of the train at Dupoy for the reason that the ticket he delivered was for Greenville. Granting this to be true, yet appellant is not relieved from its contract, for the reason that it was the fault or wrong of the appellant, by its agent, in giving him the ticket to Greenville, instead of to Gilbertsville. There is no pretense that appellee committed any wrong or mistake. As between the conductor and appellee, the conductor may properly rely upon the ticket as it reads, and if it read to Greenville, and he the (conductor) did not know that it was a mistake, then he had the right to eject the appellee from the train, and his action therein could not be regarded as tortious, unless accompanied with unreasonable and unnecessary force or insult. (104 Ky., 28.) This was a case very similar to the one at bar, and the court said: "Nevertheless it is generally, and, we think, properly, held that the ticket accepted by the passenger must usually be treated as conclusive evidence of the passenger's rights as between him and the conductor, leaving the passenger to his action against the carrier if he had not been given such a ticket as his contract called for."

Again the court, after discussing and deciding that in such a case an instruction on exemplary damages should not have been given in that case, said: "The action is essentially and in form ex contractu, and the recovery, if any, must necessarily be limited to compensatory damages, and we do not think the jury were in fact instructed, or could have fairly understood, that they were authorized to find exemplary damages; for the mortification and humiliation consequent upon the wrongful ejection of a passenger from a railroad train is a proper element of damages recoverable for a breach of contract like the present." To the same effect is the case of L. & E. Ry. Co. v. Lyons, & Co., 21 Ky. Law Rep., 778.

These cases decide in substance that the conductor is absolved from the payment of any damage in ejecting a passenger in accordance with the terms of his ticket, provided that the ejection is not accompanied with unreasonable and unnecessary force or insult, but in such case the passenger's right of action is against the carrier and the agent who gave him the erroneous ticket, or either, as he may elect. The criterion of recovery is limited to compensatory damages in which is included mortification and humiliation consequent upon the wrongful ejection. The instructions given by the court conform to these views, at least there is no material and prejudicial error in them. The appellant, however, was entitled to an instruction upon its theory of the case, but it did not offer one, and, therefore, it can not complain of this error. In the case of L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Harrod, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 251, the court said: "The rule upon this question is that where a party to a civil case fails to offer an instruction upon a point of law involved in a case, it is not error in the court to fail to instruct on that point; but if a party offers an instruction upon some point of law involved, which is refused by the court because of defect of form or substance, then it is the duty of the court to prepare, or have prepared, and give a proper instruction on that point."

The appellant also complains of the amount of the judgment. The jury saw and heard the witnesses and from its verdict it must have accepted appellee's version of the matter as true, and we do not feel authorized to disturb their verdict. It certainly was very insulting on the part of the conductor to dispute in emphatic language what appellee had said about buying the ticket and to refuse to look among the tickets he had taken up to ascertain if he could find the one appellee had given him, but instead of that to answer him with the words related by the appellee, and then lead him off the train from a coach comparatively full of people.

Perceiving no error prejudicial to the substantial rights of the appellant, the judgment of the lower court is affirmed, with damages.

GALBRAITH v. STARKS.

(Filed April 14, 1904.)

1. Plea of payment—On an action for an indebtedness represented by the promissory notes of the appellant in the sum of about $5,000, appellant filed a plea of payment by way of counterclaim which the trial court dismissed, and adjudged the recovery by appellee of the amount sued for. Held—That while shopkeepers or tradesmen's books are held admissible as substantive evidence to show original entries made therein in the regular course of business, an account which has been transcribed and does not purport to be anything more than chronological entries of various payments alleged to have been made by appellant to appellee upon the land notes, are not competent evidence. Meagerness of evidence that leaves the mind unsatisfied is a failure of evidence. The trial court properly dismissed the counterclaim.

J. R. Mallory and Perkins & Trimble for appellant.

Browder & Browder for appellee.

Appeal from Todd Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

Beginning about 1886, and down to 1899, appellant became indebted to appellee in numerous transactions, all represented by the former's promissory notes, in the sum of approximately $5,000. Three of the transactions were the purchase of real estate; another the purchase of a half interest in a drug store, owned by the parties as copartners; others rent of house. In the purchase of the interest in the store, appellant admitted by writing then signed that the notes and accounts owing the firm, amounting to the sum of $885 belonged to appellee, but that appellant was to collect them in the firm's name, and pay over to appellee the sums collected.

Numerous payments were made, at irregular intervals, upon this gross indebtedness. All of the notes were surrendered to appellee as having been paid, except one of $400, subject to certain endorsed credits, which was retained by appellee, and to collect which and enforce the lien reserved upon a lot, this suit was brought. Appellant defended, pleading payment, and in addition seeking by counterclaim to recover of appellee $169.60, with interest, which he alleged he had overpaid. Although the various transactions had no connection one with another, it was asserted that payments were made indiscriminately by appellant to be applied on his indebtedness to appellee, and that it was so applied by the latter, extinguishing all the other debts, as well as the debt of which the note sued on was a part, and overpaying that debt as stated. An issue was tendered upon the plea, and the proof heard. The only witnesses were the two parties. The trial court dismissed the counterclaim, and adjudged the recovery by appellee of the amount sued for, thus finding against the plea of payment. If there was evidence enough to sustain or refute the plea the question would be one of fact. But we have come to the conclusion that there is not enough evidence for either purpose.

Able counsel have each presented theories of probability that are not without plausibility. Yet in accepting either we would be forced to resort solely to conjecture—conjecture, it is true, that seems more or less probable. This state leads to a closer analysis of the rules of evidence upon which the respective theories must in part rest. The burden of proof upon the whole case was upon appellant. Had he testified clearly of his own knowledge as to the facts upon which his counsel rely, his case might have been made out. So with appellee. But the payments referred to were mostly made ten or twelve years before the parties came to testify. Their recollections as to those transactions are shown to have been very misty, and far from satisfactory. They were merchants, living in different communities. Nearly all the payments were by bank checks. That is, appellant had drawn certain checks on his banker in favor of appellee, but not stating in them the consideration. Some few payments are claimed to have been made in money. Appellant contends that as he has shown an aggregate of payments of money (by checks and otherwise) to appellee within the period since the debts were created, equal to or in excess of his indebtedness to appellee, he has done enough to shift the burden to appellee to show that they, or some of them, were not made on these notes.

"Payment" is a term of art as used in law. It involves more than the passing of money or its accepted equivalent, from one to another. The acceptance of money or other thing of value in satisfaction of a debt, or in exchange for labor, goods or other commodity, will be a payment, where it was so intended by the payor. Generally there must be something shown in addition to the mere passing of money from one to the other. True, that fact may be a strong circumstance in determining whether it was intended and accepted as a payment on a debt. And other slight circumstances might satisfy the judicial inquiry as to the intent and purpose of such transaction. But it is not unusual for persons indebted to have other transactions with their creditors, and to pay money for something else, than upon the pre-existing debt. Whether there was or not a payment made upon a particular debt, may frequently be of vast importance to the parties as affecting other rights, as well as the rights of others. So that the intent of the parties becomes a material element in determining whether a transaction is a payment. The one who asserts that it is, must prove it. There is no reason for a rule that would change the law of evidence where a payee of money happens to be a creditor of the payor, so as to impose upon the former a burden, and relieve the latter of it, contrary to the general rule in all other cases. But going further in this case, it was shown, as has been indicated, that appellant undertook in 1888 to collect some $885 in notes and accounts for appellee, and to transmit him the money so collected. Appellee says appellant did collect some of this money and paid it, and that some of the payments now sought to be applied to the land notes sued on were in reality made upon account of those collections. Appellee naturally has no means of knowing actually whether such collections had been made, for he does not claim to have been present. Appellant at first denied that appellee owned the firm notes and accounts referred to, but evidently that was a case of forgetfulness. The writings, which he admitted upon confrontation, show the contrary. Then he testified that he did not recollect whether he had collected any of those debts. Indeed, he said he remembered nothing whatever about it. But he agreed that if his books would show anything on the subject, that when he returned to his home from giving the deposition he would transmit to the notary a statement from them showing the facts. Some weeks later he did write the notary a letter which was attached to his deposition, in which he admitted having found that he had collected certain of the notes, etc., amounting to less than $100, but added that another book was lost, making the not unreasonable impression that the lost book covered also a part of the period during which such collections, if made, would have been entered. Appellant kept a sort of system of books; appellee does not appear to have kept any memorandum at all of these transactions, more than the notes and the written contracts. So far, all will depend upon the requirement of the law as to proving payment. If when appellant, the debtor, shows that money had passed from him to appellee, the creditor, that it must be credited on the former's existing indebtedness, unless the creditor can show satisfactorily that it was for something else, then appellee has made out his case. On the other hand, if appellant should be required to show in addition to the passing of the money, that it was to be applied on this indebtedness (or at least that this was all his indebtedness to appellee), then he has failed. While such fact of payment might be proved by circumstances, from which the law would presume the intent and purpose of acceptance, here, however, instead of the circumstances pointing to such payment, they rather negative it, in several particulars. For example, when it was shown that appellant undertook to collect the old firm notes for appellee, and did in fact collect some of them, and thereafter made remittances unexplained, the law will apply, and will allow appellee to apply, as he has evidently done, such remittances in discharge of the collections, rather than in payment of the remitter's own debts. In answer to the thought that only about $.00 of the payments can be so accounted for from the evidence, we must remember that it was within appellant's power, and it was his duty as the agent of appellee, to render a complete statement of those collections; or, if because of the loss of certain of his books, he could not render such statement, still, he fails to thereafter give any explanation, or offer himself as a witness on that point, that he might be examined under oath touching the loss of the book, the period it covered, and whether, if it was only a ledger, a journal or cash book, showing the same things was not in his possession, from which, though with additional labor, the truth might have been gathered. Nor does he disclose how the account was kept in his books. He elects instead to leave those matters in doubt, relying upon the absence of such evidence, the admitted inability of his adversary to meet the point, and the supposed state of the law that under these circumstances his unexplained remittances would be credited on his individual debts to appellee. He who fails to produce the best evidence which is within his control, or who fails in his duty to keep an account, whereby confusion to his own advantage and to the detriment of his adversary ensues, can claim no favorable presumption from his lapses. On the contrary, the law presumes that the best evidence if produced would be adverse to him. Applying that familiar and just rule in connection with what has been said above, the failure of appellant's proof becomes even more apparent.

Though appellant testified that he had paid the whole of his indebtedness, and stated that he so testified after having refreshed his recollection by an inspection of his books, we are satisfied that his statements are more in the nature of deductions drawn after examining his books, than a refreshed recollection of the original events. This is made apparent to us by the manner of testifying and many statements of the witness. This brings us to consider the value of certain book entries proved in the record, and seemingly relied on as substantive evidence to sustain appellant's plea. Though it is not made perfectly clear, we gather that appellant had entered upon a ledger book an account showing certain payments made upon the various debts of which the note sued on is one. The account, as transcribed, is by no means complete as an account. It does not purport to be anything more than chronoligical entries of various payments alleged to have been made by appellant to appellee upon the land notes. As to their value as private memoranda we are not here concerned. It is as to their relevancy as probative evidence. Appellant testified that they were made by him at the time, and were original entries. Still we are of the opinion that they are not competent evidence. Shopkeeper's or tradesmen's books, the original entries made therein contemporaneously, and in the regular course of business, are admissible, under a rule of necessity, as substantive evidence of the facts of the shopkeeper's transactions with his customers in relation to that particular business. (Poor, &c. v. Robinson, 13 Bush, 290; 1 Greenleaf on Evidence, sections 117-118.) It is unnecessary to restate the reasoning underlying the adoption of this rule. Excepting the case of persons whose business it is to pay out money, such as bankers and the like, we do not know that it has been extended in this State further. Indeed it has been intimated by this court (Brannin v. Force, 12 B. Monroe, 508) that it was limited to such. It was no part of appellant's merchandising business to buy real estate, and to pay for it in installments. Such entries on his books, though made contemporaneously, were utterly foreign to his mercantile affairs, and can not, therefore, be said to have been entries made by a merchant or tradesman in the usual course of his business; and consequently they are not entitled to the presumptions of regularity and of freedom from purposeful fabrication that the routine entries of merchandise sales are conceded in law. Section 606, subsection 7, Civil Code, is but declaratory of, the common law on this point, with the addition that a party in interest may testify concerning such entries even as against one who is dead, or under certain disabilities. The account does not prove anything. As the plea of payment was not sufficiently supported, the circuit court was right in not hazarding a guess as to what the truth concerning it was. Meagreness of evidence that leaves the mind unsatisfied is a failure of evidence.

The judgment should be affirmed.

GERMAN v. BOARD OF TRUSTEES OF HIGHLAND PARK GRADED COMMON SCHOOL DISTRICT, NO. 46.

(Filed April 14, 1904.)

Duties and compensation of treasurer of school board—It appearing that appellant only qualified to perform the duties as treasurer of the board, required by section 4443, Kentucky Statutes, it was no part of his duty to post election notices; to make statements of receipts and disbursements (except with regard to taxes); to get up supplies for the school; purchase the land for the school building; to attend to all contracts for the erection of school buildings and foundation work, or to attend to the correspondence of the district, and a demurrer to his claim for such services was properly sustained.

O'Neal & O'Neal and Isaac T. Woodson for appellant.

Weaver & Bensinger for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Common Pleas Branch, Second Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

This action was instituted by appellant to recover of appellee damages for a breach of contract in failing to allow him to perform duties devolving upon him as treasurer. The petition contained four paragraphs. Appellee filed a demurrer to paragraphs Nos. 1, 2 and 4, which was sustained by the court.

The appellant, in effect, concedes that the court did not err in sustaining this demurrer, but contends that the court committed an error in sustaining a demurrer to his amended petition, in which it was, in substance, alleged that, in the month of May, 1897, he was appointed by the appellee as its treasurer, and that thereafter he executed bond with approved security as such treasurer, which bond was approved and accepted by the appellee, and he entered upon his duties as treasurer for the years 1897, 1898, 1899 and 1900; that he executed bond as such treasurer for each of the years named, and in each instance the bond was accepted and approved by the appellee; that he continued from the date of his first appointment to act as such treasurer until the 10th day of June, 1901, at which time appellee refused to allow him to act further in the full discharge of his duties. Appellant then uses the following language: "The plaintiff further states that it was his duty to, and he did, perform the duties as treasurer of said board in making out and posting all the election notices in said district annually, and making out itemized monthly statements of receipts and disbursements, and in attending annually to getting all the supplies required for the school in said district, and attending regularly all the meetings of the trustees and giving them information in regard to all steps taken annually, and attending to the purchase of the land for the new school building in the said district, and attending to all the contracts on said school building, including the foundation work, and keeping all the accounts, and attending to all the payments of claims against said district and attending to all the correspondence in reference to the business of said district and school, all of which was done and performed by the plaintiff in the discharge of his duties as treasurer aforesaid for each of the four years succeeding said appointment and qualification, and the said services were continued in the year 1901, in the making out and posting of the election notices in said district, all of which was done and performed at the special instance and request of the defendant, and accepted and ratified by defendant, and was of the reasonable value of the sum of $2,153, whereby defendant became justly indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $2,153, etc."

In the second paragraph of the amended petition the following averments occur: "The plaintiff further states that it was his duty and he did annually make out in writing six itemized reports, for said board, of his services in reference to the business of said board, and the proceedings in reference to the levy and collection of taxes for said district for the years 1897, 1898, 1899, 1900 and 1901; and one itemized tax list annually of the taxes assessed against the taxpayers of the said district for said years, which was reasonably worth $100 per annum for said reports and $20 per annum for said tax list; and in addition that he expended for postage stamps used in his said business as treasurer of said district and for said board for the years 1900 and 1901, the sum of $27.42, and in addition thereto that he performed services in August and September of the year 1902 as treasurer of said board, at the special instance and request of said defendant, amounting to the value of $55, namely, in examining records and making out tax bills for delinquent taxes several years prior thereto, which was done and performed at the instance and request of said defendant, and was of the reasonable value of $55. An itemized statement of said services is filed herewith as part hereof, and marked 'statement No. 2,' and on said services claimed for in this paragraph (the total of which amounts to $682.42, which was the just and reasonable value of said services, and to which amount the defendant became justly indebted to the plaintiff, all of which is due and unpaid except that), the defendant paid to plaintiff the sum of $280 in cash, and allowed the plaintiff to retain $217.22 in penalties collected from delinquent taxpayers, leaving due and unpaid plaintiff of said $682.42, a balance of $185.22, all of which is due and wholly unpaid, and said defendant has failed and refused to pay to plaintiff said balance."

It is evident that appellant bases his right of recovery on the fact that he performed the services for which he charges as treasurer of appellee, and he claims that by virtue of section 4479 of Kentucky Statutes he is entitled to the sums charged, to wit: For making out the election notices and posting same in said district annually for four years $7 per annum, $28; for making out itemized monthly statements of receipts and disbursements annually for four years at $140 per annum, $560; for tending to all the supplies required for school of said district annually for four years at $25 per annum, $100; for attending all the regular meetings of trustees, and posting them so that they would act legally in all steps taken annually for four years, at $60 per annum, $240; for attending to the purchase of the land for the new school building, $45; for attending to all the contracts on said school building, including the foundation, annually for three years at $120 per annum, $360; for keeping all the accounts and attending to all the payments of said district annually for four years at $175 per annum, $700; for attending to all the correspondence of said district annually for four years at $30 per annum, $120. Total, $2,160. For making out six itemized reports annually for 1897, 1898, 1899, 1900 and 1901, at $100 per annum, $500; for making out one itemized tax list annually for 1897, 1898, 1899, 1900 and 1901, at $20 per annum, $100; for postage stamps used for said school district for 1900 and 1901, $27.42; for services rendered in August and September, 1902, $55. Total, $682.42. By cash, $280. Balance due, $402.42. Penalties collected, $217.20. Balance, $185.22.

Appellee contends that this section was repealed by the revision of the school laws of 1894, in which it claims that section 4443 of the Kentucky Statutes covers all the duties and compensation required of and allowed the treasurer of graded common school districts. We can not agree, upon this proposition, with the contention of either appellant or appellee. Sections 4443 and 4479 were both enacted and became parts of the general school law in the year 1893, one as section 79 and the other as section 115, in that act. They have both been re-enacted at each revision of the school law since that date. Section 4443 has been amended once in 1894 by allowing the treasurer the same fees as sheriffs in collecting taxes, to wit: Ten per cent. and also giving him the power to collect the taxes from delinquents. Before this amendment the treasurer was allowed only 6 per cent, and the sheriff was required to collect the delinquent taxes. In 1898 section 4443 was again amended by giving the trustees discretion to dispense with the services of a treasurer as provided by this section, and to make it the duty of the sheriff to collect the taxes and perform the duties of treasurer. Section 4448 does not conflict with section 4479. It only has reference to the collection of taxes and their disbursements, and the making of reports with reference thereto. It appears from the pleadings of appellant that he was appointed and executed bond under this section. It is not shown that he executed bond as required by section 4479. The bond he executed was executed to the board of trustees, and accepted and approved by them. Section 4479 requires that the treasurer authorized by this section, before he enters upon the duties of his office, shall, in the county court, execute bond with security approved by the court, payable to the Commonwealth of Kentucky for the use and benefit of the trustees, etc.

In our opinion these two sections relate to different matters. One person might be appointed to fill both positions, but in such event, before he could legally act and perform the duties, as required by both sections, he would be compelled to execute each of the bonds as required by the two sections. A person having executed only the bond, as required in section 4448, could not legally receive and disburse money received from the sale of bonds under the school law, or funds collected for the purpose of defraying the annual expenses of the school, or funds for the payment of the interest on such bonds, or for any money received by gift or devise for the benefit of the school. Such funds should be received and disbursed only by a person who had been appointed and executed the bond required by section 4479. It was for such services as these that section 4479 required that the trustees should pay the treasurer such sum as should be reasonable and just.

It appearing that appellant only qualified to perform the duties as required by section 4448, we are of the opinion that it was not any part of his duty as such treasurer to post election notices; to make statements of receipts and disbursements except with regard to taxes (and for this the statute fixes the compensation); to get up supplies for the school; purchase the land for the school building; to attend to all contracts for the erection of school buildings and foundation work, and to attend to the correspondence of the district. It appears that most all of the matters charged for by appellant, except the items referring to reports of receipts and disbursements, are things which the statute contemplated should have been performed by the trustees without expense to the district, and if the trustees employed appellant to perform these services, then it is a question between the trustees and appellant as individuals, and not as officials of the district. This question, however, is not before us, and we refrain from expressing any opinion upon it.

Wherefore, the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

GERMAN WASHINGTON LIFE INSURANCE ASSOCIATION v. CITY OF LOUISVILLE.

(Filed April 15, 1904—Not to be reported.)

G. L. Everbach, I. T. Woodson and Lane & Harrison for appellant.

H. L. Stone for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery Branch, First Division..

Judge Hobson delivered the following response to petition for rehearing:

We have read with interest the petition for rehearing and have reconsidered the questions raised, but are unable to see that any reason exists for modifying the opinion which we rendered herein. The clerical error in appellant's corporate name did not vitiate the tax bills. The sense is perfectly apparent. The city taxes in the same way as appellant all like corporations. The fact that as to other corporations unlike appellant a different system is devised does not affect it, as no injustice is thereby done it. The legislature may properly classify taxpayers in devising an equal system of taxation. No right of appellant under the Federal or State Constitution appears to have been violated. This question was considered on the original hearing, but omitted from the opinion.
The petition is overruled.

BOARD OF PUBLIC WORKS OF LOUISVILLE v. SELVAGE CONSTRUCTION CO.

(Filed April 15, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Contracts—Contracts which have been awarded by boards of public works of cities of the first class for the original construction of public ways are not required to be approved by the general council as a prerequisite to their validity.

H. L. Stone for appellant.

DuRelle & McHenry and Lane & Harrison for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery Branch, First Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

The sole question presented for adjudication by this record is whether or not contracts which have been awarded by boards of public works of cities of the first class, for the original construction of public ways, are required to be approved by the general council as a prerequisite to their validity. This question was answered in the negative by this court in the cases of Barfield v. Gleason, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 140, and Joyce v. Falls City Artificial Stone Co., 23 Ky. Law Rep., 1201. To the principle announced in these opinions we adhere.

Judgment affirmed.

COMMONWEALTH v. LOUISVILLE & EVANSVILLE PACKET CO.

(Filed April 15, 1904.)

1. Local option—Jurisdiction of Kentucky on Ohio river—Selling whisky on steamboat—A sale of spirituous liquors on a steamboat anchored on the Ohio river at the Cloverport, Ky., wharf, is in violation of the local option law in force in the Cloverport Magisterial District of Breckinridge county, Ky., the State of Kentucky having jurisdiction to the north shore of the Ohio river.

J. R. Layman and N. B. Hays for appellant.

Appeal from Breckinridge Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

The local option law is in force in the Cloverport Magisterial District of Breckinridge county. Appellee was indicted on the charge that it rented on its steamboat, known as the Henry Harley, in its possession and under its control, a room, bar and place to another, in which he sold spirituous, vinous and malt liquors, with its knowledge and consent, to Edward Gregory at the wharf in Cloverport while the boat was anchored to the wharf on the Ohio river. The defendant demurred to the indictment, and on the hearing of the demurrer it was agreed that the Cloverport Magisterial District is bounded as follows: "Beginning at a point on the Ohio river (here follow several calls); thence a straight line to the Hancock county line to William B. Beaty's residence; thence with the Hancock county line to the Ohio river; thence up said river to the beginning."

It was agreed that the boundary of the district should be considered on the demurrer as if set out in the indictment. The agreement also contained the following: "The town of Cloverport is located in the district on the Kentucky side of the river and is bounded on the north by said river, which is a navigable stream." The court sustained the demurrer and dismissed the indictment on the ground that the acts complained of being done on the Ohio river were not done within the Cloverport Magisterial District, as the lines of the district begin at a point on the Ohio river and in closing run to the river; thence up the river to the beginning. It is insisted for appellee that the judgment is right, and that the territorial limits of the district extend only to the river and do not include any part of it.

The boundary of Kentucky extends to the northern shore of the Ohio river a low-water mark. In the act of February 11, 1820, after the boundaries of the State were defined, it was enacted: "The sovereign power and jurisdiction of the Commonwealth of Kentucky extends to and over the entire soil and waters within the limits described in the preceding section, except so far as she may have ceded jurisdiction to the United States for national purposes. Each county in this Commonwealth, whose boundary is described in part by the Mississippi and Ohio rivers, shall be considered as bounded in that particular by the State line; and the islands thereof shall be within the respective counties holding the main land opposite thereto within this State; and the several counties and tribunals thereof shall hold and exercise jurisdiction accordingly." (Kentucky Statutes, section 198.)

By sections 1078-90, Kentucky Statutes, the several counties are required to be laid off into magisterial districts, and it was not contemplated that any portion of the county should be left out of the districts thus provided for, the statute requiring the commissioners in each case "to divide the county into not less than three nor more than eight justices' districts." In calling for the Ohio river as the northern boundary of the Cloverport district, which bordered on it, the commissioners followed the language used by the legislature in creating the counties bordering on the Ohio river, so far as we have seen. The district begins at a point on the Ohio river and runs thence to a given point in Breckinridge county. The beginning point is not fixed on the south bank of the river. The only designation is "on the Ohio river." The natural meaning of this is that the district line begins in the line of the county on its northern shore, for it can not be presumed that the commissioners intended to leave out any part of the county in the division which they made. The same construction must be given to the closing line "thence up said river to the beginning," for the line of the district runs to the river with the Hancock county line, and all that part of Breckinridge county next. Hancock was plainly intended to be embraced in this magisterial district. There is nothing in the calls to indicate that it was contemplated that the line of the district should stop short of the northern limit of the Hancock county line, and the contrary is shown to have been the intention by the last call which runs "thence up said river to the beginning," which is the point "on the Ohio river." In the case of patents calling to begin on a navigable stream and to run with it, the rule in this State is that the title to the bed of the river passes to the middle of the stream. (Lumber Co. v. Green, 57 Ky., 257; Miller v. Hepburn, 71 Ky., 826; Asher Lumber Co. v. Lunsford, 17 Ky. Law Rep., 245; Cockrell v. McQuinn, 90 Ky., 61.) But as the State of Kentucky includes the whole of the Ohio river to the northern shore at low-water mark, its subdivisions calling to begin on the river and run with it are not to be limited to the thread of the stream, but must go to the State line. In the construction of every document the aim of the court is to arrive at the intention of the makers, and give fair effect to it, and as the counties of the State bordering on the Ohio river extend to the northern limit of the State, the magisterial districts bordering on the river must be given the same limit, for it was manifestly not the purpose of the legislature that any part of a county should be left out and be not included in any of the districts. To illustrate: If an island was formed in the Ohio river between the upper and lower corners of the Cloverport district, would it be maintained that this island was not a part of the district? Or if in times of low water sand bars are left along the Kentucky shore, would it be said that these, though land in Kentucky and in Breckinridge county, belonging to the adjoining proprietors, are not in the district? The purpose of establishing magisterial districts is to secure police protection from local officers, and this is just as necessary on the river as on the land.

In Welsh v. State, 9 L. R. A., 664, the Supreme Court of Indiana affirmed a conviction where the defendant had been fined for selling whisky on the Ohio river in violation of the license laws of Indiana. The jurisdiction of Indiana and Kentucky on the river is concurrent, and no one can, with impunity, violate the laws of either State on the river.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded, with directions to overrule the demurrer to the indictment.

COMMONWEALTH v. CITIZENS NATIONAL BANK.

(Filed April 15, 1904.)

1. Taxation—Shares of national banks—Jurisdiction of county courts—Sheriffs—Omitted property—By Kentucky Statutes, section 4241, it is the duty of the sheriff or auditor's agent to have all omitted property listed for taxation, and when the assessor, under the act of March 10, 1900, fails to make the assessment of shares of stock in a national bank it was "omitted property," within the meaning of section 4241, and the county court has jurisdiction of the proceeding by the sheriff in the name of the Commonwealth.

2. Conflict of State law with Federal law—Section 5210, U. S. Rev. St., provides that the president and cashier of every national bank shall cause to be kept at all times a full and correct list of the shareholders in the bank, subject to the inspection of the officers authorized to assess taxes under State authority, and by Id., section 5219, the shares of stock in the bank may be included in the valuation of the personal property of the holder of the shares in assessing taxes imposed by authority of the State, provided, first, the taxation shall not be at a greater rate than is assessed upon moneyed capital of individuals, and, second, that shares owned by nonresidents of the State shall be taxed in the city or town where the bank is located and not elsewhere. Held—That the act of March 21, 1900, is not in conflict with the aforesaid acts of congress.

3. Subdivisions of the State—Counties, cities and towns are subdivisions of the State created for governmental purposes, and taxes levied by these subdivisions are levied by authority of the State.

4. Franchise—The franchise of the bank which is granted to it by the United States government, is not subject to taxation.

5. Penalty—A penalty may be properly imposed in the proceeding because the property was not listed with the assessor.

6. Agency—Notice to bank—Parties to proceeding—The bank by the act is made the agent of the shareholders and notice to the bank is notice to the shareholders within the meaning of section 4241. The president and cashier of the bank were properly made defendants to the proceeding, as it is made their duty to list the stock.

7. Limitation—Retrospective assessments are barred after five years from the time the property should have been assessed.

Robt. Harding and W. J. Price for appellant.

Robt. T. Quisenberry for appellee.

Appeal from Boyle Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

This proceeding was instituted in the Boyle County Court in the name of the Commonwealth by the sheriff of Boyle county to have the shares of stock of the Citizens' National Bank of Danville assessed for taxation for county purposes for the years 1892 1899, inclusive, under section 4241, Kentucky Statutes. The bank, its president and its cashier were made defendants. Their demurrer to the jurisdiction of the court and to the capacity of the plaintiffs to maintain the action was overruled, also a general demurrer to the proceedings. An answer was then filed, and the issues being made up, the court, after hearing the evidence, entered a judgment assessing the shares of stock as prayed. An appeal was taken to the circuit court, and there a judgment was rendered dismissing the proceeding, and the Commonwealth appeals.

The objection to the jurisdiction of the county court rests on the idea that section 4241 does not authorize the sheriff to have shares of bank stock which have been omitted listed for taxation. The section includes all omitted property. The objection to the jurisdiction of the county court was, therefore, not well taken; for while it was the duty of the assessor to make the assessment under the act of March 21, 1900, when he failed to do so the shares of stock were property omitted by the assessor within the meaning of section 4241. The demurrer to the capacity of the plaintiff to maintain the proceeding was also properly overruled; for the proceeding was in the name of the Commonwealth and instituted by the sheriff who is authorized by section 4941 to institute it. The statement filed contains the necessary averments, distinctly showing that the property had been omitted by the assessor of Boyle county and the board of supervisors and had not been taxed for the years named. It is insisted, however, that the act of March 21, 1900, is in conflict with the national bank act of the United States, and is to this extent void. The provisions of the national banking act relied on are as follows: "The president and cashier of every national banking association shall cause to be kept at all times a full and correct list of the names and residences of all the shareholders in the association, and the number of shares held by each, in the office where its business is transacted. Such list shall be subject to the inspection of all the shareholders and creditors of said association and the officers authorized to assess taxes under State authority, during business hours of each day in which business may be legally transacted. A copy of such list, on the first Monday of July of each year, verified by the oath of such president or cashier, shall be transmitted to the comptroller of the currency." (Section 5310, U. S. Revised Statutes.)

"Nothing herein shall prevent all the shares in any association from being included in the valuation of the personal property of the owner or holders of such shares, in assessing taxes imposed by authority of the State within which the association is located; but the legislature of each State may determine and direct the manner and place of taxing all the shares of national banking associations located within the State, subject only to the two restrictions, that the taxation shall not be at a greater rate than is assessed upon other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens of such State, and that the shares of any national banking association owned by nonresidents of any State shall be taxed in the city or town where the bank is located, and not elsewhere. Nothing herein shall be construed to exempt the real property or associations from either State, county or municipal taxes, to the same extent, according to its value, as other real property is taxed." (Section 5219.)

The act of March 21, 1900, is as follows: "Whereas, the Supreme Court of the United States has lately decided that article 3, chapter 103 of the acts of 1891, 1892 and 1893 is void and of no effect in so far as the same provides for the taxation of the franchise of national banks, in consequence of which decision there is not now and has not been since adoption of said article in 1892, any adequate mode of taxing national banks, while State banks are now and have been ever since 1892, taxable for all purposes State and local; therefore,

"Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky:

"1st. That the shares of stock in each national bank of this State, shall be subject to taxation for all State purposes and for the purposes of each county, city, town and taxing district in which the bank is located.

"2d. For purposes of the taxation provided for by the next preceding section, it shall be the duty of the president and cashier of the bank to list the said shares of stock with the assessing officers authorized to assess real estate for taxation, and the bank shall be and remain liable to the State, county, city, town and district for the taxes upon said shares of stock.

"3d. When any of said shares of stock have not been listed for taxes for any of said purposes under levy or levies of any year or years since the adoption of the revenue law of 1892, it shall be the duty of the president and cashier to list the same for taxation under said levy or levies: Provided, That where any national bank has heretofore, for any year or years, paid taxes upon its franchise as provided in article 3 of the revenue law of 1892, said bank shall be excepted from the operation of this section as to said year or years; and provided further, that where any national bank has heretofore, for any year or years, paid State taxes under the Hewitt bill in excess of the State taxes required by this act for the same year or years, said bank shall be entitled to credit by said excess upon its State taxes required by this act.

"4th. All assessments of shares of stock contemplated by this act shall be entered upon the assessor's books, certified and reported by the assessing officers as assessments of real estate are entered, certified and reported, and the same shall be certified to the proper collecting officers for collection as assessments of real estate are certified for collection of taxes thereon.

"5th. The assessments of said shares of stock and collection of taxes thereon, as contemplated by this act, may be enforced as assessments of real estate and collection of taxes thereon may be enforced.

"6th. The purpose of this act is to place national banks of this State, with respect to taxation, upon the same footing as State banks as nearly as may be consistently with said article 3 of the revenue law and said decision of the Supreme Court.

"7th. Whereas, it is important that State banks and national banks should be taxed equally for all purposes, an emergency exists, and this act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage."

It will be observed that by section 5210, U. S. Revised Statutes, the president and cashier of every national bank shall cause to be kept at all times a full and correct list of the shareholders in the bank, subject to the inspection of the officers authorized to assess taxes under State authority. It will also be observed that by section 5219, the shares of stock in the bank may be included in the valuation of the personal property of the holder of the shares in assessing taxes imposed by authority of the State; and the legislature of each State may determine the manner and place of taking the shares of the stock, subject to these two restrictions: First, the taxation shall not be at a greater rate than is assessed upon other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens of the State; second, the shares of stock owned by nonresidents of the State shall be taxed in the city or town where the bank is located, and not elsewhere. Real property of the bank is subject to State, county or municipal taxes to the same extent according to its value as other real property is taxed. At the time the act of March 21, 1900, was passed the Supreme Court of the United States had in the case of Owensboro National Bank v. Owensboro, 173 U. S., 664, held the previous statute of Kentucky in conflict with the act of congress, because by it the tax was levied on the franchise of the bank or its intangible property and not upon the shares of stock as the property of the stockholders. The act in question was passed to avoid the effect of this decision. It had been previously held by the Supreme Court in a number of well-considered opinions that a State may levy a tax on the shares of stock and require the bank to pay the tax. This was first held in National Bank v. Commonwealth, 9 Wallace, 353, which was followed in Bell's Gap Railroad v. Penn., 134 U. S., 232; Van Slyke v. Wisconsin, 154 U. S., 591, and Aberdeen Bank v. Chehalis County, 166 U. S., 440. The act of March 21, 1900, follows the rule approved in these cases in so far as it makes the bank the agent of the stockholder for the purpose of assessing the shares of stock and paying the taxes thereon for him. In assessing the shares of stock in the bank the assessing officer must be governed by the rule that it shall not be at a greater rate than is assessed upon other moneyed capital invested in State banks. (New York v. Tax Commissioners, 4 Wallace, 244; Aberdeen Bank v. Chehalis County, 166 U. S., 443.) The franchise of the bank, which is granted to it by the United States government, is not subjected to taxation. Section 6 of the act of March 21, 1900, provides that the purpose of the act is to place national banks, with respect to taxation, upon the same footing as State banks, and one reason given for the emergency clause is that it is important that State banks and national banks should be taxed equally for all purposes. Under these provisions any exemption from taxation which would be allowed a State bank, or any deduction that would be made in favor of a State bank, must, under the act of 1902, be made in the assessment of the shares of stock of a national bank. In no respect may the moneyed capital invested in a national bank be taxed under the act at a higher rate than the moneyed capital invested in State banks, nor may any discrimination be made against the national bank.

Taxes levied by counties, cities, towns and taxing districts are imposed by authority of the State. Counties are but subdivisions of the State created for governmental purposes. They derive their authority from the State and can levy no taxes except such as the State authorizes them to levy. They levy taxes by authority of the State and the levies they make are as fully the act of the State as those made by the legislature itself. The only difference is that the legislature, under the power vested in it, instead of levying these taxes itself, authorizes local legislative bodies better adapted to understand the local necessities to make the levies as the local exigencies require. This power of the legislature which is universally exercised is recognized in sections 157, 158, 159 and 180 of the Constitution, and is in words conferred on the legislature by section 181: "The general assembly shall not impose taxes for the purposes of any county, city, town or other municipal corporation, but may, by general laws, confer on the proper authorities thereof respectively the power to assess and collect such taxes."

Unquestionably the State in the distribution of the powers of the government may not commit to one body the power to levy certain taxes and to another the power to levy others; but when it does this all the taxes so levied are levied by the authority of the State. It was held under the previous statute that the shares of stock in national banks might be assessed to the shareholder by the assessor and should be given in by the shareholder in the list of his personal property. (Scobee v. Bean, 109 Ky., 526.) The act of March 21, 1900, did not, therefore, make that taxable which was not taxable before, but simply provided another mode for the assessment of the shares of stock and the payment of the taxes. It was the duty of the assessor to make the assessment. It was also the duty of the president and cashier of the bank to list the shares of stock with the assessor; but when the assessment was not made, the property was simply omitted from the tax list and the sheriff is authorized by section 4241, Kentucky Statutes, to institute the proceeding to have any omitted property assessed. A penalty may be properly imposed in the proceeding because the property was not listed with the assessor as required by law and stood as any other property for the assessment of which a proceeding under section 4241 may be instituted. While neither the bank nor its president nor its cashier is the owner of the shares of stock, the bank is made by the act the agent of the shareholders and the notice to it is notice to his agent within the meaning of section 4241. The president and cashier were properly made defendants because it is made their duty by the statute to list the stock. The bank is required to keep a list of its shareholders, and, therefore, knows who they are, notice to the agent in an assessment of property is sufficient notice to his principal whom he represents. Certainly the agent can not arise the question of the want of notice to his principal or maintain that the proceeding is in violation of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States. Nor can it raise the question that peradventure some of the shares may have changed hands. These defenses can only be made by the shareholders and do not properly arise in this case.

Limitation was not pleaded as to the retrospective assessments, but we have held in several cases that retrospective assessments were barred after five years from the time the property should have been assessed. The shares in the bank, as here in Soobee v. Bean, might have been assessed every year in the name of the shareholders. The act of 1902 created no new right; it simply gave a new remedy. The statute began running when the property might have been assessed, and the right to make the assessment after five years is barred. On the return of the case the defendants will be allowed to amend their answer and set up limitation if they desire to do so.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded for further proceedings consistent herewith.

GERMAN GYMNAS TIC ASSOCIATION, &c. v. CITY OF LOUISVILLE.

(Filed April 15, 1904.)

Taxation—Institutions of education—Physical culture—Under Constitution, section 170, providing that "institutions of education not used or employed for gain by any person or corporation and the income of which is devoted solely to the cause of education," the property of an incorporated gymnastic association in which a teacher in physical culture is constantly employed to instruct the members, and maintained by the payment of monthly dues by the members and from which no one derives any pecuniary benefit, is an institution of education in the meaning of the law and exempt from taxation.

Earnest Macpherson, Lewis N. Dembitz and Geo. A. Brent for appellants.

H. L. Stone for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery Branch, First Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

The German Gymnastic Association of Louisville is a corporation by virtue of the act of the general assembly of this Commonwealth approved March 4, 1854. It owns real property in the city of Louisville of the value of $15,000 where regular gymnastic exercises are taught. A teacher in physical culture is constantly employed, who instructs the members; and also one day of the week is devoted to the teaching of branches ordinarily taught in schools. Lectures and addresses are delivered and occasionally discussions of timely topics take place. The association is maintained by the payment of monthly dues by the members. There are no shares of stock and no one derives any pecuniary benefit from the association.

Section 170 of the Constitution provides that: "Institutions of education not used or employed for gain by any person or corporation, and the income of which is devoted solely to the cause of education," shall be exempt from taxation. It is claimed that appellant is exempt from taxation by virtue of this provision of the Constitution. If it was conceded to be an institution of education, it would not be exempt from taxation if it was used or employed for gain. The record shows that it was not so employed, so the only question to be answered is, is it an institution of education.

Education is not confined to the improvement and cultivation of the mind.

It may consist in the cultivation of one's religious or moral sentiments. It likewise may consist in the development of one's physical faculties. Those in charge of colleges and institutions of learning recognize this to be true. Their students are taught not only the dead and modern languages, mathematics, and the sciences, etc., but the bible and christian evidences, and a gymnasium is maintained, and foot ball and other athletic sports are encouraged. The cultivation of the mind, the improvement of our moral and religious natures, and the development of our physical faculties are necessary to a perfect education. The framers of the Constitution did not use the term in such a restricted sense, as to exclude exercises which tend to develop strength. This is of as much importance to the State, as is the acquisition of a knowledge of Latin, Greek, mathematics, etc. In Mt. Hermon Boys' School v. Gill, 145 Mass., 146, the court said: "Education may be particularly directed to either the mental, moral or physical faculties, but in its broadest and best sense it relates to them all." In Ruohs v. Backer, 6 Helsk., 385, the court said: "In its broadest sense, the word education comprehends, not merely the instruction received at school or college, but the whole course of training, moral, intellectual or physical." In People v. Barber, 42 Hun., 27, the court said: "Suitable recreation and physical exercise are deemed requisite to health and successful culture." If one institution afford an opportunity to acquire this perfect education, it is one of education. If three institutions are organized, one seeking by a course of instruction to cultivate the mind, one by a method of instruction to improve students' religious or moral conditions, and another to teach physical culture to produce a better physical development, each is an institution of education, as much as the one at which the student can acquire the threefold knowledge. It is simply a matter of judgment or convenience on the organization of institutions of education whether one shall furnish all the opportunities for the acquisition of an education, or whether there shall be separate institutions for that purpose. Our conclusion is that the appellant is an institution of education, not employed for gain, and is exempt from taxation.

The judgment is reversed for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

CANADY, GILLUM & KEY v. WEBB.

(Filed April 14, 1904.)

Contracts—Liens—In an action by material men to recover for building material which was used in the erection of a house, the cost of the improvements exceeding the contract price, which was paid in full, deducting from appellant's claim their pro rata of the excess of cost of building, it appears their claim had been satisfied and their action was properly dismissed.

Robbins & Thomas and Mason Bros. for appellants.

W. J. Webb for appellee.

Appeal from Graves Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

Appellants are dealers in lumber and building material in the city of Mayfield. Murray & Hatcher were, in the years 1900 and 1901, contractors and builders, and entered into a contract with appellee, Webb, to erect for him a house of certain character and dimensions at the price of $2,650, which was afterward, by reason of the change in the building, increased to $2,974. Murray & Hatcher purchased of appellants the most of the lumber and building material used in the erection of this house. The appellants to preserve their lien filed in the county clerk's office, within six months after they had ceased to furnish material, the statement as required by section 2468 of the Kentucky Statutes. In the month of October, 1901, appellants instituted this action against appellee to enforce their lien for the amount of balance due them, the whole claim amounting to $1,431, the balance to $478. Appellee resisted the enforcement of this lien, claiming that appellants had been paid all that was due them for materials furnished for the erection of his house, and that they did not furnish lumber and material of the value and amount as charged in appellants' petition. Appellants filed amended petitions giving additional credits on their claim, and when the last amendment was filed, they then claimed that there was still due them $156. The court on the trial of the case found in favor of appellee, and appellants have appealed.

There was a contest over a $50 payment made to appellants by Murray & Hatcher. Appellants claim that when this sum was paid by Murray & Hatcher they did not designate on what account they desired it credited, and the appellants placed the credit on another account due by Murray &

Hatcher to them. Hatcher, the person who paid it, gives it as his recollection that at the time he made the payment he directed it to be credited on the account charged for materials furnished to erect appellee's house, and was positive that the money paid them was received from appellee. To allow this credit to appellee reduces the claim of appellants to $106. It is shown by the proof that appellants committed some errors in keeping their accounts. Murray & Hatcher had, at the time appellee's house was being erected, other houses in the course of erection, and, in some few instances, material for other houses was charged to the account of material furnished to appellee's house. It also appears that Murray & Hatcher had appellee's house erected by contracting the different kinds of work to other parties, and the job cost $3,332, and the appellee had paid the contract price of $2,974. Appellee contends that by virtue of section 2463 of Kentucky Statutes appellants have been paid more than their pro rata parts; that part of this section which is applicable to the question here presented reads as follows: "The liens provided for herein shall in no case be for a greater amount in the aggregate than the contract price of the original contractor; and should the aggregate amount of liens exceed the price agreed upon between the original contractor and the owner, then there shall be a pro rata distribution of the original contract price among said lien holders."

Appellants contend that as the laborers and persons who furnished materials in the erection of this house did not assert or file with the county clerk a statement of their claims as required by statute, they did not have or obtain a lien, and that their claim was the only lien on appellee's house; that it was not as much as the contract price, and, therefore, they are entitled to their whole claim. Appellants are mistaken in this. Each and every person who performed labor and furnished materials in the erection of this house had a lien on appellee's property to secure the payment of same. (Section 2463, Kentucky Statutes.) Section 2468, says: "The liens mentioned in the preceding sections shall be dissolved unless the claimant within six months after he ceases to labor or furnish material as aforesaid, files in the office of the clerk of the county court of the county in which said building or improvement is situated, a statement of the amount due him, etc."

In one of appellants' amended petitions they present an order drawn by Murray & Hatcher in favor of appellant on appellee for the sum of $400, which was endorsed by appellee accepted, and on which $300 had been paid, and asked that appellee be adjudged to pay this sum of $100 balance. It is shown that this order covers part of the claim sued on in the original petition. Appellants had never credited Murray & Hatcher with the amount of this order or any part of it, except as it was paid. It appears that appellee accepted this order under the belief that the amount covered all liens and claims against his property, but afterwards found that the Mayfield Lumber Co. held a claim also for materials furnished in the erection of these improvements. He then informed appellants of this fact, and refused to pay anything further on this order. It does not appear that appellants have lost any rights, lien, or other thing, by reason of appellee's acceptance of this order. They were not placed in any more unfavorable situation with reference to their claim. Their lien on the property remained. We are of the opinion from the evidence that the order was without consideration to the extent of the amount unpaid thereon. In view of the excess of the cost of the improvements over the contract price, and that the contract price has been paid in full, and deducting from appellants' claim their pro rata part of the loss or excess of cost of building over the contract price, and also the small errors referred to in their accounts, we are not prepared to say that the lower court erred in dismissing appellants' action.

Wherefore, the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

WOOD v. HOWK, &c.

(Filed April 14, 1904.)

Sales of land—Liens—In an action by appellant against appellee for the enforcement of a lien upon a tract of land, it was error in the lower court to declare the note executed for the land void, it appearing from the evidence that by agreement appellant bought the land in controversy at a sale under a judgment for the accommodation of appellees, permitting them to continue to occupy it, after paying all but $55 which had been paid by appellant on the sale bond. Upon a settlement appellees owed appellant a merchandise account of $245, which added to the $55 made $300, for which amount the wife, appellee Mary Howk, executed her note to appellant upon his conveyance to her of the land, the evidence conducing to show the settlement to be a correct one, and the appellees remaining silent six or seven years making no objection to the deed, or that it failed in any way to correctly set forth the contract, the conveyance must be upheld.

Browder & Browder and Newton Belcher for appellant.

Jonson & Wickliffe and R. Y. Thomas, Jr., for appellees.

Appeal from Muhlenberg Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle.

The appellant, P. S. Wood, sued the appellees, Mary Howk and G. W. Howk, in the lower court to recover of the former $300 and interest upon a note executed to him by her, May 27, 1895, and which became due May 27, 1896, and also to enforce a lien upon a fifty acre tract of land appellant by deed conveyed the appellee, Mary Howk, at the time of the execution of the note, wherein a lien was expressly retained as security for the payment of the note.

After the appellees were duly summoned a default judgment was rendered in appellant's favor by the lower court in accordance with the allegations and prayer of the petition, but at a subsequent term of the court, the same, upon appellees' motion, and with appellants' consent, was set aside, and appellees allowed to file answer, wherein it was denied that the land had been sold to the appellee, Mary Howk, or that she had accepted the deed of conveyance made by the appellant, and averred that the note sued on was without consideration, and that its execution was procured by the fraudulent representation of appellant that certain of the creditors of appellee, G. W. Howk, would or were about to levy executions upon and sell the land in payment of his debts, which could be prevented by its conveyance to Mary Howk, his wife.

It is also averred in the answer in substance that the land was purchased by, paid for, and deeded to the appellee, G. W. Howk, in 1890, who lived upon it until it was later sold under a judgment of the court and by its commissioner, at which sale it was purchased by appellant for $324.28, under an agreement with appellee, G. W. Howk, that he (appellant) would pay for it the amount of his bid and take the title thereto to himself by deed from the commissioner, but that appellee, G. W. Howk, should remain in possession of the land and repay to appellant the amount of his bid at the commissioner's sale, whereupon the latter was to make him a deed re-investing him with the title to the land; that appellee pursuant to this agreement repaid to appellant the amount of his bid at the commissioner's sale, but that the latter in violation of his undertaking, instead of reconveying to him the land, attempted to convey it to his wife, the appellee, Mary Howk, by deed expressing a false consideration, and retaining a fraudulent lien to secure the payment of the same.

The material averments of the answer, except as to the manner and purpose of appellant's purchase of the land at the commissioner's sale, were controverted by the reply filed by him. As to that matter the reply admits that appellant purchased the land for the benefit of appellee, G. W. Howk, and with the understanding that upon the payment by the latter to appellant of the amount paid by him for the land at the commissioner's sale, appellant would convey him the land, but it is averred in the reply that $55 of the amount due appellant on the land was never paid by the appellee, G. W. Howk, and that he and appellant made a settlement at the time of the execution of the note sued on, whereby it was ascertained and agreed by them that in addition to the $55 due appellant from appellee in redemption of the land, the latter then owed the former upon account for merchandise the sum of $245, and by further agreement between the parties, for these sums aggregating $300, the note in controversy was executed by the appellee, Mary Howk, and the lien expressed in the deed executed to her by appellant, was retained to secure its payment.

It is also averred in the reply that the appellee, Mary Howk, was treated as the purchaser of the land at the instance of her husband, at whose request the land was deeded her to prevent its being reached by his creditors. The lower court rendered judgment declaring the note void, but held that there was due appellant from appellee, G. W. Howk, $55 of the purchase money on the land, and for this sum judgment was entered against G. W. Howk, in appellant's favor, with interest from February 7, 1899, and costs. In addition, the land in controversy was ordered to be sold in satisfaction thereof, and from that judgment both parties have appealed. It appears from the evidence that appellant is and for years past has been a merchant at Belton, Muhlenberg county, dealing in general merchandise, and in logs, cross ties, lumber, staves, etc. It also appears that business relations between appellant and the appellee, G. W. Howk, began as far back as 1890, and continued with but little interruption until about the commencement of this action. During this time, covering a period of about eleven years, appellant lent appellee, G. W. Howk, money, extended him credit, and in more than one instance paid his debts when he became involved, satisfied attachment liens against his property, sold him supplies for his family and hands, and at one time even shipped him groceries and other provisions to Tennessee, where he and his family were temporarily residing. Covering the period of their dealings appellant seems to have been unusually accommodating to appellees, and to have faithfully kept an account of all the transactions between himself and the appellee, G. W. Howk.

In the year 1891, the latter's farm of fifty acres, upon which he then lived, was sold under a judgment of the Muhlenberg Circuit Court for a debt, going to one E. S. Bradley. Appellant, at the request and solely for the accommodation of appellee, G. W. Howk, bought the land for him, paying therefor $324.28, and after the confirmation of the sale and payment of the purchase money, received of the court, through its commissioner, a deed conveying him the land, which deed was absolute and unconditional upon its face. It was, however, agreed between appellant and appellee, G. W. Howk, which agreement was never reduced to writing, that the latter should remain in possession of the land, and at its maturity pay the sale bond executed by appellant to the commissioner for the land, which became due in six months after its execution, but if he failed to pay the bond at maturity, thereby compelling appellant to do so, he would surrender possession of the land to appellant, and be barred of the right to redeem it.

This agreement was not complied with by Howk. He failed to pay the sale bond at maturity, and it was paid by appellant. But notwithstanding such failure, appellant permitted appellees to remain in possession of the farm, rent free, from the date of the maturity of the sale bond, December 26, 1891, until May 27, 1895, at which last named date, he, at the request of G. W. Howk, conveyed it to his wife for the consideration of $300. and for this sum she gave her note, secured by lien on the land, payable one year after date without interest. It is manifest that the land was conveyed the appellee, Mary Howk, to prevent its being subjected to the husband's debts, and further that it was so conveyed at the request of appellee, G. W. Howk, for appellant could have had no interest of his own to subserve in so conveying it. A deed to the husband and the note of the latter secured by lien on the land would have answered appellant's purpose as effectually as the arrangement that was entered into by the parties, and G. W. Howk's creditors could as well have attacked the deed to the wife as if it had been made to him.

The claim of appellees that there was no acceptance on their part of the deed from appellant to appellee Mary Howk, seems to be without support from the evidence. Appellant and James Forgy, the latter a disinterested witness, say the deed was accepted; its acceptance is denied only by appellees, both of whom testified, without objection from appellant, though only one of them was a competent witness. But aside from the depositions of appellant and Forgy, the acceptance of the deed by both of the appellees is conclusively shown by its delivery to them by the appellant, and their retention of it, by the execution and delivery to appellant of appellee Mary Howk's note for the consideration expressed in the deed, and by the further fact that appellees kept the deed from the time it was received by them, May 27, 1895, until January 15, 1902, the date of the filing of their answer, without ever at any time during these six or seven years, giving notice or making objection to appellant, or others, that they were dissatisfied with the deed, or that it failed in any way to correctly set forth the true contract between the parties thereto. It is true that appellees have not had the deed recorded, but in the absence of any complaint as to the deed, it would perhaps do no violence to appellees' rights to indulge the presumption that the failure to put it to record arose from the desire of appellees to have it understood by G. W. Howk's creditors that the title of the land was still in appellant, thereby making the deed to the wife less liable to attack from G. W. Howk's creditors in the effort to subject the land to the payment of his debts.

It is contended by the appellee, G. W. Howk, that he was owing appellant, nothing at the time the note sued on was executed. This contention is not sustained by the evidence. Appellant and James Forgy, his former clerk, both testified that a settlement was made between appellant and appellee G. W. Howk at the time of the execution of the note and deed, whereby it was ascertained that the latter was indebted to the former $245, upon account for merchandise, and $55 balance on the land, and the aggregate of these sums constituted the $300 for which the note was given by appellee, Mary Howk. It is denied by appellee G. W. Howk that such a settlement was made, but allowing his denial of the settlement to offset the testimony of appellant, that it was made, we find the latter corroborated by Forgy, who is a wholly disinterested witness, and there being nothing in the record to discredit his intelligence or character, it is but fair and just to accept his testimony as the truth of the controversy on this point. Furthermore, the books of appellant containing all the transactions between himself and the appellee, G. W. Howk, were before the parties at the time of the settlement, and according to the evidence they furnished the data for the settlement, and their correctness was not then questioned by the appellee. Unfortunately, the books were afterwards burned in a fire that destroyed the appellant's storehouse and goods; therefore, the only evidence that can be produced as to the settlement, is found in the depositions of appellant and Forgy, which evidence finds support and corroboration in the note and deed; and this evidence, we think, should be accounted as outweighing the bare unsupported denial of appellee G. W. Howk that there was such a settlement between the parties.

The correspondence between appellant and appellee G. W. Howk tends to support the testimony of the former that there was $55 due from the latter upon the land, and also an indebtedness owing by him upon account, and there is no satisfactory evidence anywhere in the record that tends to contradict the testimony of appellant and Forgy that appellee's indebtedness to appellant upon account was $245 at the time of the execution of the note and deed. We refrain from attempting to present a detailed statement of account between the parties; indeed, owing to the condition of the record, such a statement would be well nigh impossible. We are, therefore, forced to rest our decision upon the settlement that was made between the parties which showed an indebtedness of $300 upon the part of appellee G. W. Howk to appellant.

In this view of the case, it follows that the chancellor erred in rendering the judgment appealed from. It is, however, insisted for appellees that the judgment of the chancellor upon the questions of fact involved in this case, should be as favorably regarded as would the verdict of a properly-instructed jury; hence, unless palpably against the evidence, it ought not to be disturbed. This rule applies in purely ordinary or common law actions, where the court takes the place of a jury in trying the facts. But a different rule obtains in an equitable action like the one at bar. In such action this court will, upon appeal, determine the weight of the evidence. (Scott v. Mitchell, 19 Ky. Law Rep., 218; Edwards-Bernard Co. v. Pfanz, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 2206.) And as in our opinion the judgment appealed from is against the weight of the evidence, the same is reversed, and cause remanded, with directions to the lower court to set aside the judgment, and in lieu thereof enter judgment in appellant's behalf for the amount of the note sued on, with interest from its maturity, and costs, and for the enforcement of the lien retained in the deed from appellant to appellee Mary Hawk, and a sale of the land in controversy, or enough thereof to pay appellant's debt and costs, and for such further proceedings as may not be inconsistent with the opinion herein.

NEW YORK LIFE INSURANCE CO. v. MEINKEN'S ADM'R.

(Filed April 15, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Insurance—Payment of premiums—Where a policy of insurance contained two options, the first being that the insured should be entitled to extended insurance for the full amount for a definite period, or second if he should make demand therefor and surrender the policy within six months after default, he would be entitled to paid-up insurance for a stipulated sum, having failed to demand paid-up insurance and the term for which the policy was continued in force expiring before the insured's death, there could be no recovery, the policy having lapsed by its own terms.

Humphrey, Burnett & Humphrey and James H. McIntosh for appellant.

C. H. Shields and Eli H. Brown for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery Branch, First Division.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

On the 8th of November, 1893, the appellant insured the life of Herman P. Meinken for $2,500 in consideration of $50.50, and the payment of a like sum annually in advance on the 8th of November of each year during the continuance of the policy. The policy contained the following provisions:

"This policy can not be forfeited after it shall have been in force three full years, as hereinafter provided.

"1st. If any premium subsequently due is not paid as hereinbefore provided, this policy will be continued for its full amount, as provided in the table below, subject to the conditions of this policy, but without further payment of premiums, and without loans, participation in surplus and premium-return; or,

"2d. If any premium subsequently due is not paid as hereinbefore provided, this policy will be endorsed for the reduced amount of paid-up insurance provided in the table below, if demand is made therefor with surrender of this policy within six months thereafter, subject to the conditions of this policy, but without further payment of premiums, and without loans, participation in surplus and premium-return.

"TABLE OF GUARANTEES, IF PAYMENT OF PREMIUMS IS DISCONTINUED.

"Provided there is no indebtedness against this policy. (Pursuant to the Insurance Law, chapter 690, Laws of 1892, of the State of New York.)

If the premiums are paid.	(1st.) This policy will be continued for its full amount, $2,500, as herein- before provided—	Or (2d.) This policy will be endorsed for the re- duced amount of paid up insurance as hereinbefore pro- vided.

To November 8, 1912	To July 8, 1927	Of 1,072 (0)

The annual premiums of $59.50 each were paid for the first three years in cash, and entitled the insured to extended insurance for the full amount of the policy up to the 8th of April, 1899, or to paid-up insurance for $167. On the premium due November 8, 1896, the insured paid $15 in cash, and executed the following note to the company for the balance of the premium:

"November 8, 1896.

"Without grace, six months after date, I promise to pay to the order of the New York Life Insurance Co. $44.50, at the Second National Bank, St. Paul, Minn., value received, with interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum.

"This note is given in payment of the premium due November 8, 1896, on the above policy with the understanding that all claims to further insurance, and all benefit whatever which full payment in cash of said premium would have secured, shall become immediately void and be forfeited to the New York Life Insurance Co., if this note is not paid at maturity, except as otherwise provided in the policy.

(Signed) "H. P. MEINKEN."

At the maturity of this note the insured paid $14.50 in cash, and executed the following note for the balance of the premium:

"Without grace, three months after date, I promise to pay to the order of the New York Life Insurance Co. $30 at the Second National Bank of St. Paul, Minn. Value received, with interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum. This note is given in payment of the premium due on the above policy with the understanding that all claims to further insurance and all benefits whatever, which full payment in cash of said premium would have secured shall become immediately void and be forfeited to the New York Life Insurance Co., if this note is not paid at maturity, except as otherwise provided in the policy itself.

"H. P. MEINKEN."

This note was never paid, and on the 16th of August, 1897, the company wrote across its face in red ink: "Note and Policy, August 16, 1897, cancelled." No demand for payment was ever made therefor of H. P. Meinken or his personal representative, but the note was retained in the possession of the insurance company, these facts being set forth in the answer of the company, to which a general demurrer was sustained. H. P. Meinken died on the 15th of February, 1901, and shortly after his death, this suit was instituted by the appellee, as his administrator, seeking to recover $2,500, the full amount of the policy. The company denied liability, and alleged that the partial payment of the $59.50 due on November 8, 1896, did not carry the policy under the terms of the contract up to the date of the death of the insured, and that the policy had lapsed. A general demurrer was sustained to the answer, and judgment given by the trial court for the full amount of the policy, upon the theory that the company was indebted to the insured for paid-up insurance at the date of the default in at least $167; and that it was its duty to have paid off the $90 note out of this fund, which would have had the effect to extend the insurance until May 8, 1901, and would have entitled the insured to paid-up insurance for $225.

If this reasoning is sound, the insured could in the same way have used the $225 paid-up insurance to pay the premium due November 8, 1897, and so on to the end. We are unable to concur either in the reasoning or conclusions of the trial court, and fail to find any support therefor in the case of Montgomery v. Phoenix Life Ins. Co., 77 Ky., 51, relied on as authority. In case of default in the payment of the annual premium, the insured had two options: First, the policy provided that he should be entitled to extended insurance for the full amount of the policy for a definite period, or, second, if the insured should make demand therefor and surrender the policy within six months after default, he was entitled to paid up insurance for a stipulated sum. But he could not claim both of these surrender values. Having failed to demand paid-up insurance, the policy was by its terms continued in force for the full amount of $2,500 for a definite period, but which had expired before his death. The validity of similar provisions in life insurance policies has been repeatedly upheld by this court. In the St. Louis Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Grigsby, 73 Ky., 810, the court said: "Where as a matter of favor to the insured, credit is extended him for some portion of a cash premium, the failure to pay the note representing such portion is regarded as a failure to pay the premium, and the policy will be forfeited."

Similar rulings were made in Manhattan Life Ins. Co. v. Myers, 109 Ky., 372; Manhattan Life Ins. Co. v. Petecoste, 106 Ky., 642; Noeland v. Union Central Life Ins. Co., 104 Ky., 129; Union Central Life Ins. Co. v. Duval, 20 Ky. Law Rep., 443; New York Life Ins. Co. v. Warren Deposit Bank, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 326, and in numerous other cases.

Having failed to pay all of the premium due in 1896, the policy lapsed, and the retention of the notes by appellant, as explained by it was not inconsistent with its intention to treat the policy as void. (Manhattan Life Ins. Co. v. Savage's Adm'r, &c., 28 Ky. Law Rep., 446.) This question is too thoroughly settled in this State to justify argument or further citation of authorities.

We conclude that the trial court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the second and third paragraphs of defendant's answer, and in giving judgment for the amount of the policy, and the judgment is reversed and cause remanded for proceedings consistent herewith.

HARRIGAN, &c. v. THE ADVANCE THRESHER CO.

(Filed April 15, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Practice—Failure to file schedule not ground for dismissal—Since the repeal of the section of the Code requiring the assignment of errors, the failure to file a schedule within ninety days is not a ground for dismissal where the appellant files a transcript of the entire record.

G. W. Whitesides for appellant.

John J. Milliken for appellee.

Appeal from the Simpson Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

The appeal was granted by the court below. The appellant did not, as provided by subsection 4a, section 737, Civil Code of Practice, file within ninety days after the granting of the appeal or at all a schedule. Instead of doing that a complete transcript of the record was filed in this court. Since the repeal of the section of the Code requiring the assignment of errors, the failure to file a schedule within ninety days is not a ground for dismissal where the appellant files a transcript of the entire record. (Louisville & Nashville R. R. Co. v. Brice, 88 Ky., 210.) The correctness of this decision was recognized in Nelson County v. Bardstown & Louisville Turnpike Co., opinion delivered March, 1903. (24 Ky. Law Rep., 2056.) As a complete transcript of the record was filed, the necessity of filing a schedule within ninety days after the appeal was obviated.

The motion to dismiss the appeal is overruled.

COMMONWEALTH V. STANDARD OIL CO.

(Filed April 15, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Indictment—Construction of statutes—Where appellee was charged in an indictment with selling lubricating oil from a wagon without a license, the indictment averring that the oil was sold as coal oil, it was error for the lower court to sustain a demurrer to the indictment. Section 4234, Kentucky Statutes, requiring that a license shall be paid for each wagon used in transporting or retailing "petroleum, lubricating or other oils," the court can not say that coal oil is not a lubricant, it being a question of fact for the determination of the jury.

F. B. Hays, W. R. Howell and Conn Linn for appellant.

Appeal from Calloway Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

The indictment charges the appellee with selling by retail lubricating oil from a wagon used in transporting and retailing same without having license so to do. In describing the offense the indictment avers that the lubricating oil so sold was coal oil. The court sustained a demurrer to and dismissed the indictment. To review that action this appeal is prosecuted.

The indictment is based upon a provision of section 4224, Kentucky Statutes. It requires that a license shall be paid for each wagon used in transporting or retailing "petroleum, lubricating or other oils." The grand jury charged in effect that coal oil is a lubricating oil. The court can not say that coal oil is not a lubricant, or lubricating oil, this being true the court could not determine the question by demurrer to the indictment. It is a question of fact for the jury to determine whether or not coal oil is a lubricating oil. If the indictment charged that a certain kind of oil was sold by retail from a wagon transporting it without a license, the defendant could not be convicted upon the proof that some other kind of oil was so sold.

The judgment is reversed for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

HOPKINS v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed April 15, 1904.)

1. Homicide—Wound not necessarily fatal—Death of deceased hastened thereby—If one unlawfully wounds another and thereby hastens or accelerates his death by reason of some disease with which he is afflicted, the wrongdoer is guilty of the crime thereby resulting, although the deceased would probably not have lived much longer.

2. Continuance—Where appellant's affidavit as to what an absent witness would testify to, was allowed to be read as a deposition, the court did not err in refusing a continuance.

F. D. Sampson for appellant.

N. B. Hays and Loralne Mix for appellee.

Appeal from Knox Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

Appellant was indicted by the grand jury of Knox county, charged with the willful murder of George M. Cole. A trial resulted in a conviction of the accused, and his sentence to the penitentiary for the term of fifteen years.

The grounds urged for a new trial are, first, that the verdict was against the law and the evidence; second, that the court misinstructed the jury in this, that the first instruction directs the jury to convict the defendant "if the jury believe beyond a reasonable doubt * * * that the shot caused or 'hastened' the death of the deceased within a year and a day;" third, because of the discovery of new and important evidence on behalf of the defendant. The evidence discloses that, prior to the difficulty, appellant had been in the employ of the deceased as a laborer; that on the day of the shooting, he left deceased's employ without notice; whereupon the deceased hunted him up and abused him for leaving him, using profane and vile language to him; that, at the time, deceased had a stick in his hand, with which he threatened the accused, but did not strike him. A settlement was then had between the two men, the employer paying off the employe, giving him, as a part of his wages, an order on the neighborhood store for $2, and they then parted. Afterwards the deceased came to the neighborhood store, where he found appellant in the act of purchasing a pair of shoes, and again abused him, using vile and insulting language to him. In a short while the deceased left the store, and started home. Afterwards appellant surreptitiously took a pistol belonging to a clerk in the store, and placing it in his pocket, followed the deceased, overtaking him on the public road, where he shot him, inflicting a wound from the effects of which he died in about two months thereafter.

Cole, at the time he was shot, was in a very feeble condition of health, being in what is known as the second stage of consumption, and would probably not have lived very long, even if he had not been wounded. The injury inflicted by the shooting was not necessarily fatal, and, but for the enfeebled condition of the deceased's health, he would, more than probably, have recovered. The evidence of the physicians show that his death was accelerated or hastened by the wound received at the hands of appellant. Appellant's testimony is to the effect that he fired in self-defense, but the evidence of the Commonwealth tends to show that the shooting of Cole was an act of wanton assassination. The verdict of the jury was not contrary to the evidence. The trial court did not err in the instruction complained of. Although the wound which appellant inflicted upon the deceased would not probably have caused his death had he been a well man, he is not, therefore, guiltless of the crime with which he stands charged. If one unlawfully wounds another, and thereby hastens or accelerates his death by reason of some disease with which he is afflicted, the wrongdoer is guilty of the crime thereby resulting. The rule upon this subject is thus stated by Bishop, in his work on Criminal Law, volume 2, section 638, subsection 3: "Though the person would have died from some other cause already operating, it is enough that the wound hastened the termination of life; as, for example, if he had already been mortally wounded by another. And if the one attacked was enfeebled by disease, and what was done would not have been mortal to a well person, still, whether the assaulting person knew his condition or not, after he did what was mortal to the other, the offense is committed."

Clark, in his Criminal Law, page 129, says: "The fact that the person killed was diseased, and in ill health, or wounded by another, and was likely or sure to die when the blow was given, or that after the blow was given he neglected or refused to take proper care of himself, or submit to an operation by which he could have been cured, is no defense."

Hale, in his Pleas of the Crown, volume 1, page 428, says: "If a man be sick of some such disease which possibly by course of nature would end his life in half a year, and another gives him a wound or hurt which hastens his end by irritating and provoking the disease to operate more violently or speedily, this hastening of his death sooner than it would have been, is homicide or murder, as the case happens, in him, that gives the wound or hurt, for he doth not die simply by the visitation of God, but the hurt that he receives hastens it, and an offender of such a nature shall not apportion his own wrong, and thus I have often heard that learned judge, Justice Rolfe, frequently direct." (State v. Morea, 2 Ala., 275; People v. Moan, 65 Cal., 533; Commonwealth v. Fox, 7 Gray, 585; State v. Costello, 62 Iowa, 404; People v. Ah Fat, 48 Cal., 61.)

There was no pretense by appellant to maintain his third ground for a new trial, as he filed no affidavits, or other evidence, in support of it. Although not set forth as a ground for a new trial, appellant complains of the court's failure to grant him a continuance based upon the absence of a witness, one Dr. Crit. Jones. The record shows that appellant's affidavit, as to be what Dr. Jones would testify, was allowed to read as a deposition, and we do not think the court erred in refusing a continuance. Upon the whole case, we are satisfied that appellant received a fair and impartial trial, and that the verdict was lighter than the facts warranted.

The judgment is affirmed.

JOHNSON'S TRUSTEE v. JOHNSON.

JOHNSON v. MERRITT.

(Filed March 16, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Wills—Alienation—A devise to a trustee for the benefit of the children of decedent's son by which the property should be held until his youngest child should arrive at the age of twenty-five years was void because it went beyond the period of a life or lives in being and twenty-one years and ten months thereafter contrary to the statute of perpetuities.

2. Same—Where, by the terms of a will the period of distribution fixed by it being void, the will will be construed as if no such conditions were imposed, and upon the death of one for whom it was held in trust it descended immediately to his children.

George V. Triplett for appellant Johnson.

Miller & Todd and Chas. S. Walker for appellee Merritt.

Little & Slack and R. L. Greene for appellees.

Appeal from Davless Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

Harriott T. Johnson, senior, by her will dated November 7, 1878, and a codicil dated March 30, 1882, all probated the 21st of August, 1882, devised her property to a trustee, the income to be applied to the use of her son and his family during her son's life. The testatrix had but one child, the son named Philip. The latter was at the time of the making of the will, and date of the death of the testatrix, married to appellee, Alice H. Johnson, and had then living two children. The clauses of the will necessary to be considered are:

"4th. It is my will, and I do so now bequeath, that upon the death of my son, Philip, then all my property of every description, after paying the legacy to his widow, if he shall leave one, shall be held by the trustee as aforesaid, the interest, and income arising from same to be held for the use and benefit of any children left by my son, Phillip, until the youngest child shall reach the age of twenty-five years, and then be equally divided between them.

"5th. If my son, Phillip, shall die leaving no children, or if the children left by him shall die before they reach the age of twenty-five years, then I will that all my property held by the trustee for the purposes aforesaid, shall be sold, and turned into cash, and the proceeds so realized be distributed."

* * *

Then follows a disposal of the property to other persons.

By the 7th clause of the will it is provided: "No part of my property shall be sold, or alienated, except for the purpose of paying my debts, or unless by the consent of my executor hereinafter made, but I hereby authorize and empower my executor to sell, and convey any part of same, provided, however, that the proceeds arising from any sale made by him shall be reinvested, and held in trust by him for the purposes set forth in this my will and testament, and with the same conditions annexed in the other clauses of this my will."

The devisee, Phillip, died in 1902. He had children surviving him, six in number, two of whom, the two first named herein, are over twenty-five years of age, and the others are less than twenty-five, and some of them under twenty-one. It is claimed that where the words "twenty-five years" occur in the clauses above quoted, that they had been changed by the testatrix in her lifetime so as to read twenty-one years. In each instance there is written over the word one the word five. The will, as recorded, read twenty-five years. Witnesses were introduced to testify to their opinion as to whether the testatrix had first written the term twenty-five years, and then altered it to twenty-one years, or vice versa. The weight of the evidence seems to us to be, and such was the finding of the chancellor, that she had written first twenty-one years, and had then altered it to twenty-five. This is confirmed by the inspection of the original paper which is before us.

A devise of the income of property may be equivalent to a devise of the property, depending upon the context as evincing the testator's intention with reference thereto. Here, the testatrix was evidently attempting to provide a life estate and support, by converting the total income of her estate into an annuity, for the benefit of her only child. As he was the person beneficially seized, although a trustee was appointed to hold the title, a life estate therein for his benefit was created. It might have been subjected to his debts under the statutes. (Section 1681, Kentucky Statutes.)

The will gives the property, upon the death of the testatrix's son, to his children and widow. As the son's children must of necessity have been born or begotten in his life time, the remainder thus created inevitably must have vested within twenty-one years after a life in being, and was, therefore, not within section 2360, Kentucky Statutes. Had the will stopped there, there would have been no doubt of its validity in so far as the nature of the estate created was concerned. But, the testatrix went further and attempted to prevent the alienation of the estate for a period of twenty-five years, which was in excess of her power, and was void as being against the statute and rule of perpetuities. The result is that the testatrix devised the property to persons whose lives were then in being, to wit, her son, Phillip, and to two of his children, the two then born, and then sought to limit the estate further by prohibiting its alienation for at least twenty-five years thereafter. As if Phillip should have had other children born alive after the death of the testatrix, the period of distribution was postponed for a longer period than is allowed by the statute against perpetuities, to wit, a life or lives in being and twenty-one years and ten months thereafter. (Section 3960, Kentucky Statutes.)

The will disposed of all the property thus: The title resting in the trustee for, first, a life estate in the son, Phillip; second, with remainder to Phillip's children, subject to the payment of $5,000 to Phillip's widow, if he left one. The only part of the will that is void is the provision forbidding the alienation of the estate for a period not allowed by the statute, and the attempt to exempt it from liability for the son's debts. Therefore, the period of distribution fixed by the testatrix being void, the will will be construed as if no such conditions were contained in it. Upon the death of Phillip, his widow was entitled to receive $5,000 in cash, and the residue of the estate should have been distributed equally among his six children. The widow contends that the limitation sought to be imposed by the will being void, the testatrix must have died intestate, and that Phillip took by inheritance under the statute, and was consequently invested with the fee entitling his widow to dower in the realty. This contention is disposed of adversely by the construction above given the will. There is a line of cases (of which Fidelity Trust Co. v. Lloyd, 25 Ky. Law Rep., —, decided February 24, 1904, is the latest, and which cites the earlier cases of a similar nature) holding that an attempt to suspend the vesting of the title and the consequent suspension of the power of alienation for a longer time than twenty one years, and the utmost period of gestation, is void, and that in such event the testator died intestate as to the property so affected. There is a marked and vital distinction between all of those cases and this one, viz.: In those cases the title did not vest, the person who was to take was not to be, and could not be, ascertained till after the utmost period of postponement allowed by the statute, and, therefore, the property had not been devised at all; as devising it to a trustee to hold for a wholly void purpose, is manifestly no devise. (Stevens v. Stevens, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 1815.) In this will the property was given over after Phillip's death to his children without any contingency. The persons to take were thus selected and made certain. The time of distribution among them, i. e., the time of payment, was postponed, or attempted to be, till the youngest of them became twenty-five years old.

The true rule of construction, by which the test of the validity of such provisions is to be made, is clearly expressed in 3 Williams on Executors, 515, thus: "But when future time for the payment of the legacy is defined by the will, the legacy will be vested or contingent, according as, upon construing the will, it appears whether the testator meant to annex the time to the payment of the legacy, or to the gift of it. In ascertaining the intention of the testator in this respect, the courts of equity have established two positive rules of construction: First, that a bequest to a person payable or to be paid at or when he shall attain twenty-one years of age, or at the end of any other certain determined term, confers on him a vested interest immediately on the testator's death, as debitum in presenti solvendum in futuro, and transmissible to his executors or administrators; for the words 'payable' or 'to be paid' are supposed to disannex the time from the gift of the legacy, so as to leave the gift immediate, in the same manner, in respect of its vesting, as if the bequest stood singly, and contained no mention of time; second, that if the words 'payable' or 'to be paid' are omitted, and the legacies are given at twenty-one, or if, when, in case, or provided, the legatees attain twenty-one or any other future definite period, these expressions annex the time to the substance of the legacy, and make the legatee's right to it depend on his being alive at the time fixed for his payment. Consequently, if the legatee happens to die before that period arrives, his personal representative will not be entitled to the legacy."

In Moore v. Offutt, 94 Ky., 572, this court wrote: "It has been said by both Blackstone and Kent, and often quoted, that 'it is not the uncertainty of enjoyment in the future, but the uncertainty of the right to that enjoyment, which makes the distinction between a vested and contingent interest.'" (Roberts v. Brinker, 4 Dana, 570; Allen v. VanMeter, 1 Met., 264.)

In Roberts v. Brinker, supra, the court said: "A legacy to an infant in presenti, to be paid in futuro, is deemed to be vested, and as not depending on his living until the time fixed for payment."

It was said in Fidelity Trust Co. v. Lloyd, supra: "The statute concerns itself with the vesting of estates, and not with their termination."

By all these authorities we see that the estate vested in the infants immediately upon the death of their father, the life tenant. After having designated the persons to take, testatrix vainly attempted to prevent their alienating the property for a period repugnant to the statute. It is always held that where the devise is valid in part, and void in part, that which is good, if severable from the bad, will be allowed to stand. (Attorney-General v. Wallace, 7 B. Mon., 611; Armstrong v. Armstrong, 14 Ben Mon., 269.)

Judgment affirmed on the original appeals and on the cross appeal.

COMMONWEALTH, BY, &c. v. WALKER, &c.

(Filed April 19, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Taxation—Lien on bonded warehouse for taxes on whisky—Under Kentucky Statutes, section 4021, providing that "the Commonwealth, each county, city, town or taxing district shall have a lien on the property assessed for the taxes due them respectively," the mere fact that part of the taxpayer's personal property was assessed by one set of officers, and part by another, can not reasonably be presumed to be intended to affect the lien of the Commonwealth for the tax on all the property, including the bonded warehouse.

2. Sale of land before personalty is exhausted—Authority of auditor to institute equitable proceedings—Section 4112, Kentucky Statutes, provides that "on failure of the proprietor of a warehouse to pay the taxes within five days after they are due he shall be deemed delinquent and the officer authorized to collect the taxes shall at once cause such proceedings to be instituted for their collection as may be provided by law for the collection of other delinquent taxes." By sections 4091, 4092 and 4104 other delinquent taxes due the State may be recovered by suit. By section 4111, it is the duty of the warehouseman to pay his taxes to the officer of the State entitled to receive them. When he failed to pay his taxes into the treasury he became a delinquent debtor of the State and might be sued for his taxes under sections 976, 4188, Kentucky statutes. When judgment was entered in the Franklin Circuit Court and the execution thereon was returned "no property found," the auditor was authorized by section 4169, Kentucky Statutes, to institute an action by equitable proceedings in the Franklin Circuit Court, or in any court of competent jurisdiction, to enforce the lien on the warehouse for their collection.

Lillard H. Carter and W. H. Morgan for appellants.

L. W. McKee for appellee John Dowling.

Appeal from Anderson Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

J. R. Walker owned a bonded warehouse in Anderson county in which there was stored a large number of barrels of whisky which were assessed against Walker in the years 1898, 1899 and 1901. Walker made withdrawals of whisky from bond so that there was due the Commonwealth on September 1, 1899, $125.94, on January 1, 1900, $158.76, and on May 1, 1900, $339.37. On June 20, 1900, Walker sold and conveyed his warehouse and ground to John Dowling in satisfaction of a mortgage in favor of Dowling of date May 14, 1892. On August 20, 1900, the Commonwealth instituted ordinary actions in the Franklin Circuit Court in which it recovered judgment against Walker for the taxes above referred to, with interest and certain penalties. Execution was issued on these judgments and returned no property found. Then this suit was brought by the Commonwealth in the Anderson Circuit Court against Walker and Dowling asserting a lien on the land. The circuit court dismissed the petition, and the Commonwealth appeals.

The first question made is that the State has no lien on the real estate of the owner of a bonded warehouse for the taxes due by him on the whisky therein. The lien for taxes is wholly a matter of statute. Section 4021, Kentucky Statutes, is as follows: "The Commonwealth, and each county, incorporated city, town or taxing district, shall have a lien on the property assessed for the taxes due them respectively, which shall not be defeated by gift, devise, sale, alienation, or any means whatever, unless the gift, devise, sale or alienation shall have been made for more than five years before the institution of proceedings to enforce the lien, and nothing shall be exempt from levy and sale for taxes and cost incident to the sale. When any lands or improvements shall not be assessed in any one year, it may be assessed retrospectively, in the manner provided for by law, for that year, at any time not later than five years thereafter; but the lien thereby accruing shall not prejudice the rights of purchasers acquired in the meantime."

Our attention is called to the fact that in the general statutes this provision after the words "property assessed" contains also the words "and on all other property of such person," and that these words have been omitted from the present statute. But we do not see that the omission has changed the sense except as to property which is not assessed for taxation. The change seems to have been made to avoid the construction that a lien was given on property not liable to assessment; for in the present statute these words are added which are not in the General Statutes, "and nothing shall be exempt from levy and sale for taxes and costs incident to the sale." It has been a settled legislative policy in Kentucky to give a lien on all the property of the taxpayer in his entire list for all his taxes and not a lien on each piece of property for the tax on it alone. We see nothing in the present statute to indicate a legislative intent to change the well settled policy of the State in this regard extending back as far as the act of 1799. And if the whisky had been assessed for taxation by the county assessor like the land, we do not think it would have occurred to the distinguished counsel for appellee that there was not a lien on the land for the entire tax of the taxpayer. But the provisions of sections 4105-4114, Kentucky Statutes, are part of the same act as section 4091, the only difference being that the whisky is required to be assessed by a board which can act more intelligently than the assessor and the taxes are required to be paid at a different time for the convenience of the warehousemen. The value when fixed by the board is certified to the county clerk to whom the assessor's books are returned and the two returns taken together constitute the assessment of the taxpayer's property. The land sought to be subjected was a part of Walker's tax list and we see no reason why there should not be a lien on it for the whisky tax as well as for the tax on the personal property of Walker assessed by the assessor. The mere fact that part of his personal property was assessed by one set of officers and part by another can not reasonably be presumed intended to affect the lien of the Commonwealth for the tax, and if the Commonwealth has no lien on his other property for the whisky tax, then it is without security for the collection of this tax, for the whisky can not be disturbed in bond, and when taken out of bond it is usually at once disposed of. There seems to be the greater reason for presuming that the legislature contemplated that the whisky tax would be secured by the lien provided by section 4021 for the reason that this tax is not required to be placed in the hands of the sheriff, who is responsible on his bond for diligence in collecting taxes coming to his hands. We, therefore, conclude that the Commonwealth has a lien on the land for the taxes properly assessed against Walker, but it is not liable in Dowling's hands for the assessment of 1901 made after the deed to him was executed. There seems to be no evidence of an assessment for the year 1900, but the assessments for 1898 and 1899 seem to be sufficient.

But it is insisted that no action can be maintained against the land until the personality is exhausted, including the whisky in the bonded warehouse. The whole proceeding is statutory. The rights of the parties depend, therefore, on the terms of the statute. Section 4112 provides that on the failure of the proprietor of a warehouse to pay the taxes within five days after they become due, he shall be deemed delinquent, and the officer authorized to collect the taxes shall at once cause such proceedings to be instituted for the collection of the taxes as may be provided by law for the collection of other delinquent taxes. By sections 4091, 4092, 4104, other delinquent taxes due directly to the State treasury may be recovered by suit. By section 4111 it is made the duty of the warehouseman to pay his taxes to the officer of the State authorized to receive them. When he failed to pay his taxes into the treasury he became a delinquent debtor of the State and might be sued for his taxes under sections 976, 4188, Kentucky Statutes. (Commonwealth, v. Lyddane, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 1514.) When judgment was entered in the Franklin Circuit Court and the execution was returned no property found, the auditor was authorized by section 4169, Kentucky Statutes, to institute an action by equitable proceedings in the Franklin Circuit Court, or any other court of competent jurisdiction.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded for further proceedings consistent herewith.

GOLDEN, &c. v. RUPARD.

(Filed April 19, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Necessity for passway—Parol proof—While there is parol proof that appellee's vendor, True, was entitled to the outlet in controversy as a way of necessity, it was not conveyed to him by the deed, and the inference shown by the parol proof may be rebutted by parol proof which conclusively establishes the fact that True did not claim the passway as a matter of right.

2. Notice—Appellee, who bought from True, was not a bona fide purchaser of anything but what was embraced in his deed, and it was then notorious in the neighborhood that the passway which had been used by True for a time had been closed up by appellant.

3. Adverse possession—The facts showing that appellant during all the time he allowed appellee's vendor and others to pass through his land, he had draw-bars across the passway, and that he moved it from time to time when it suited his convenience and at one time he had a chain across the way at which nobody complained, and all the facts proven, we conclude that there has been no such adverse possession as to create a right of way by prescription.

Beckner & Jouett for appellants.

Pendleton & Bush for appellee.

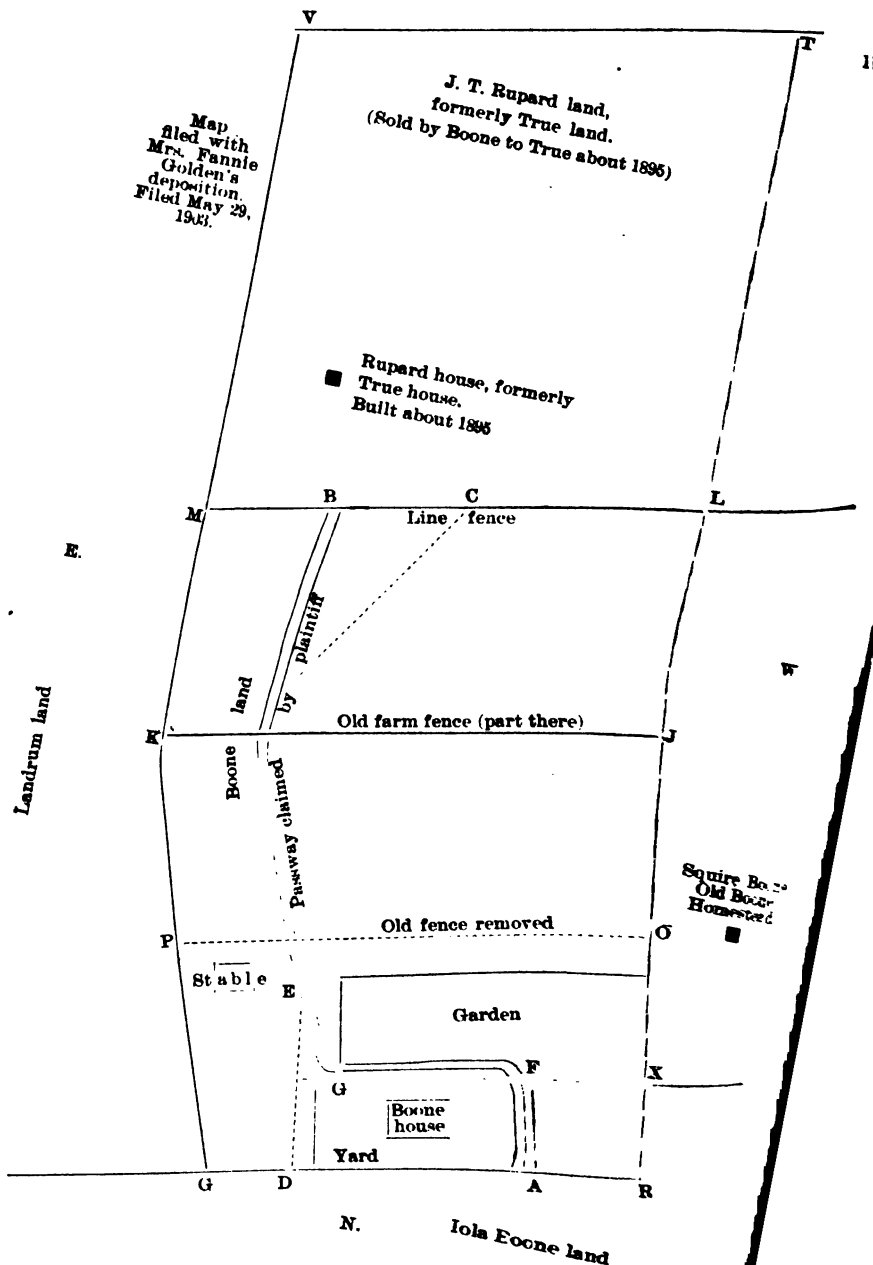

Appeal from Clark Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

Appellee filed this suit to obtain an injunction requiring appellants to remove certain obstructions placed across a passway claimed by him, which he alleged was not less than twenty feet in width, beginning at a point on the line between him and appellants and running thence in a westerly direction following the ridge to a point near appellant's house where the yard fence corners with what is now the garden fence, and running thence next to the yard fence to the southeast corner of the yard fence and thence in a westerly direction through the fence and through the yard to the land of Iola Boone, as shown on the following plat by the letters B, E, G, F, A:

Squire Boone owned a tract of 125 acres of land. His house stood at the point marked on the plat, "Squire Boone, old Boone homestead." After his death, in the division of his estate between his children, this tract fell to three of his sons, one receiving the part where the old homestead stood and lying west of the line L, J, X, on the plat. Another received the northern end of the farm indicated on the plat by the words "Iola Boone land;" and there fell to I. N. Boone, the remainder of the tract indicated on the plat by the lines V, T, J, R, Q, G, K, M, V, containing fifty-three acres. This division was made about twenty years ago or a little more. For some years after the division was made, I. N. Boone was a bachelor and lived at the old homestead with his brother. About five years after it was made he began building him a house at the point marked "Boone House," near the letter A on the plat. This house he finished in a about three years and married and moved into it. About five years after this, I. N. Boone conveyed to J. T. True the south seventeen acres of his tract indicated on the plat by the lines M, V, T, L. True built a house at the point marked "Rupard house" near letter B, and after living there for several years sold the land to appellee Rupard, who then owned the Julia Bunch land lying westward on the plat, and was living in the Bunch house. After his purchase from True, Rupard moved to the True house and was living there when this controversy arose. I. N. Boone, after the deed to True was made, conveyed the remainder of his tract to his wife, Fannie Boone, who is now Fannie Golden, having married a second time since Boone's death. Appellee Rupard bases his claim to the passway on two grounds: First, the seventeen acres which he got of True is a part of the Boone farm and the passway is necessary as an outlet to this seventeen acres; second, he owns sixty-three acres of the Bunch farm and for over fifteen years has had, together with those under whom he claims, adverse possession of the passway.

There are two pikes known as the Schollsville and the Iron Works pike, which are something over two miles apart, the land in controversy lying between them and about a mile and a quarter from the Schollsville pike. From the point A there is an outlet passing through the land of Iola Boone and over the land of John H. Thompson to the Schollsville pike. The way over Thompson's land is claimed by the Boones as a matter of right from long adverse use. Mrs. Iola Boone concedes the right of I. N. Boone and those claiming under him to pass over her land. It also appears that Rupard has the right of way from A out to the pike. So the only question is his right to pass over appellants' land from B to A.

The facts in regard to the first ground of claim to the passway are few and clearly shown by the evidence. When True bought the seventeen acres from Boone he wanted Boone to convey with the land the right of way in question. This Boone refused to do, saying that rather than do this he would lose the sale of the land; but that he would let True pass through there as long as it suited him, or substantially this. True did pass through there for a while, and then Boone closed up the way, and would not let him use it any longer. After this True sold to Rupard. The rule is that a presumption which is raised by parol evidence may be rebutted by parol evidence. While there is evidence from which it might be inferred that True was entitled to this outlet as a way of necessity, it was not conveyed to him by the deed, and the inference shown by the parol proof may be rebutted by the parol proof showing what was the actual agreement of the parties. This question was fully considered in the case of Lebus v. Boston, 107 Ky., 98. Under the rule laid down in that case the parol agreement between True and Boone as to the passway, which is conclusively established by the evidence, cut off True from claiming the passway as a matter of right under the deed; for the deed was silent as to the passway, and it was competent for Boone to show that True had agreed to take the land according to the terms of the deed. Rupard bought the land from True, and has no better standing than he. It is insisted for him that he is a purchaser without notice and that the road was a visible outlet when he bought. Boone is dead, and we think the circumstances preponderate in favor of the conclusion that Rupard bought with notice of the agreement between Boone and True; for it is shown he said that True was obliged to sell as he had no outlet, and while he now denies saying this, his subsequent conduct is confirmatory of the evidence. Besides, he was a near neighbor, and the trouble between Boone and True had gone so far that Boone had struck up notices around, and it would seem that the matter was notorious in the neighborhood. Not only so, but Rupard could not be a bona fide purchaser of anything but what was embraced in True's deed. By purchasing from True he could not acquire any rights in Boone's lands not embraced by the deed. We, therefore, conclude that on the first ground the plaintiff's case fails.

On the other ground on which the passway is claimed the proof is very conflicting. The proof for the plaintiff, by a number of witnesses, is to the effect that the passway, as claimed by him, has been used by the public as a public way along the route claimed by him for something like forty or fifty years. On the other hand, the proof for the defendant is that while there was in Squire Boone's lifetime a passway from one of these pikes to the other, it ran down nearer his house and was not on the land of I. N. Boone. The witnesses who testify to this, are the Boones who lived on the farm and were raised there and have no interest in the controversy. While the proof for the plaintiffs is in the main by persons who lived at some distance and were only along the road at intervals. It is shown that when I. N. Boone got the land there was an old farm fence from K to J, which had no break in it. There was also at another time from P to O an old fence. Three witnesses who cultivated the land at different times after it was set apart to I. N. Boone and before he married and moved into the house which he built, one of them cultivating it that year, testify to cultivating the whole field, leaving no break for a road or passway. At no time were there any gates on the passway. I. N. Boone had across it either fences or bars and he seems to have put either a fence or draw-bars as suited his pleasure without complaint from anybody. Rupard had a difficulty with I. N. Boone while he was living in the Bunch house and about nine or ten years before this controversy arose. Boone then forbade his coming on his land, and from this time he did not use the passway much, if at all, until after he bought the True place. The fact that Boone forbade Rupard's coming on his land, and afterwards refusing to convey to True the right of way over it, is strong evidence that he did not then recognize any right of public way over his land, and his entire conduct from the time that he got the land, to his death, shows the same thing. At one time he put a chain across the way. It is said he did this because he had a blind horse which pulled down the bars; still, the fact that he put up the chain and nobody complained of it, is strong evidence that it was not recognized as a public way. Besides, it ran close to the back of his house and between it and the spot of ground which he used as a garden or truck patch, passing through his yard, among his trees and near his well. At one time the road entered his land at C. He changed it to B to suit his own convenience. When the trouble came up he proposed to Rupard to let him go out from E. to D, Rupard coming to him and saying that he wanted the way chiefly on account of his father, and when a man couldn't buy, he must beg. This proposition was conditioned on Iola Boone's consenting to it. She lived in Bourbon county, and Rupard then went to see her, telling her in effect the same as he had said to Boone, and agreeing that he would fence the way and put up the gates if she would let him go that way. This she declined to do. Rupard denies making these statements, but he has a way out to the other pike, and the preponderance of the evidence is against him as to these admissions. On all the evidence, considering the way the passway was used, the fences across it, and all the circumstances, we conclude that there has been no such adverse possession as to create a right of way by prescription.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded, with directions to dismiss the petition.

WATTON v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed April 19, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Criminal law—Verdict—Where appellant was convicted upon an indictment charging him with the offense of maliciously cutting with intent to kill, there being no evidence erroneously admitted against the appellant, the instructions being correct, the verdict will not be disturbed.

Oliver & Reed for appellant.

N. B. Hays and Loraine Mix for appellee.

Appeal from Marshall Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

The indictment charges the defendant with the offense of willfully and maliciously cutting another with a knife with intent to kill. The court has not been favored with any briefs in this case. We have examined the record with a view to determine whether a new trial should have been granted for the reasons filed on the motion therefor. There seems to have been no evidence erroneously admitted against the defendant which was prejudicial to his substantial rights. The court did not err in the admission of testimony in rebuttal of which complaint is made. It was evidence which should have been admitted in rebuttal and not in chief. We have examined the instructions and find that they are substantially correct.

The judgment is affirmed.

BOTTO'S EX'OR v. BOTTO.

(Filed April 19, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Decedent's estate—Claims against—Pleading—In an action by the executor of an estate against one for the accounting of certain property, and defense was interposed that there was an action pending involving the same defendant for a settlement of the estate, it was error to sustain a demurrer to a reply to this answer, because, taking the averments of the reply to be true, it appeared that the two causes of action were not identical, but were in reality for a wholly different purpose.

Wm. Marshall Bullitt for appellant.

Dodd & Dodd and O'Neal & O'Neal for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Common Pleas Branch, First Division.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

This suit was brought by the appellant, the Fidelity Trust Co., as executor of Florence Irvin Botto, against the appellee, Cloteal B. Botto, on the 14th day of May, 1901. After setting out the probation of her will and their qualification as executor, they allege in substance that for four years preceding the death of Florence Irvin Botto, the defendant, Cloteal B. Botto, was her steward, business manager, confidential agent and adviser; and that in this capacity she had received moneys of Florence Irvin Botto, aggregating $37,999.89, the particular items and dates of which are set out in the petition; and that in addition to these several amounts there had come into her hands as agent various additional sums aggregating between ten and fifteen thousand dollars, the particular items of which they were unable to give; that she had in the same capacity been put in possession of a large amount of personal property belonging to the estate of testatrix, consisting of jewelry, silver ware, household furniture, china, silks, ornaments, books, papers, etc., of which she had failed to render any account, and prayed that she be required to account for the money which came into her hands as such agent, manager and adviser of testatrix and for a judgment for the balance which might be found due to the estate of testatrix and for a judgment requiring the defendant to deliver to the plaintiff the personal property belonging to the estate of testatrix in her hands or for the value thereof in money. The defendant, Cloteal B. Botto by her answer, said that prior to the institution of this action on the 13th of April, 1901, the plaintiff had instituted an action against the defendant and others calling on her to set up any demands existing in her favor against the estate of testatrix; and that the defendant had answered in that action and had fully accounted for all the money and property sued for in this action; that this suit was unnecessary and involved the same parties and the same issues which had been asserted in the former action. To this plea of another suit pending the plaintiff replied that it was true that on the 13th of April, 1901, they had brought a suit against the legatees, and creditors of Florence Irvin Botto for the purpose of settling the estate of their testatrix; and that it had made the defendant, Cloteal B. Botto, a party; that she might set up any claim due her by the estate of testatrix, but that they did not in that suit seek to hold her responsible either for money or property, which had been received by her as agent of testatrix;

that it was simply a suit for the settlement and distribution of the estate of decedent. A general demurrer was interposed to this reply by the defendant, Cloteal B. Botto and sustained, and plaintiff declining to plead further, it was ordered that their petition be dismissed without prejudice, however, to their right to assert its claim against the defendant in the settlement suit, and they have appealed.

"Pleas in abatement, as they do not deny the merits of plaintiff's claim, but simply tend to delay the remedy, are not favored by the courts and the greatest strictness is applied to them, and they will not be aided in construction by any intendment. To support such a plea it must appear that the two suits are for the same cause or causes of action, or the identity of the matters involved must be such that a judgment in the first could be pleaded in bar as a former adjudication." (1 Encyclopedia of Pleading and Practice, 23 and 761; Newman's Pleading and Practice, 481, and Thomas v. Thomas, 26 Ky., 589.) There is a very material difference between a suit brought for the settlement and distribution of an estate, and a suit by the personal representative against a debtor of the estate to require her to account for such indebtedness. It has never been the practice in this State and would not be proper for the personal representative of a decedent to sue the debtors of the estate in the same action for its settlement and distribution. Such a practice would introduce into the action great confusion and uncertainty. Taking the averments of the reply to be true, as we must upon demurrer, it is evident that these actions were not prosecuted for the identical cause of action, but in reality for a wholly different purpose. We are, therefore, of the opinion that the trial court erred in sustaining a demurrer to the reply to the plea of another suit pending, and the judgment is reversed and cause remanded, with direction to overrule the demurrer and for other proceedings consistent herewith.

(Filed May 3, 1904.)

1. Injunction—Pleading—Relief—The appellant who holds a second class certificate as teacher, filed a suit in the Monroe Circuit Court and obtained from the circuit clerk in vacation a temporary injunction to prevent the superintendent of schools of said county from investigating a charge of drunkenness against appellant with the view of revoking his certificate, to which petition the judge of the Monroe Circuit Court sustained a demurrer and dissolved the temporary injunction, from which judgment this appeal is prosecuted. Held—That section 90 of the Civil Code requires the plaintiff to demand in his petition the specific relief to which he considers himself entitled, and as the petition in this case contains no prayer for relief of any kind, the court had no jurisdiction to decree any.

Duff & Hutchinson, Baird & Richardson and W. L. Porter for appellant.
Harlin & White for appellee.

Appeal from Monroe Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

The appellant, Willie Bowman, asks a reversal of a judgment of the Monroe Circuit Court sustaining a special and general demurrer to his petition and dissolving a temporary injunction granted by the circuit clerk in vacation. The petition alleges in substance that he holds a second class certificate as a teacher in the common schools of Monroe county, which was issued to him by the board of examiners, of Monroe county after having been duly examined therefor on the 11th day of July, 1908; and that subsequently on the same day he contracted in writing with the trustees of district No. 22, to teach the common school for a term of five months, beginning on the 27th of July, 1908; and that on the same day the appellee, S. B. D. Ray, County Superintendent of Common Schools, had the following notice served upon him:

"Office of School Superintendent,

"Tompkinsville, Ky., July 11, 1908.

"Mr. Willie Bowman:

"You are hereby notified that charges of drunkenness and immoral conduct have been preferred against you; and that your certificate be revoked. The charges are specifically to the effect that you were drunk at Ing. Bartlett's, and also at Joe Carter's. You will take notice that at 2 o'clock, p. m., Friday, July 17, 1908, the case will be heard in my office, and you will then and there attend and make such plea and proof as may seem to you consistent with truth and equity.

"S. B. D. RAY,

"County Superintendent."

That the defendant in giving the notice was actuated by malice and spite, and had publicly declared that he would prevent plaintiff from teaching the school under his contract; that the pretended charges of drunkenness specified in the notice were malicious and without foundation, and were so known to be by the defendant, and referred to occasions which antedated the issuance of the certificate to him more than two years; that prior to the issuance of the certificate to him on the 11th of July, 1901, he held a similar certificate as a common school teacher for Monroe county; and that the board of examiners, who issued and delivered the last certificate to him, had examined into the truthfulness of the alleged charges and had decided in his favor; and further alleged that the defendant had no jurisdiction or power to determine upon charges affecting his moral character which antedated the issuance of his last certificate to him; that the defendant would not fairly or impartially investigate the charges. The allegations of the petition apparently look to relief from the impending action of the defendant by writ of prohibition, but the petition contains no prayer for such relief.

Section 4417 of the Kentucky Statutes, which is a provisions relating to common schools, provides that for incompetence, neglect of duty, immoral conduct, or other disqualification, the county superintendent may suspend or remove from office any trustee or teacher of any school under his supervision, after five days' notice of the charges made against him. Section 4418 provides for an appeal from the action or decision of the county superintendent to the superintendent of public instruction, in conformity with such rules and requirements as the superintendent of public instruction shall, from time to time, prescribe. Section 4425 imposes the duty upon the county superintendent and other examiners to make investigation as to the moral character of applicants. And section 4503 further provides that if at any time the holder of a county certificate shall be found incompetent, inefficient, immoral, or otherwise unworthy to be a teacher, the county superintendent shall revoke the certificate of such person.

These various sections of the statutes contemplate that the county superintendent shall investigate the moral character of all applicants for teachers' certificates, and imposes upon him the duty of suspending or removing from office any trustee or teacher for incompetency, neglect of duty, immoral conduct, or other disqualification. There can be no doubt that a teacher who habitually uses intoxicating liquors to excess, or while in the discharge of his duty as a teacher, would not be a fit or competent person under the statute to perform the duties imposed by law upon common school teachers, and it would be the duty of the county superintendent to revoke the certificate of such person. But this is not an arbitrary power on his part, and can not be exercised without just cause. The specific charges in the notice served upon the plaintiff are, that he was drunk at Ing. Bartlett's and Joe Carter's. There is no intimation as to the date of these alleged acts of intemperance. So far as the notices go, they may have occurred many years before he obtained his certificate as a teacher, and might not have affected either his moral character or competency at the date of the notice. Unless the alleged intemperance was subsequent to the date of his certificate as a teacher, or was so close thereto in point of time as to affect his moral standing at that time, they would not be sufficient to authorize the revocation of the certificate, or their investigation to that end by appellee. But section 90 of the Civil Code provides: "The petition must state facts which constitute the cause of action in favor of the plaintiff against the defendant, and must demand the specific relief to which the plaintiff considers himself entitled."

As the petition in this case contains no prayer for relief of any kind, the court had no jurisdiction to decree any.

Judgment affirmed.

HARP v. CUMBERLAND TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH CO.

(Filed May 4, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Damages—Instructions—Where appellant was ordered by appellee's chief workmen to complete the digging of a hole in which dynamite had been left by other workmen of appellee, no information of which was given to appellant and he was seriously and dangerously injured by an explosion of the dynamite when he began the work of digging the hole, the evidence showing that the explosive could not be seen; and further, that appellant was unused to explosives, it was error to instruct the jury that he was not entitled to recover unless the jury believed from the evidence that appellee, or its agent in charge of the work knew, or by the use of ordinary care could have known, that the explosive remained in the hole, because it is the duty of the employer to furnish the servant with reasonably safe and suitable tools and a reasonably safe place in which to perform his work.

Gilbert & Gilbert and George Nicholas for appellant.

Willis & Todd for appellee.

Appeal from Shelby Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle.

The appellant sued appellee in the Shelby Circuit Court for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by the negligence of appellee, its employees and servants.

Appellant was employed by appellee in the work of digging holes and setting poles for the use of its telephone wires, and while so engaged he was ordered by appellee's chief workman in charge of the hands to complete the digging of a hole which had been partially made some days before by another of its hands. It further appears that the workmen in appellee's service were in the habit of using dynamite in making such holes, and that some of that explosive had been left without appellant's knowledge, by one or more of appellee's other workmen, in the hole at which he went to work, and though the servant or servants of appellee who had left the dynamite in the hole was present, no information was given by him or them to appellant that it was in the hole, and when he went to work upon the hole it caused an explosion of the dynamite which threw him off his feet, broke his nose, nearly destroyed his eyes, and otherwise greatly injured him. It also appears that the dynamite was concealed from view by mud and water in the hole, that it could not be seen by appellant when or before it exploded, and that he had not previously worked at that hole, and further that he was not experienced in the use of dynamite or other explosives.

The answer of appellee denied any negligence on the part of its servants or employees, alleged contributory negligence on the part of appellant, and that his injuries were caused thereby. This was controverted by reply. Upon the trial the jury returned a verdict for appellee. Following which the appellant entered motion and filed grounds for a new trial, and the motion having been overruled, he seeks at the hands of this court a reversal of the judgment of the court below. It is manifest from the evidence that appellant did not know of the presence of the dynamite in the hole, or have cause to even suspect its presence therein. Furthermore, if it had been incumbent on him to use ordinary care to discover its presence, we are satisfied that the use of such care would not have enabled him to do so. The chief complaint of appellant is that the lower court erred in instructing the jury. The instructions told the jury in substance that the appellant was not entitled to recover unless they believed from the evidence that appellee or its agent in charge of its work knew, or by the exercise of ordinary care could have known, that unexploded dynamite remained in the hole which appellant was digging, and failed to exercise such care, and that appellant, without knowledge of that fact, and while exercising ordinary care, received his injuries. An instruction as to contributory negligence was also given.

We think it was error for the court to so instruct the jury. As has been repeatedly held by this court, it is the duty of the employer to supply the servant with reasonably safe and suitable tools and machinery to perform the work required of him, and equally his duty to furnish him a reasonably safe place to work, and to see that it is kept so.

"This duty of the employer is the first and primary duty, and should at all times by the trial court be kept in view, and no construction of the law should be tolerated that needlessly exposes the servant to danger in the prosecution of the business of the master. Humanity itself demands this much consideration by the employer for the lives and safety of his servants, and the greater the danger to the servant, the greater should be the care and caution demanded by the law of the employer." (Angel v. Jellico Coal Co., 25 Ky. Law Rep., 108; Ohio Valley Ry. Co. v. McKinley, 17 Ky. Law Rep., 1028.)

The appellant had the right to assume that the foregoing rule would be observed by the foreman and other servants of appellee on the occasion of receiving his injuries, and it was their duty to know that there was dynamite in the hole in which he was ordered to dig, and to remove it, or warn him of its presence in time to have prevented his injuries. It is manifest from the evidence that some of the appellee's servants then present did know that there was dynamite in the hole, for they had a few days previously left it there, and further manifest that appellant did not know it was there. It could not be seen because covered by both mud and water. It matters not that it was left in the hole by a fellow servant of appellant, as the negligence of such servant was and is imputable in such a case to the appellee as master. There was no evidence upon which to base the instruction as to contributory negligence, and, therefore, it should not have been given. Upon a retrial of the case the instructions should be made to conform to the views herein expressed.

Wherefore, the judgment is reversed and cause remanded, with directions to the lower court to grant appellant a new trial, and for further proceedings consistent with the opinion herein.

FLOOD v. CHESAPEAKE & OHIO RY. CO.

(Filed April 19, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Railroads—Trespasser—One who enters a passenger train and refuses to pay fare is a trespasser, and he is none the less a trespasser if he tenders a fare which the conductor is not authorized to receive.

J. C. Beckham & Son for appellant.

Willis & Todd for appellee.

Appeal from Shelby Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

In April, 1902, appellant, a deputy sheriff of Shelby county, came to Frankfort to bring a prisoner, and on the morning of the 16th desired to return to his home at Bagdad, a station between Frankfort and Shelbyville. He and a companion left the State House just before the coming in of the westbound C. & O. train and reached the station just as the train was pulling out. They had no time to get tickets and were not asked by the flagman where they were going, but got on the train just as it was leaving the station. When the train had gone about a mile and a quarter the conductor came to Flood and he handed the conductor 42 cents, the regular fare to Bagdad. The conductor asked him "Where to," he said, "Bagdad." The conductor said he did not stop at Bagdad; Flood asked him when he quit, and he said that that was neither here nor there, pay him 75 cents to Shelbyville or he would put him off. Flood said "I am not going to Shelby-ville, I don't want to detain you, but if you don't stop there I will pay you my fare." The conductor refused to agree to this and Flood refused to pay his fare to Shelbyville, so the train was stopped and Flood was put off. He filed this action to recover damages for the ejection. At the conclusion of all the evidence the court instructed the jury peremptorily to find for the defendant, and of this he complains.

The C. & O. trains are run between Lexington and Louisville on the track of the L. & N. R. R., under a traffic arrangement between the two companies. One of the rules governing the train in question is that it stops at Bagdad to let off passengers getting on the train east of Lexington, and also stops there when flagged to take on passengers for Shelbyville; but it did not carry passengers from Frankfort to Bagdad as there was a local L. & N. train following it in a few minutes which carried the local passengers. No tickets were sold from Frankfort to Bagdad for this train and the conductor was not authorized to accept cash fares from Frankfort to Bagdad. Appellant, after he was put off, came back to Frankfort and went home on the local train, reaching there about an hour later than the train from which he was ejected. On that morning the conductor had an order to stop at Bagdad to pass the eastbound train and leave there the dining car which was to come back on the eastbound train.

As the C. & O. trains are operated on the L. & N. track under an agreement with the L. & N. company, they are required to be operated according to the terms of the agreement, and the C. & O. Co. can not do local business on its trains which is forbidden by the agreement. It has no right to do a local business between Frankfort and Bagdad, and to have carried the plaintiff from Frankfort to Bagdad would have been a violation by the conductor of his orders, although on that particular morning he had to stop in the yard there to set off the dining car and allow the other train to pass. A railroad company may run local trains for local business and may also run through trains for through business. The plaintiff had no right to demand of the conductor that he should carry him to Bagdad and the conductor properly refused to do so under his orders; although if the plaintiff had paid his fare to Shelbyville the conductor would have been bound to have accepted it, and the plaintiff might have gotten off when the train reached Bagdad and stopped to put the dining car on the side-track.

The train in fact did not stop at Bagdad that morning to land passengers, and if the conductor had accepted the fare as tendered to him it would have been his duty to stop at the station and let the plaintiff get off in the usual way. The plaintiff had no right to require that he do this and the conductor properly refused to receive the money. The plaintiff knew when he got on the train that it was a through train and he should have learned whether it stopped at Bagdad before getting on it.

He got on the train as it was moving out without any inquiry as to whether it would stop at the point to which he wished to go and was not misled in any way by the defendant. One who enters a passenger train and refuses to pay fare becomes a trespasser and may be ejected by the conductor. He is none the less a trespasser if he tenders a fare which the conductor is not authorized to receive or offer to pay fare only to a station for which the train does not receive passengers. We, therefore, conclude that the court properly instructed the jury to find for the defendant.

Judgment affirmed.

LOUISVILLE PRESBYTERIAN THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, &c. v.
BOTTO, &c.

(Filed April 19, 1904.)

1. Executor—Settling estate—Numerous legatees—Will contest—Expenses incurred by some for benefit of all—Distribution—Rejection of codicils—Fraud and undue influence—Wrongdoers—In a suit by the executor of the will of Florence Irvin Botto to settle her estate, it appears that out of a large number of legatees named in her will, five of them contested the will, thereby expending a large sum for counsel fees and other expenses in preparing the case for trial, in which none of the other legatees participated, resulting in sustaining the original will and defeating three codicils as having been procured by fraud and undue influence, thereby saving about $100,000 to the beneficiaries under the original will. Held—Under the provisions of section 489, Kentucky Statutes, the expenses and fees incurred by the five contestants, being for the benefit of all the legatees under the original will, should be paid out of the general fund before any distribution is made, as all the legatees thereunder must share the burdens as well as the benefits; and the fact that the contestees, who were also large legatees under the original will, as well as chief beneficiaries under the fraudulent codicils, were losers by the contest and had to pay their own costs and counsel fees therein, will not relieve them from sharing in the general loss, as they were the wrong-doers that caused the expenditure.

Wm. M. Bullitt and T. W. Bullitt for appellants.

Dodd & Dodd and O'Neal & O'Neal for appellees.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Common Pleas Branch, First Division.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

James F. Irvin, a resident of Louisville, died in March, 1883, leaving surviving him his widow, Florence Irvin, and one son, Guy F. Irvin, an infant. He left a large estate in the hands of the trustees for the benefit of his wife and son. The son died in 1895, intestate, and unmarried. His will provided, in this contingency, that his wife should have the entire net income of his estate during her life, with the power to dispose of the entire estate in the event she failed to marry again and have children. On the 8th of January, 1896, Mrs. Irvin executed a will, in which she bequeathed to the following persons the sums set opposite their respective names:

Louisville Presbyterian Theological Seminary	$10,000
Louisville Presbyterian Orphanage	10,000
Charles R. Hemphill	15,000
Irvine Lindenberger	10,000
Phillip T. Chinn	3,000
<hr/>
Total legacies to petitioners	$48,000
<hr/>

Also:

Belle C. McVey	$15.00
Second Presbyterian Church	10.00
Polytechnic Society of Kentucky	10.00
Young Men's Christian Association	10.00
John Norton Memorial Infirmary	10.00
Anna Foster	5.00
Home of the Innocents	5.00
St. James' Association, etc.	1.00
Rodman Grubbs	15.00
Cloteal B. Botto	15.00
Wm. M. Botto	35.00
Jane Ballard for life	$6,000
Mary Costello for life	12,000
Jemima Johnson for life	12,000
Jane Jackson for life	12,000
Alex. McHarry for life	12,000
Total legacies to other	188.00
	<hr/>
Total legacies under original will	$236.00
	<hr/>

On the 30th of June, 1897, she executed a codicil, and on the following day, July 1, 1897, was married to William M. Botto, a young man many years her junior, about the age and an intimate friend of her dead son. On the 23d of April, 1898, and the 15th of January, 1900, she executed two additional codicils, the effect of which was to make a radical change in the disposition of her estate from that made in her original will. By these codicils the following legacies were revoked:

Louisville Presbyterian Theological Seminary	$10.00
Polytechnic Society of Kentucky	10.00
Young Men's Christian Association	10.00
Phillip T. Chinn	5.00
	<hr/>
Total legacies revoked	$35.00
	<hr/>

The following legacies were reduced in the amounts, to wit:

$15,000 to Charles R. Hemphill reduced to	$5.00
$10,000 to Irvine Lindenberger reduced to	5.00
$10,000 to Louisville Presbyterian Orphanage reduced to	5.00
$10,000 to Second Presbyterian Church reduced to	5.00
$10,000 to John N. Norton Memorial Infirmary reduced to	5.00
$15,000 to Belle C. McVey reduced to	1.00
$12,000 to Mary Costello reduced to	1.00
$82,000 of legacies being reduced to	27.00
A reduction of	55.00

The following legacies were given:

Dr. W. O. Roberts	$5.00
News Boys' Home	10.00

Children's Free Hospital	$5,000
Cloteal B. Botto, trustee for her niece, Florence I. Harrison	5,000
New legacies given	25,000

While the legacies to her husband, Wm. M. Botto, and his mother, Cloteal B. Botto, were increased from approximately $50,000 to approximately $150,000, and the legacies to the Bottos, and to some others, were by the codicils made preferred devisees. Mrs. Florence Irvin Botto died on the 12th of February, 1900, leaving an estate estimated to be worth about $200,000. The original will and the three codicils were duly probated on the 7th of March, 1900, and on the following day the Fidelity Trust and Safety Vault Co. qualified as her executor. On the 30th of March thereafter, Hugh Irvine and some of the heirs at law of James F. Irvin, prosecuted an appeal to the Jefferson Circuit Court from the order of the county court probating the will; and the Louisville Presbyterian Seminary, the Louisville Presbyterian Orphanage, Charles R. Hemphill, Irvine Lindenberger and Philip T. Chinn, five of the legatees named in the original will, employed Thos. W. and Wm. Marshall Bullitt as their attorneys to have the codicils to the will of Mrs. Florence Irvin Botto set aside on the ground that they were fraudulent and had been obtained by the undue influence and fraud of Cloteal B. Botto and W. M. Botto, and the cost, labor and trouble of the conduct of this litigation fell upon these appellants and their attorneys. The trial in the circuit court occupied the entire month of December, 1900. Counsel for appellants spent nearly two months' time outside of the State of Kentucky, taking depositions, hunting up proof, and preparing the trial, expending in this necessary work nearly $27,000. A jury trial in the circuit court resulted in a verdict sustaining the original will and setting aside all three codicils upon the ground that they had been obtained by fraud and undue influence on the part of the Bottos. As a result of this contest about $100,000 was secured to the devisees under the original will. After the termination of this contest, the Fidelity Trust and Safety Vault Co. instituted this suit for a settlement of the estate, making all of the devisees and creditors of Florence Irvin Botto parties. The five contesting legatees filed their answer, counterclaim and cross petition against the executors and colegatees, averring that the execution of the codicils had been obtained by the fraud of the Bottos; that they had employed counsel and secured the necessary testimony to show this fact; that none of the other legatees had participated in the expense of the preparation or trial of the contest; that they only had a common interest with the other colegatees, and prayed that the extraordinary expenses and counsel fees incurred by them in making the contest for the benefit of all the legatees, should be allowed out of the common fund and so recovered before distribution. The remaining legatees demurred to this answer, counterclaim and cross petition, and the Bottos, who were legatees under the original will, filed their answer and cross petition, in which they allege that the contest and the expense incurred therein by the appellants, were hostile to their interest; and that they had employed, at large expense, their own counsel in defending the contest proceedings. Appellants replied to the answer of the Bottos that the expense incurred by them was wholly due to their fraud, deception and undue influence in procuring the execution of the codicils, and in their efforts to uphold them. A general demurrer was interposed to this reply by the Bottos, and sustained, and appellants' answer and conterclaim, in so far as it sought to recover cost and expense incurred by them out of the common fund, dismissed, and they have appealed.

It is conceded by the demurrer that if the codicils had stood, none of the legatees named in the original will would have received any substantial benefits therefrom, but that the whole estate left by testatrix would have been absorbed in the payment of the costs and expenses and the preferred devisees made to the Bottos in the rejected codicils. The result of the contest made by appellants was to recover for the common benefit of the legatees under the original will, a fund sufficient to pay between 60 and 70 per cent. of such devisees. If the cost of this contest, including attorneys' fees, is thrown upon the contesting legatees, they would receive a much smaller pro rata than their colegatees, who were the equal recipients of the benefits resulting from such contest. It was to meet this state of case that section 499 of the Kentucky Statutes, was enacted. It provides: "In actions for the settlement of estate, or for the recovery of money or property held in joint tenancy, coparcenary, or as tenants in common, if it shall be made to appear that one or more of the legatees, devisees, distributees or parties in interest have prosecuted, for the benefit of others interested with themselves, and have been at trouble and expense in conducting the same, it shall be the duty of the court to allow such person or persons reasonable compensation for such trouble, and for necessary expenses, in addition to the fees and costs; said allowance to be paid out of the funds recovered before distribution, the persons interested having notice of the application for such allowance."

In construing this section, in Taylor, &c. v. Minor, &c., 90 Ky., 548, it was decided that the successful contestant of a will was not entitled to have the extraordinary cost of the contest paid out of the estate where the contest was for his benefit alone, the portion of the other heirs being diminished by the rejection of the will. But in the opinion in that case, the court used this language: "Where, however, one person has prosecuted an action at extra expense and trouble, and the recovery inures equally to the benefit of others, the chancellor may, in the exercise of his power to compel parties to do equity, require them, as a condition to sharing in it, to contribute their proper proportion of the expenses, and may order it paid out of the common fund."

In Boresig & Lawson v. Jarbo & Campbell, decided by the Superior Court, the syllabus of which is found in 13 Ky. Law Rep., 398, it was held that where a creditor had successfully assailed a fraudulent conveyance made by an insolvent debtor with the design to prefer one or more creditors, that the attorneys who brought the suit were entitled to a reasonable fee out of the estate for their services. And in Davis, &c. v. The H. Feltman Co., 23 Ky. Law Rep., 1513, the doctrine of the Superior Court was upheld, the court saying: "The H. Feltman Co. instituted the suit seeking to hold the mortgage of Davis to Walker & Sengstak void under the act of 1856, and their attorneys took all the proof upon the question, wrote the judgment, advised the receiver with regard to the management of the property, argued the case orally in the circuit court and briefed it in the Court of Appeals. As a result of these services the mortgage to Walker & Sengstak for $16,000 with many years interest was set aside, and the property therein mortgaged, inured to the benefit of all the creditors equally. If this mortgage had stood, the general creditors would have received practically nothing upon their claim, as in the end they only realized about 80 per cent. We think the attorney was entitled to a reasonable fee out of the estate for his services."

In Mitchell v. Tyler & Apperson, 90 Ky. Law Rep., 1252, it was decided, that attorneys who, by their services, have added to the assets of the trust estate, are entitled to a reasonable fee, to be paid out of such increase, although they may not have represented the assignee, but have opposed him. The court in that case said: "Exception is taken to the allowance of a fee of $500 to Tyler & Apperson out of the trust fund. It appears that they were not employed by the assignee, and that their services were rendered in hostility to him, to make him account for the profit on the above property and on other exceptions to the settlements of his accounts. They were manifestly entitled to a reasonable fee out of the additions made to the trust fund by reason of their services."

In Mattingly's Trustee v. Mattingly, & Co., 24 Ky. Law Rep., 2080, the above case was cited with approval, and it was decided that attorneys employed by the assignee to surcharge the settlement of the assignee who succeeded in reducing his credits about $4,600, were entitled to an attorney's fee. And this seems to be the general doctrine. In the note to Campbell v. Providence Saving Loan Co. Society, decided by the Supreme Court of Tennessee, and reported in 54 L. R. A., 817, a large number of decisions bearing upon this question have been collated, and the editor of the note sums up his conclusions in these words: "The fees of attorneys for creditors who bring suit in behalf of themselves and other creditors will always be allowed out of the fund going to the creditors in the same class with the plaintiff, if the suit is beneficial to them, on the ground that otherwise the one incurring the risk and conferring the benefit will be in a worse condition than those who do nothing towards realizing the fund, although the mere fact that a suit proves beneficial to other creditors will not justify the allowance of such fees out of the fund, if the plaintiff brought the suit solely in his own behalf."

These cases are not in conflict with Thirwell's Administrator, & Co. v. Campbell's Guardian, & Co., 74 Ky., 168. As in that case all the parties to the litigation were represented by counsel who participated therein, the court in that case simply held that one jointly interested in a recovery could not be compelled to pay counsel employed by others when he had himself employed counsel to represent what appeared to be his interest. It seems to us that there can be no doubt in this, that all the legatees in the original will of Mrs. Florence Irvin Botto equally shared in the benefits which accrued from the litigation instituted by the appellant for their common benefit. It is true that the contest of the codicils was inimical to the pecuniary interest of the two Bottos, W. M. and Cloteal B., who were the principal beneficiaries in the fraudulent codicils, and who were represented in the entire litigation, by counsel of their own selection. But we can not shut our eyes to the fact, that these defendants occupy a dual attitude. They were large legatees under the original will, as well as the chief beneficiaries of the alleged fraudulent codicils, to invalidate which all of the cost and expenses were incurred, and we are unable to see any reason why they should be exempt from the burden cast upon the legatees, especially as they were the chief, if not the only, upholders of these fraudulent codicils.

In the case of Weed's Estate, Appeal of McGinnis, 168, Pa. St., 595, the litigation was instituted by the unsecured creditors of an insolvent estate, to set aside conveyances made and judgment confessed by the trustee for the purpose of giving a preference to other creditors, and the litigation was resisted by the preferred creditors. It was decided that the counsel fees of the contesting creditors should be paid out of the trust estate. The court said: "Why should not the expenses incurred in achieving this result be paid out of the common fund without discrimination between the parties entitled to it? What equity have the parties, who were baffled in their effort to obtain more than their share of the estate, to demand discrimination in their favor? We have failed to discover any. It was their greed for more than they were entitled to under the trust that made the expenses necessary, and it seems to us that under the circumstances they ought not to complain that the burden of paying them is laid on the common fund. It is argued, however, that they were losers by the litigation, and, therefore, they are not within the rule recognized and enforced in Trustee v. Greenough, 105 U. S., 527, and kindred cases. But in what sense were they losers? In the same that he is a loser who fails to acquire what he has no right to, or who, having unlawfully obtained possession of the property of another, is compelled to restore it to the owners. The equity which the wrong-doer has in consequence of such a loss is not easily discoverable. If the allowance in this case was for services in a suit to recover the trust property from a stranger who had unlawfully taken it into his possession, there could be no doubt that equity would require that it should be paid from the trust fund. The fact that the wrong-doers were creditors of the estate ought not to shift the burden from the trust fund to that portion of it which the creditors were entitled to receive on a pro rata distribution of it. In either case, the services were for the benefit of the estate, and it should pay for them."

The same rule was followed in Anniston Loan and Trust Co. v. Ward, 108 Alabama, 85; Merwin v. Richardson, 52 Conn., 122, and in numerous other cases cited and relied upon in the foregoing cases, and in our opinion is equitable and applicable to the facts of this case. The Bottos having occasioned all the cost and expenses incident to the rejection of the codicils, their share of the trust estate should not be exonerated from its part of these expenses. The other legatees being equal beneficiaries with appellants, should share the burden as well as the benefits of the litigation.

For reasons indicated the judgment is reversed and cause remanded, with instructions to overrule the demurrers filed by appellees, and for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

CARMAN v. CARRICO, &c.

(Filed April 19, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Bills and notes—Fraud—Consideration—It appears that in August, 1892, appellant borrowed $750 from J. L. S. and gave his note for said sum, with S. C. as his surety, and at the same time gave S. C. his note and a mortgage on his farm for $752.10 to indemnify him as his surety, the $2.10 in the latter note being to pay for recording the mortgage. After making some payments on the J. L. S. note appellant renewed it for $429.69, with S. C. as surety. He also renewed the $752.10 note to S. C. for $904.30, being the one sued on, which S. C. assigned to his father, H. J. C. It is admitted that it was the practice of S. C. and appellant to manufacture fraudulent mortgages between themselves to protect appellant from his creditors. Held—The court being of the opinion from the evidence that the appellant who is an ignorant negro, was dominated by S. C., who is a shrewd white man, adjudges the note sued on to be fraudulent and without consideration.

2. Building and loan associations—Insolvency—Mode of computing interest—The appellant having negotiated a loan from the Farmers Saving Building and Loan Association with which to pay off the J. L. S. note, it was agreed by S. C. that said association should have a first mortgage lien on the farm of appellant to secure said loan, then amounting to $500, which is also sued on in this action. Held—The record shows that this association was insolvent and in the hands of a receiver, and in such case the rule is to compute the interest at 6 per cent. on the money actually received by the borrower, crediting from time to time, under the system of partial payments, all interest and premiums paid, and the balance thus reached is the amount due.

Webb & Johnson and Jas. G. Husbands for appellant.

Robbins & Thomas for appellees.

Appeal from Graves Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

This action was instituted in the Graves Circuit Court by the appellee, H. J. Carrico, to recover a judgment on a note of $904.30, which had been executed and delivered on the 30th day of January, 1894, by appellant, to Sam Carrico, and assigned by him to appellee; and also to enforce a mortgage on a quarter section of land in Graves county, Kentucky, belonging to appellant, executed and delivered for the purpose of securing the payment of the note. The Farmers Saving, Building and Loan Association, of Nashville, Tenn., who also held a mortgage on the same land, was made defendant, and set up a claim by way of answer and cross petition. As the validity of both of these debts is questioned by appellant, we will consider them in the order named.

Appellant is a negro man, engaged in the business of farming in Graves county. Sam Carrico was, during the time covered by the transaction out of which grew this litigation, engaged in the grocery business in Mayfield, Ky. Appellant was his customer, and seems to have been an energetic man, exceedingly desirous to get financially forward in the world, and to pay off the purchase price, constituting a lien upon his farm. He and Sam Carrico, for a period of four or five years preceding the execution of the note in question had many dealings of various kinds with each other. Carrico sold Carman groceries on credit, indorsed his notes, and occupied the position of his general financier and protector. In return, Carman cut cord wood, the proceeds of which, when sold, he turned over to Carrico; he seems also to have raised large crops of tobacco, the proceeds of which he, from time to time, gave his patron. With this money, Carrico paid off his own indebtedness from Carman, and such other debts as he was security for; in the meantime, it was a part of his scheme of protection to have Carman execute to him notes for large sums, when nothing was owing to him, backed by fraudulent mortgages, both on his farm and crops, ostensibly for the purpose of securing the notes, but really to defraud the creditors of the grantor, and to prevent any seizure by them of the property so fraudulently covered up.

It is not necessary to give all of the details of the complicated dealings between appellant and Carrico; to do so would be to make this opinion a mere commissioner's report of a very long and intricate account; it is sufficient for our purpose to say that the particular note sued on had its origin on August 2, 1892. On that day appellant, Carman, in order to obtain money to pay off pre-existing debts, borrowed from J. L. Stunston $790. for which he executed his note, with Carrico as his surety. At the same time he executed and delivered to the surety his promissory note for $792.10, secured by a mortgage on the property involved in this litigation. This last-named note and mortgage, Carman says was given by him to Carrico for the purpose of securing the latter from any loss by reason of his suretyship on Stunston's note, and also to protect him from his creditors; that at the time of its execution and delivery he owed Carrico nothing; that the difference of $2.10 in the two notes simply represented the sum necessary to pay the clerk's fee for recording the mortgage. On the contrary, however, Carrico claims that the note represented a genuine indebtedness due from Carman to him at the time. Subsequently, Carman paid off a part of the Stunston note, reducing it to $429.69; and on January 30, 1894, he executed to Stunston a new note for this balance, with Carrico, as his surety. and, on the same day, he executed and delivered the note and mortgage sued on, and took up the original note from him to Carrico for $792.10. Afterwards, Sam Carrico assigned this note to his father, H. J. Carrico, who, in 1901, instituted this action to enforce payment.

Appellant, in his answer, set up four defenses, the first of which was want of consideration for the note sued on. Having reached the conclusion that this plea is sustained by the evidence, it will not be necessary to examine the other three.

Ordinarily, great weight is, and should be, given to the presumption imported by the execution and delivery of the instrument itself, that a note is based upon sufficient consideration; but in a case like this, where it is admitted that it was not an uncommon thing in the dealings between parties to execute and deliver fraudulent notes, the weight usually due to such instruments is largely deceased, if not altogether destroyed; and a man who deliberately admits that he has been engaged in such fraudulent actions can not complain that the court attaches but little importance to his evidence. Nor can it be answered that appellant stands in the same attitude with reference to the fraudulent transactions as did Sam Carrico; he is an ignorant negro, and, as such, was largely dominated by the keener intellect of the educated white man, and his actions are not to be judged by the same moral standard as is justly applicable to those of the former; therefore, where it becomes a question of fact between the two, we are inclined to give greater weight to the evidence of appellant than to that of Carrico. With the admission in the case, that it was the practice of Carrico and Carman to manufacture fraudulent notes and mortgages between themselves for the protection of the latter from his creditors, it seems to be just to attach considerable weight to the fact that, on the same day that the note for $792.10 was executed and delivered to Stunston, Carman also executed and delivered to Carrico his note for $792.10, and there is great plausibility in the explanation of appellant, that the difference of $3.10 represented the sum necessary to record the mortgage by which the note was secured.

Carrico was not able, in his deposition, to give any very lucid or satisfactory account of how the consideration for the note sued on was created. His answers are exceedingly vague, and on most of the crucial points his memory was entirely at fault. It was an unfortunate fatality, too, that his books, wherein were kept the accounts between him and appellant, had been burned; and his explanation of this fact was as unsatisfactory as the rest of his testimony. He says that his books were kept by him at his office; but in his absence, a house in the neighborhood was burned, and he supposes the books were burned therein, as he never could find them thereafter; that he does not know who carried them from his office to the burned building; that he did not authorize any one so to do. No explanation is offered for the long time elapsing between the maturity of the notes and the action upon it. Appellant's evidence is very much more satisfactory and lucid than that of Carrico.

After appellant had negotiated a loan from the Farmers Saving, Building and Loan Association, by which to pay off the balance of the Stunston note, the corporation would not complete the transaction, unless it could secure a first mortgage lien upon appellant's farm. As the money to be borrowed was to pay off the Stunston note, there would only remain upon the land the mortgage involved in this litigation, which would constitute a prior lien to that of the building and loan association. It was necessary, therefore, that Carrico's consent should be obtained, that the note of the building and loan association should take priority over his; to this, he agreed. J. P. Evers, an attorney of Mayfield, who represented the building and loan association, explained to Carman that it would be necessary, in order to effectuate the loan he was seeking, that the corporation should have a first lien. What happened on this subject is fully explained in an answer of Evers in his deposition, which is as follows: "During the time I was preparing this abstract, I called Marshall Carman's attention to a lien that appeared on his land in favor of Sam Carrico, and he gave me to understand that that was satisfactory between him and Mr. Carrico; but I sent him after Mr. Carrico, and had him come up to this office, I was then officing in this room, and he and Marshall Carman, after we had talked about this matter some, stepped out in the hall, and was gone some time; some few minutes, and when they came back, I don't think Mr. Carrico sat down, that's my recollection, but just told me that so far as he was interested, that whenever the Stunston business was settled that that settled his affairs, and to go ahead and prepare it."

This testimony of Evers is corroborated fully by Brice Carman, who was present at the time, so that, taking the evidence upon the question of the consideration of the note sued on, as a whole, we think it largely preponderates in favor of appellant's position, that there was none. This conclusion has been reached after a careful reading of the whole record; there is other evidence corroborative of appellant's position, with a recitation of which we do not feel it necessary to encumber this opinion. With the highest respect for the finding of the chancellor as to the facts, we are constrained to the conclusion that he erred in adjudging for appellee upon the issue joined between the parties.

At the time he obtained the loan from the building and loan association to pay the balance of Stunston's debt, appellant executed and delivered to that corporation his note for $500, secured by a mortgage upon his farm. As a defense to its claim, he pleaded that he had more than paid off the debt which it originally held against him. The difference between appellant and the building and loan association largely grows out of the question as to whether the debt of the corporation should be treated as that of a "going concern," or of an insolvent one. The record shows that the building and loan association was insolvent, and in the hands of a receiver; therefore, the debt must be treated as that due an insolvent concern. This court has so often declared the difference in the modes of settling the debts due an insolvent, and those due a "going" building and loan association, that it is not necessary to cite the cases here. It is sufficient to say that, as to an insolvent corporation, the rule is to compute the interest at 6 per cent. upon the money actually received by the borrower, crediting from time to time, under the system of partial payments, all interest and premiums paid; the balance thus reached is the amount due.

Appellant did not cease to be a member of the association prior to its insolvency; to accomplish this, it was necessary to have had a settlement with it prior to the appointment of the receiver; this was not done, and, therefore, he could only settle as above outlined. But we think the court erred in adjudging that he was indebted to the building and loan association in the sum of $345.50 as of April 8, 1903. Mr. Raymond, the receiver of the court, and who had been prior to his appointment, secretary and treasurer of the corporation for ten years, and who is the only witness testifying for it, after setting forth the mode of his calculation, in answer to question 10, says: "Upon the basis set forth above, the amount now due the association by Carman, after allowing a credit for dividends paid, is $278.58. I file as exhibit 'E' to this, my deposition, a calculation showing the balance due by said Carman."

In exhibit "E" is a detailed statement of Carman's account with the corporation, worked out mathematically, and which shows a balance due by appellant, on June 1, 1902, of $278.58. From this date until the date of the judgment there elapsed ten months and seven days, and, therefore, with interest added, the balance due the corporation, when the judgment was en-with any great particularity. Under the rule above laid down, the ascertainment of the exact amount due from appellant to the building and loan association is one of mathematical calculation only, and can be made when the case returns to the trial court, if there is any dispute as to the figures.

For the reasons indicated the judgment is reversed for a judgment consistent herewith.

FLOYD v. LOUISVILLE & NASHVILLE R. R. CO.

(Filed April 19, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Railroads—Undivided interest in land—Title by prescription—In 1864, C. D. Prewitt, who then owned three undivided sevenths in the land, conveyed to appellee his undivided interest therein in a strip 66 feet wide for its right of way. He afterward acquired the other four sevenths and conveyed the entire tract to appellant, who had sued appellees for damages and to quiet his title. The evidence shows that appellee has had an irregular strip 36 to 40 feet wide, under fence for many years last past. Held—That appellee is entitled by prescription to so much of the strip as it has actually used by adverse possession, not to extend beyond its line of fencing.

2. Action to quiet title—Allegation of possession—In an action to quiet title there can be no recovery by the plaintiff in the absence of an allegation in his petition that he is in possession of the piece of land in controversy.

Hugh P. Cooper for appellant.

B. D. Warfield and William C. McChord for appellee.

Appeal from Marion Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

This record involves the claim of appellee to a right of way 66 feet wide, running through the middle of a 70-acre tract of land situated in Marion county, Kentucky, belonging to appellant.

Appellant instituted this action by filing a petition in the Marion Circuit Court, in two paragraphs. By the first, he sets up the fact that more than thirty years before the institution of his action, appellee built its roadway through the land he now owns, actually occupying a strip about 14 feet wide, the possession of which it has held and used continuously since; that this strip of land is worth the sum of $250, and that by reason of the use of this easement by appellee, the remainder of the tract has been injured in the sum of $500; and he, therefore, prays for a judgment for the sum of $750.

The pleadings and undisputed facts show that what is known as the Lebanon branch of appellant's road was built in 1864, running through the land now owned by appellant; that, at the time of the alleged trespass, it was owned in part by one C. D. Prewitt, who afterwards obtained title to the whole, conveyed it, and, by a regular succession of title, it came into the ownership of appellant more than thirty years after the injury complained of. The cause of action, if a trespass, was set up in the first paragraph, accrued to C. D. Prewitt and his ten co-tenants, and it is difficult to see upon what principle appellant can assert a remote vendors, and barred by the statute of limitation for more than twenty years. The court would, doubtless, have sustained a demurrer to the first paragraph had one been filed. In the second paragraph appellant alleged that, although he was the owner of the land in question, appellee, in addition to the strip 14 feet wide, which it had actually occupied for thirty years, was wrongfully claiming title to a strip 66 feet wide through the whole of his boundary; that this claim was wrongful and unwarranted, and cast a cloud upon his title to the remainder of the strip of land, and he, therefore, prays that the cloud be removed, and appellee be adjudged to have no interest in it beyond the 14 feet, which it had actually held in adverse possession since 1864.

The first question that meets us is, whether or not this second paragraph states a cause of action. Appellant nowhere alleges that he is in possession of the land from which he desires to remove the cloud. The statute authorizing this action is contained in section 11, Kentucky Statutes and was originally enacted in 1854; it is as follows: "It shall and may be lawful for any person having both the legal title and possession of lands, to institute and prosecute suit by petition in equity in the circuit court of the county where the lands or some part of them may lie, against any other persons setting up claims thereto; and if the plaintiff shall be able to establish, and does establish, his title to said land, the defendant shall be, by the court, ordered and decreed to release his claim thereto."

In Pomeroy's Code Remedies, section 369, in speaking of the subject of suits to quiet title, it is said: "Originally, and independent of statute, this particular jurisdiction of equity was only invoked when either many persons asserted titles adverse to that of the plaintiff, or when one person repeatedly asserted his single title by a succession of legal actions, all of which had failed, and in either case the object of the suit was to settle the whole controversy in one proceeding. The action, however, has been greatly extended by statute, especially in the Western States, and is there an ordinary means of trying a disputed title between two opposite claimants. The general scope of these statutes is as follows: 'The plaintiff must be in possession claiming an estate in the lands. The adverse claimant or claimants must be out of possession, and must assert a hostile title or interest.'"

In the Encycl. of Pleading and Practice, volume 17, page 306, the rule is thus stated: "As a general rule, both in equity and under the statute of most of the States, it is held that a bill either to quiet title or remove a cloud can be maintained only where the plaintiff is in actual possession." Also, Kinlead v. McGowan, 88 Ky., 91; Landrum v. Farmer, 7 Bush, 49; Harris v. Smith, 2 Dana, 10; Whipple v. Barrick, 93 Ky., 121; Campbell v. Campbell, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 869, and many other cases from this court, cited in the note in support of the text above quoted.

As appellant failed to state a cause of action in his petition, we would have been constrained to affirm this case, but for the fact that the learned chancellor below awarded appellee a judgment over for the recovery of so much of the strip of land 66 feet wide as exceeded the right of way actually occupied by it. This judgment was, evidently, based upon the grant pleaded by appellee from C. D. Prewitt to a strip 66 feet wide, and the assumption that Prewitt undertook to grant the easement in its entirety; whereas an divided interest in the strip. There is no date to the grant, and we can only surmise, by the date of acknowledgment of some of the other grantors in the instrument, that it was made prior to 1864; but how long prior does not appear. C. D. Prewitt was one of seven children who inherited the tract of land in question from their father; originally, he owned only one undivided seventh interest; in 1860 he bought out the interest of one of his sisters; in 1868 he purchased that of another. The other interests, he purchased after 1864; so that we can safely reach the conclusion, and, indeed, the instrument on its face shows, that, at the time of the grant, C. D. Prewitt did not own, or undertake to convey, the whole of the right of way involved in this litigation, but only his undivided interest, whatever that was. Appellee, therefore, did not acquire a grant of the whole strip 66 feet wide, but only such interest therein as C. D. Prewitt at the time had, and it was not entitled to a judgment in this case to recover the strip of land of the full width of 66 feet, based alone upon the grant relied on.

The evidence shows that appellee had under fence for many years last past an irregular strip, probably averaging from 36 to 40 feet. To this, we think, it established its right by prescription; but the title so acquired is limited to so much of the strip 66 feet in width as it actually used by adverse possession, and does not extend beyond its line of fencing on either side of its roadway.

For the reasons indicated the judgment is reversed, with directions to dismiss appellant's petition and to set aside so much of the judgment as awards appellee a recovery of any land outside of its line of fencing as established at the institution of this action.

WOOLFOLK v. CITY OF PADUCAH.

(Filed April 20, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Municipal corporations—Submission of three ordinances for issuing bonds at one election—The act of the board of council of the city of Paducah, a city of the second class, in submitting at one election to the voters of the city, three ordinances for issuing bonds of the city; one for street improvements, one for a city hospital, and one for a city market house, is valid, and not in conflict with chapter 797 of the act of the legislature of 1869-70, providing that "it shall be unlawful for any county judge, or any incorporated company in this State, to submit more than one proposition for taxation, direct or indirect, to the voters of a county, city or town, or part thereof, at any one election held therein."

Campbell & Campbell for appellant.

E. H. Puryear for appellees.

Appeal from McCracken Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court delivered by Judge O'Rear.

In due season prior to the November election, 1903, the board of councilmen of the city of Paducah submitted to the voters of the city, which is a city of this Commonwealth of the second class, duly passed three separate ordinances: One entitled "An ordinance authorizing and providing for the issual of $150,000 of the bonds of the city of Paducah, Ky., for the purpose of street improvements, and submitting same to the voters of Paducah;" another entitled, "An ordinance authorizing and providing for the issual of $25,000 of the bonds of the city of Paducah, Ky., for the purpose of erecting a city hospital in said city, and submitting same to the voters of Paducah;" and the third entitled, "An ordinance authorizing and providing for the issual of $25,000 of the bonds of the city of Paducah, Ky., for the purpose of erecting a market house in said city, and submitting same to the voters of said city."

On the following day (to wit, September 30, 1903), the board of aldermen of the city in special session gave the three ordinances their first, and on the next day, at another special session, their second and final passage. The ordinances were duly signed and approved by the mayor. At the November election, held in 1903, more than two-thirds of the voters of the city, voting at that election, and on those questions, voted in favor of each and all the three ordinances; the result was so declared and certified by the board of canvassers. This suit is to test the validity of the vote by which the indebtedness was authorized. Appellant's contention is, that more than one vote can not be taken on the same day to incur a municipal bonded indebtedness.

A general law passed at the session of the legislature held in 1869-1870 reads as follows:

"CHAPTER 797.

"AN ACT in Relation to Submitting Questions of Taxation to a Vote of the People.

"Section 1. That it shall be unlawful for any county judge, county court, police judge, justice of the peace or any incorporated company in the Commonwealth, to submit more than one proposition for taxation, direct or indirect, to the voters of a county, city or town, or part thereof, at any one election held therein.

"Sec. 2. Any tax, subscription or donation, or any authority to tax, make subscriptions or donations, or otherwise directly or indirectly, to impose a tax upon the people of such county, city or town, or part thereof, voted or granted by the voters at an election, at which more than one question was voted upon, shall be held null and void.

"Sec. 3. All acts and parts of acts, public or private, inconsistent with the provisions of sections 1 and 2 of this act, are hereby repealed.

"Sec. 4. This act to take effect and be in force from and after its passage."

This act has not been expressly repealed. At the time of that enactment there were some general and many special or local statutes permitting counties and cities to become indebted by vote of their people for many things, including aid to railroad and other quasi public enterprises, and to an almost unlimited extent. The purpose of the act quoted was to prevent, as far as might be, combinations and logrolling by promoters of several disconnected projects, by whose united efforts and interest all would be made to carry, when if made to stand each on its own merits, maybe none would. (Christian County v. Smith, 11 Ky. Law Rep., 884.)

But since the adoption of the Constitution of 1891, no county or municipality can lend its aid to any corporation or private enterprise. Taxes can not now be levied for any but public purposes. And as to these, limitations are imposed as to amount and the manner of incurring them, that are new in our system. In consequence the legislature has, by general laws, provided for what purposes and how bonded indebtedness may be incurred by cities of the various classes, which excludes every other method heretofore allowed. The legislation on this subject is comprehensive and general, making an entirely new and complete system on that subject. Fragmentary legislation suited alone to conditions no longer existent, and repugnant to the general laws since enacted, are deemed to have been repealed by the latter. (Broadus v. Broadus, 10 Bush, 299.)

No other question being urged against the validity of the election, and the ordinances and vote appearing regular, the judgment of the circuit court adjudging the bonds valid, and refusing the injunction restraining their issue and sale by the city, is affirmed.

Whole court sitting.

AMERICAN NATIONAL BANK v. MOREY.

(Filed April 20, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Banks—Depositors—Checks—Upon a second appeal from a judgment in favor of appellee against appellant for dishonor of her check, the last trial conforming in all respects to the former opinion of the Court of Appeals and the evidence authorizing the verdict, it will not be disturbed, it appearing that it is not excessive.

Humphrey, Burnett & Humphrey for appellant.

R. C. & J. J. Davis for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Common Pleas Branch, First Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

This is the second appeal in this case. The first opinion is reported in 24 Ky. Law Rep., 658, and is referred to for a history of the facts relative thereto. In that opinion the court said that the instruction on punitive damages should not have been given; that she was only entitled to recover for the loss of credit, of business or of instruction in her art that she sustained by reason of the dishonor of her check. On the return of the case to the lower court, the appellee filed an amended petition setting forth these matters of damage as permitted by the former opinion. Another trial was had before a jury and the court gave to the jury the following instruction: "It will be your duty in this case to find for the plaintiff in such sum as you may believe from the evidence will fairly and reasonably compensate her for any loss of credit she may have suffered, or for any loss of time or instruction which she otherwise would have enjoyed, and for any expense she may have incurred in telegraphing by reason of the nonpayment of the check mentioned in the petition."

The evidence produced on the last trial in substance showed that, by reason of the dishonor of the check, she lost the confidence of her instructor and was compelled to desist from further instruction for four weeks which she had intended to take. It was her intention, after finishing her course of instruction, to open a shop for her business and art in the following December, but, by reason of the dishonor of this check, she was compelled to delay her opening until the following March. Also she expended $3.86 in telegraphing to appellant in trying to induce them to honor her check and to her relatives in Louisville to obtain money to meet this dishonored check. The jury returned a verdict on this last trial for $500 in favor of appellee which the court refused to set aside and rendered judgment thereon and the appellant has appealed. The last trial conformed in all respects to the former opinion of this court in this case. The only question to be determined is, whether or not the amount of the verdict is excessive. She certainly was entitled to recover some damages.

In the former opinion it is shown that a judgment for $300 for dishonoring was affirmed. (Patterson v. Marine National Bank, 130 Pa., 419.) The court in that case charged the jury that the plaintiff was entitled to recover substantial damages and in a certain state of case they might find punitive damages.

In the same opinion the case of Schafner v. Ehrman, 139 Ill., 109, was referred to where a judgment for $450 was affirmed, where the dishonor of the check was due to a mistake of the bookkeeper in charging the checks of another customer to the account of the plaintiff. In the former opinion in this case the court quoted from the above Pennsylvania case the following language: "Individual and corporate business could hardly exist for a day without banking facilities. At the same time the business of the community would be at the mercy of banks if they could, at their pleasure, refuse to honor their depositor's checks, and then claim that such action was a mere breach of an ordinary contract for which only nominal damages could be recovered unless special damages were proven. There is something more than a breach of contract in such cases; there is a question of public policy involved and a breach of the implied contract between the bank and its depositor entitles the latter to recover substantial damages."

While this verdict, in a sense appears large, yet, we are unwilling to invade the province of the jury, especially after a second trial, and determine the damages recovered are anything more than substantial.

Wherefore, the judgment of the lower court is affirmed, with damages.

HESCH v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed April 20, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Appeal—Insufficient transcript—Where the transcript fails to show that the bill of exceptions was approved, or filed by an order of court, or signed by the judge, and there is no certificate of the clerk that it is a transcript of the record upon which appellant was convicted, the appeal will be dismissed.

James M. Guthrie for appellant.

N. B. Hays and Loraine Mix for appellee.

Appeal from Campbell Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

The record upon which this appeal is prosecuted is too indefinite and without such certificate as will warrant the court's undertaking to act upon it. There is no certificate by the clerk to the transcript that it is a transcript of the record upon which appellant was convicted, or that it is a copy of any record. The transcript as presented, does not show that the bill of exceptions was approved or filed by an order of court, nor does it appear to be signed by the judge.

The record is condemned and the appeal dismissed.

HUGHES v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed April 20, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Affidavit for continuance—Conduct of counsel—One charged with crime, being of years of understanding, must take notice of the requirements and privileges of the law, and the neglect of his counsel to defend for him can not avail as ground for continuance.

2. Same—An affidavit filed by the accused for a continuance can not be rebutted by counter affidavits. Generally its truth must be admitted on the hearing.

Powers & Sampson for appellant.

N. B. Hays and Loraine Mix for appellee.

Appeal from Knox Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

Appellant's affidavit for continuance, filed at the second term of the court after the return of the indictment, relied upon the absence of certain witnesses who, it was asserted, would depose to important facts bearing on appellant's defense. It also sought to excuse appellants apparent lack of diligence by pleading his ignorance of the proceedings in criminal trials, and that his counsel appointed by the court to defend him, he having been unable to employ counsel, neglected to take necessary and usual steps to obtain the attendance of the absent witnesses.

The continuance at the first term after the indictment was returned was brought about by the absence of the two witnesses mainly relied on in this motion. It was then claimed, and is yet claimed, that they reside in an adjoining county. No process was taken for them so far as the record shows, until the case was called for trial at the term at which the last application for continuance was made. The court is of opinion that one charged with crime at the court, being of years of understanding, must take notice both of requirements and privileges of the law, and furthermore, that the neglect of counsel, whether it be of employed counsel or those appointed by the court to defend for him, can not avail the accused as a ground of continuance. In the order overruling the motion for a continuance the court recited that at the previous term of the court he explained to the defendant in open court, and in the presence of his counsel, that he would be afforded, and was thereby awarded compulsory process to obtain the presence of all his witnesses. The propriety of the court's recital is questioned. An affidavit filed by the accused for a continuance can not be rebutted by counter affidavits. Generally its truth must be admitted on the hearing. As the purpose of the affidavit is to apprise the court of the state of facts with which he is not presumed to be acquainted, that he might act upon it with intelligence and fairness, it would, of course, not be necessary to file an affidavit at all if the only matter sought to be shown was something that had occurred in the presence, or was presumably within the knowledge of the court. Such fact might be shown in the record merely by a bill of exceptions. If, though, the accused sees proper to set it out in an affidavit the court should not be bound to admit that as true which he knows is not true. To do so would put the court and the administration of justice virtually in the hands of a conscienceless person accused of crime. It was not inappropriate, in our opinion, for the court to recite in an order, or to have incorporated in a bill of exceptions, an occurrence in court that would set it right upon the record for the protection of all parties to the suit, and for the guidance of this court upon an appeal if an appeal should be taken. The trial judge did postpone the last trial for four days, and awarded compulsory process for appellant's absent witnesses, and appointed a special bailiff to go to the adjoining county to find them. The process was returned not executed because the witnesses could not be found. The court has done all that it should reasonably have done, and all that appellant had the right to ask in the matter of awarding process to require the attendance of witnesses, and in bringing about a speedy and fair trial of the case. Indeed, it was not incumbent upon the court to have allowed read the affidavit as the depositions of certain absent witnesses who lived in the county, and whose presence might have been obtained apparently by even slight diligence. The instructions given by the court, to which some complaint is made, have been frequently approved heretofore in other cases from the same and other circuits. Perceiving no error prejudicial to the substantial rights of appellant the judgment is affirmed.

BALTIMORE & OHIO SOUTHWESTERN RY. CO. v. HUDSON.

(Filed April 20, 1904.)

1. Excursion ticket—Identification of holder—Reasonableness of rule—A condition upon a return excursion ticket sold by the railroad company at a reduced rate, requiring the holder to identify herself as the original purchaser of the ticket, by writing her signature on the back thereof, and if this is not satisfactory to the validating agent of the company, to produce other proofs of identity, is neither unreasonable nor unusual, and has been universally held to be based upon sufficient consideration.

2. Burden of proof—If the validating ticket agent was not satisfied from a comparison of the signatures of the claimant, as to her identity, the burden of producing such proof, if required by him, was upon her, and it was so stipulated in the contract. Nor was he required to have accepted her mere verbal assurance of her identity or instituting other inquiries with a view of satisfying his mind on this point.

8. Instructions—An instruction given by the trial court, making the liability of appellant turn upon whether the jury believed the ticket agent wrongfully refused to validate the ticket, was misleading. Appellant was entitled to have the jury decide, not whether they believed the agent acted wrongfully in refusing to validate the ticket, but whether the proof of her identity as purchaser of the ticket was such as would have satisfied the mind of a reasonable, conscientious and prudent man who had been selected by the parties to pass upon the question.

Gibson, Marshall & Gibson for appellant.

Harvey Myers, J. C. Dodd and W. H. Smith for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Common Pleas Branch, First Division.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

The appellee, Susie C. Hudson, instituted this suit against the appellant, the Baltimore & Ohio Southwestern Ry. Co., to recover damages for the refusal of their agent in Cincinnati to validate an excursion ticket, alleged to have been purchased by her from St. Louis to Cincinnati and return, and without which the ticket could not have been used by her. She alleges in substance that on the 22d of December, 1900, she purchased of the defendant at St. Louis, Mo., a round trip ticket over their road to Cincinnati, O., good until the 2d of January, 1901; that on the 26th of December, 1900, she presented her ticket to the agent of the defendant at Cincinnati and signed it, as required by its terms, for return passage to St. Louis, and that defendant's agent wrongfully refused to validate the ticket or to admit the plaintiff to its train, and publicly charged that she was attempting to use a ticket of which she was not the original purchaser; that she was employed as a teacher in a stenographic school in the city of St. ———, and had contracted to return to her place of duty on the morning of the 27th of December, 1900; that by the refusal of the defendant's agent to stamp her ticket, she missed the regular train by which she could have complied with her obligation, and was compelled to buy another ticket and go on the next train, which did not leave Cincinnati until 2 o'clock, a. m., on the morning of December 27th, and which did not arrive in St. Louis until the afternoon of the 27th; and that she consequently lost her position as a teacher and was made sick and nervous by the delay and treatment which she received. Appellant's original answer is a traverse, and the amended answer alleges that a round trip ticket was sold on December 22 to some one who represented herself to be Susie Hudson by signing her name on the face of the ticket, which was not by its terms transferable, and contained, among other stipulations, the following: "I further agree that on the day of my departure returning, I will identify myself as the original purchaser of this ticket by writing my signature on the back of this contract, and by other means if necessary, in the presence of the ticket agent of the Baltimore & Ohio Southwestern Ry. Co., at Cincinnati, and when so officially executed and signed by said agent, this ticket shall then be good for one continuous passage beginning on the day of such execution."

That when this ticket was presented to appellant's agent in Cincinnati by a person representing herself to be the original purchaser, he required her to identify herself by signing her name on the back of the ticket, as required by the contract, which she did, signing her name "Susie C. Hudson;" that the signature of the original purchaser on the face of the ticket was so dissimilar from that appearing on the back, that the agent refused to validate the ticket on the ground that they were not the same signatures, and referred the holder to the depot passenger agent of the company, at that time in the depot, who was also not satisfied with the identification, and advised the plaintiff to pay her fare to St. Louis, with the assurance that it would be refunded to her if she should sufficiently identify herself as the original purchaser. The amended answer was controverted of record, and the trial resulted in a verdict and judgment for $1,000, which the railroad company seeks upon this appeal to reverse.

Appellee testified that she was employed as a teacher in a stenographic school in St. Louis at $45 per month; that she purchased the ticket in controversy after 12 o'clock at night, and left St. Louis on the train leaving for Cincinnati at 2 o'clock, a. m., on the morning of December 22; that on the evening of December 26, she presented this ticket at 7:30 o'clock to defendant's agent at their station in Cincinnati, O., and in his presence signed her name on the back of the ticket, and requested him to validate it for the train leaving Cincinnati at 8 o'clock, which he refused to do, remarking, in the presence of several persons, in an offensive manner, that she was not the Susie Hudson who signed the ticket on its face, and that she had bought it of a scalper; that she thereupon assured him she was the original purchaser and was compelled to be in St. Louis the next morning at 8 o'clock by contract with her employer, or lose her position; and that she could not arrive there unless he validated her ticket so that she could go on the next train, and informed him that she had a valise in the baggage room which contained letters and papers by which she could identify herself, if he would examine them, which he declined to do, and referred her to another officer of the company, who was at that time on the floor of the waiting room, and to whom she preferred the same request, but who, after examining the signatures on the face and back of the ticket, refused to interfere, and who advised her to purchase another ticket and make claim to have the money refunded to her in St. Louis. Plaintiff testifies that after the second refusal, she left the depot, went over to Covington to see her attorney in this case, and found his partner, to whom she explained the situation, and left the ticket with him, with instructions to institute this suit; that she then returned to the depot in Cincinnati and bought a ticket and left for St. Louis on the train leaving Cincinnati at 2 o'clock, a. m., six hours later; that as a result of this delay she lost her position in the stenographic school in St. Louis, and was made sick by the delay and exposure in her trip to Covington. She also introduced as witnesses two bystanders, who testify that the ticket agent in Cincinnati was impolite and disrespectful at the time he refused to validate her ticket in Cincinnati. The agent of the railway company in St. Louis, who sold the ticket in controversy, testified that it was sold and stamped in St. Louis after 6:30 a. m., on the morning of December 22, some hours after the departure of the train on which the plaintiff testified that she left St. Louis; that he knew this to be true because he did not go on duty until 6:30 on the morning of December 22, and that he recognized the signature of Henry Lytho as his handwriting. The agent in Cincinnati testified that he refused to validate the ticket because the signature on the back of the ticket did not correspond with the signature on the front; that it contained the letter "C.," and was wholly dissimilar in appearance; that he asked appellee if she always wrote her name with "C.;" that she replied that she did; that he then asked her to sign her name over again on a small envelope which he handed her; that she did so, and her signature was exactly like the one on the back of the ticket; that he then asked her if she had any means of identification about her person; that she replied that she had none with her, but had some baggage; that he referred her to the depot passenger agent, which was the last that he saw of her. Both witnesses testified that there is a striking difference in the appearance of the two signatures. The railroad company also introduced a number of experts who testified to a very radical difference between the signatures on the face and on the back of the ticket. The following are fac simile of the two signatures:

Lusie Hudson
Susie C. Hudson

No testimony was introduced by appellee to rebut the testimony of these experts. Upon the trial the court instructed the jury as follows:

"A. The court instructs the jury that if they shall believe from the evidence that on the 22d of December, 1900, the plaintiff bought from the defendant at St. Louis a round trip ticket from St. Louis to Cincinnati, and that within the time limited by the terms of the contract, that is, upon the 28th of December, 1900, she presented the ticket to the agent of the defendant at Cincinnati and signed her name upon it in his presence, as required by the terms of said ticket; and that said agent wrongfully refused to validate the ticket and refused to admit her to the train for her said return trip upon said ticket to St. Louis, and charged her with presenting a fraudulent ticket, then the law is for the plaintiff, and they should so find."

"B. But unless the plaintiff bought the said round trip ticket at St. Louis and signed her name upon it at Cincinnati, as required by the contract therein, and requested the defendants to validate it, and the agent wrongfully refused to do so, then the law is for the defendant, and the jury should so find."

A condition upon a return excursion ticket sold by the railroad company at a reduced rate requiring the holder to identify herself as the original purchaser of the ticket by writing her signature on the back thereof, and if this is not satisfactory to the validating agent of the company, to produce other validity of such conditions have, we believe, been universally upheld as based upon a sufficient consideration. (Hutchinson on Carriers, section 580b; Ray on Negligence of Imposed Duties, Carriers of Passengers, sections 511 and 512.)

If the validating ticket agent was not satisfied from a comparison of the signatures of the claimant of the ticket as to her identity, the burden of producing such proof, if required by him, was upon her, and it was so stipulated in the contract. Nor was he required to have accepted her mere verbal assurance of her identity, or instituting other inquiries with a view of satisfying his mind on this point. (Railway Co. v. Barlow, 80 S. E., 732; Head v. Georgia Pacific Railway Co., 79 Ga., 358.) If it be conceded that the dissimilarity in the signatures on the face and back of the ticket was sufficient to have justified a conscientious and reasonably prudent agent in requiring additional proof of her identity, then the question arises whether the proof produced by appellee, or offered to be produced by her, was sufficient for this purpose, and this is a question of fact for the decision of the jury. The instructions given by the trial court make appellant's liability turn upon whether the jury believed the ticket agent wrongfully refused to validate the ticket. This is not a full and clear statement of the law of the case. Appellant was entitled to have had the jury decide, not whether they believed the agent acted wrongfully in refusing to validate the ticket, but whether the proof of her identity as purchaser of the ticket offered to the ticket agent was such as would have satisfied the mind of a reasonable, conscientious and prudent man, who had been selected by the parties to pass upon the question. As a general proposition, it is more important for the railroad company that the identity of the holder and purchaser of the ticket should, be satisfactorily established, than to the ticket holder, for the reason that a genuine purchaser can always require the company to refund her money if the validating agent wrongfully refused to stamp her ticket, whilst, on the other hand, a mistake against the company in this matter would leave them practically without remedy.

For reasons indicated the judgment is reversed and caused remanded for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

PIERCY v. SMITH, &c.

(Filed April 20, 1904.)

1. Superintendent of schools—Fixing salary—Fiscal court—Change in law after election—It was not competent for either the legislature to change the law raising the minimum of salaries to be allowed to county superintendents, nor for the fiscal court to change the rate per capita allowed and first fixed under the statute during the term of those who were in office.

2. Same—Per capita—Under section 4419, Kentucky Statutes, prior to the amendment of March 21, 1902, it appearing there was no general order fixing the salary before the election in November, 1901, the salary should have been pupil child reported, but could not be less than $250 per year, nor more than $1,500.

E. Bertram for appellant.

Stone & Stone for appellees.

Appeal from Clinton Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

Appellant was elected county superintendent of common schools for Clinton county November, 1901, when the law as to the compensation of such officers was as embraced in section 4419, of Kentucky Statutes, that is, his salary should be allowed annually by the fiscal court of his county, based on the number of children reported in the census report of the district trustees of such county; which salary should not be less than 8 cents nor more than 20 cents for each pupil child thus reported, but wherein it was provided "that no salary shall be less than $250 nor greater than $1,500." After appellant had assumed the duties of his office, by an act approved March 21, 1902, section 4419, supra, was amended so as to provide that the minimum salary to be paid the superintendent should not be less than $400, and that the maximum should not be greater than $1,500 annually. The minimum and maximum per capita rate by which the salary might be regulated, was not altered by the amendment. Clinton county had not exceeding 2,600 population within the school age. At the first term of the fiscal court, after appellant's election, it fixed his salary at $275 per year. This suit is to increase the allowance to the minimum of $400 provided in the amendment of March, 1902. The circuit court adjudged that the amendment did not apply to those in office when the amendment was adopted.

Sections 161 and 235 of the Constitution prohibit the changing of any official's salary after his election or appointment, or during his term of office. These sections have been construed in Marion County Fiscal Court v. Kelley, 22 Ky. Law Rep., 174; Barrett v. Falmouth, 109 Ky., 151; Bright v. Stone, Auditor, 20 Ky. Law Rep., 817, and Butler County v. James, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 301. In the last-named case, construing the foregoing constitutional provisions, the court said: "It is the duty of the fiscal court to fix the salary of the county judge and other county officers, to be allowed by it, before their election, that is, there should be a general order fixing the salaries, and not an allowance each year for that year; and when the salaries are once fixed, they can not be changed to affect those already elected or appointed, and any change will not take effect until after the next election or appointment."

In the last-named case it was held that although the fiscal court had not by a general order fixed the salary of the county official, they could do it after his election, as otherwise it could not be fixed at all, and that the failure of the fiscal court to do its duty in that respect could not be permitted to deprive the official of his reasonable compensation guaranteed him by law.

The statute under consideration in this case did not fix the county superintendent's salary at either any other specific sum. It conferred restriction that it should not be less than 8 cents nor more than 20 cents for each pupil child reported, and providing that the total sum thus arrived at should not be less nor greater than the extremes stated. It occurs to us that it was the purpose of the legislature in this provision that the fiscal court in making the allowance should base it upon a rate per pupil reported, which was to be definitely stated in the order and within the limitation above noticed. But it was also contemplated that the number of pupils in certain counties might be so few, and in certain others so great, as that in the one instance inadequate compensation would thus be provided, while in others, based upon the same rate, exorbitant salaries might be allowed, the further limitation was imposed that the minimum and maximum amounts allowed upon the per capita rate should control the fiscal courts. An appropriate order in this case, if the fiscal court deemed that $275 would be a fair compensation for the service of its county superintendent, would have been to have allowed, say 15 10-13 cents for each pupil child reported. It was evidently contemplated in thus fixing salaries of these officials in this manner that it would be a special inducement to them to be vigilant in looking after and reporting the full number of child population entitled to be enrolled in the school census. As the total number so enrolled might increase or decrease in the different years of the official's term, the total amount of his salary would be increased or diminished by that fact, yet the rate of allowance originally fixed would remain the same. For example, a statute fixing certain fees for the service of clerks of courts is deemed, under this section of the Constitution, to be irrevocable during the term of the incumbent, although that officers' salary in the aggregate might fluctuate according to the business done each year. This was expressly held in Brights' case, supra.

It was not competent for either the legislature to change the law raising the minimum of salaries to be allowed to county superintendents, nor for the fiscal courts to change the rate per capita allowed and first fixed under the statute during the term of those who were in office. The effect of the allowance for the first year, made after appellant's election, it appearing that there was no general order fixing the salary before the election, when divided by the total number of pupil children reported for that year, will show the per capita allowance to be taken as the basis for fixing the salary of future years of the term, and the minimum to be allowed could not be less under the statute then in force, to wit, $250 per year whatever may be the number of children reported for such year.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

TURNER v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed April 20, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Jury—Overlooking name in jury box—Summoning bystanders—The fact that the clerk, by oversight, failed to draw one name from the jury box, and the court believing that all the names therein were exhausted, ordered the sheriff to forthwith summon bystanders to complete the panel, if an error, was not such an error as this court has authority to revise under section 281, Criminal Code.

2. Delay in trial—Discretion of trial court—The court did not abuse its discretion in refusing on motion of defendant, after the evidence was all in, to allow him time until the following day to procure the attendance of new witnesses with whom he had not talked, and whose whereabouts were unknown, only one of whom could certainly be produced and whose evidence was merely cumulative in his effort to establish an alibi, upon which point he had introduced a number of witnesses.

3. Additional instruction after argument—The fact that the court gave the jury an additional instruction after defendant's counsel had closed the argument, while to be condemned is not a reversible error when the instruction was a proper one and favorable to defendant, and especially when the court offered to allow counsel for defendant to reargue the instructions, which was declined.

E. N. Ingram for appellant.

N. B. Hays and Loraine Mix for appellee.

Appeal from Bell Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle.

The appellant, General Turner, was tried and convicted in the Bell Circuit Court, at the January term, 1904, under an indictment for murder, his punishment being fixed by the jury at imprisonment in the penitentiary for life.

His motion for a new trial having been overruled by the lower court, he seeks by this appeal a reversal of the judgment of conviction. It appears from the record that he was jointly indicted with nine others, whose names appear in the indictment, for the murder of Charles Cecil, who lost his life at what is known as the Quarter House, in Bell county, it being charged in the indictment that he was shot and killed by one or more of the defendants named in the indictment, the others aiding and abetting in the act, but that the name of the one who actually fired the shot causing the death of Cecil was, to the grand jury, unknown.

Appellant was accorded a separate trial. It was shown by the evidence that W. C. Thompson, a deputy sheriff of Bell county, having in his possession warrants of arrest against Lee Turner, a brother of appellant, and Boone McQuary, summoned a posse comitatus, of whom Charles Cecil was one, and went to the Quarter House, in which Lee Turner was at the time keeping a saloon, for the purpose of arresting the persons named in the warrants. It does not fully appear whether or not the deputy sheriff then had in his possession a warrant for the arrest of appellant, though he did, as he testified, about that time have a warrant in which appellant was charged with the murder of one Pridemore. Upon reaching the Quarter House, which was surrounded by a stockade enclosing from three to five acres of ground, the deputy sheriff and his posse entered the stockade, and finding the doors of the Quarter House closed, he went to one door of the house with some of the posse, and Charles Cecil, with others of the posse, went to another door. The deputy sheriff then demanded the surrender of the persons for whom he had warrants, telling them with what they were charged and that if they would come out and yield themselves to arrest they would be protected. The only reply to this demand was a voice from the house which said "We'll give you warrants in hell." About that time two or three shots were fired from the bushes of a hill on the one side of the house, immediately followed by shots from the house. At the first fire Cecil fell, mortally wounded, and shortly thereafter died. The firing then became general, shots coming from several points on the hills surrounding the Quarter House, as well as from the house itself, which were returned by the deputy sheriff and his posse.

According to the statements of many of the Commonwealth's witnesses, the shooting continued in a desultory manner for nearly or quite an hour, though none of the parties on either side besides Cecil was killed or wounded. During the shooting the Quarter House was burned. After dark the deputy sheriff and those associated with him again ventured inside of the stockade, but found that the persons who had been in the Quarter House had all escaped. They then took the dead body of Cecil and returned to Middlesboro.

Some of the witnesses for the Commonwealth testified that there seemed to be from twenty to thirty persons engaged in shooting at the deputy sheriff and his posse, and it is evident that the attack was the result of a preconcerted plan on the part of those resisting the officer and his posse, for the deputy sheriff testified that on the afternoon before the fight he called up Lee Turner at the Quarter House from Middlesboro and informed him that he had the warrants of arrest for him and McQuary, and that he would be out on the afternoon of the following day for the purpose of making the arrest, and that to this message some one in a voice which he took to be that of Turner replied over the telephone in a laughing way, "All right. I will take care of you."

The appellant's defense was an attempted alibi. He testified in his own behalf that he had received information on that day that the deputy sheriff would come out to the Quarter House to make the arrests, and that a few minutes before the arrival of that officer and his posse, he, in company with a number of women, whom he advised to seek a place of safety, left the vicinity of the Quarter House and went down the dirt road toward the railroad and the Mingo Coal Mine, and that about the time they reached the railroad at a point some three or four hundred yards from the Quarter House, the shooting began at the Quarter House, and continued for some time, as he and his party pursued their way down the railroad, and until they finally got out of hearing of the firing; that he took no part in the shooting upon that occasion and was not at the Quarter House or near enough thereto to engage in the shooting, and in fact that he left the Quarter House in order to keep out of the trouble.

These statements of appellant were corroborated by several of the women who claimed to have been with him when he left the Quarter House, and by two or three other persons who testified to meeting him on the dirt road and railroad, at a distance from the Quarter House that apparently made it impossible for him to have taken part in the fight. Upon the other hand, two of the Commonwealth's witnesses testified that they were at the Quarter House when the deputy sheriff and his posse arrived, and that they saw appellant in the Quarter House, and so near the time of the fight that it would seem impossible that he could have reached the point on the railroad where he claimed to have been when the shooting began. One of these witnesses further testified that appellant and others were discussing in the saloon of the Quarter House the coming of the arresting party shortly before their arrival, and that appellant then said in substance that if they did not drive the party off, his brother, Lee Turner, who was absent, would "bounce them." In addition, two of the deputy sheriff's posse testified that they saw the appellant at the time the shooting began, and while it was going on, that he was with one of the groups on the hill side, and they saw him shooting at their party with what seemed to be a Winchester rifle, and that the first shot that was fired came from the group of men with which he was associated. Furthermore, not fewer than four witnesses were introduced by the Commonwealth who testified that in conversation with appellant after the fight at the Quarter House, he told them that he had shot Charles Cecil, and to some of the witnesses he even showed the Winchester rifle with which he claimed to have killed Cecil, and a pistol which he said he had used in killing a man by the name of Pridemore. He also exhibited at the same time a piece of wood, containing blood stains, which he said he had taken from a false or wooden leg of Cecil that was left at the Quarter House when his body was removed. It appears that Cecil had lost a part of one leg, by reason of which he was compelled to use a piece of wood attached to what was left of that leg to aid him in walking, and several of those who assisted in removing his body from the Quarter House testified that the wooden leg was left on the ground.

From all this testimony the jury reached the conclusion that appellant was guilty of the crime with which he was charged, either as principal or accessory, and we are unable to find any fault with their verdict.

The grounds presented by appellant for a new trial, and now urged as authorizing a reversal of the judgment of conviction, are: First, that the trial court erred in refusing to allow appellant to file a motion to discharge the jury; second, in overruling his motion to withdraw the jury and continue the case, or pass it from 5 o'clock in the afternoon of one day until 9 o'clock of the following morning, to allow appellant to procure the attendance of certain witnesses, whose names, together with the alleged facts to which it was claimed they would testify, were set forth in an affidavit filed by him at the time of making the motion; third, in admitting certain alleged incompetent evidence, and, fourth, in giving instruction No. 4, at the time, and in the manner, in which it was given.

The first of these grounds is bottomed upon a mistake of the clerk in omitting to draw the jury box the name of one member of the regular panel, which overlooked, by reason of which mistake it appears that the court, believing that the names in the jury box had been exhausted, ordered the sheriff to summon forthwith enough bystanders to complete the jury, which was done accordingly.

It is claimed by counsel for appellant that this mistake of the clerk was discovered by him before the jury selected by the parties to try the case had been sworn, and that he at once offered to enter motion to discharge the jury, and asked the court to summon others in their stead, which motion the court refused to entertain, upon the ground, as recited in the order, that it came too late, and after the jury had been sworn to try the case and after the appellant had waived a formal arraignment, and entered his plea of not guilty. In determining this point, we are compelled to accept as true the statement of fact contained in the order of the court which appears in the bill of exceptions, and from which it conclusively appears that the motion of appellant's counsel was not offered until after the jury was sworn to try the case, and the appellant had waived an arraignment, and entered his plea of not guilty.

In offering the motion the ground therefor was fully stated by the appellant's counsel. It would seem, therefore, that the action of the court in refusing to entertain the motion must be given the same effect as if the motion had been formally entered of record and formally overruled by the court. The objection of appellant to the jury went to the entire panel of twelve, but if there was error in selecting the jury, it is not subject to revision by this court.

In Curtis v. Commonwealth, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 276, it was held that the manner of selecting the jury in that case was unlawful. But as section 281, Criminal Code of Practice, provides that "the decisions of this court upon challenges to the penal and for cause, upon motion to set aside an indictment, and upon motions for a new trial, shall not be subject to exception," this court is without power or jurisdiction to revise such an error, and though in one or two cases previously decided the court appeared to have held otherwise, it has, since the decision in Curtis v. Commonwealth, supra, uniformly adhered to the rule therein expressed.

As to the alleged error of the trial court in refusing to lay the case over from 5 p. m. one day until 9 a. m. the next, to allow the appellant to obtain the testimony of certain witnesses named in his affidavit, we find it disclosed by the record that the evidence was all in, and the instructions written by 5 o'clock p. m., which was the time appellant's motion to lay the case over to the following day for the introduction of further evidence in his behalf was made. In fact, the argument for appellant to the jury seems to have been concluded that evening. Trial courts are allowed wide discretion in the matter of regulating the admission of testimony and granting continuances, which will not be interfered with by a court of revisory power, unless exercised to the prejudice of the substantial rights of the defendant.

We find the affidavit filed by appellant in support of the motion for further time to procure the newly-discovered evidence, does not state that he had seen or talked with the witnesses named therein, or how or from whom he had obtained information that they would make the statements attributed to them in the affidavit. And while the affidavit states that the witnesses then lived in Bell county, it does not show in what part of the county they resided, whether they were accessible to the sheriff or his deputies so as to be reached by the process of the court, or that he had received from them any assurance that they would attend court in time to be introduced as witnesses by 9 o'clock on the following morning. Upon the contrary, it is stated in the affidavit that the attendance of three of the four witnesses named therein could not be procured until the next term of the court, and that only the fourth witness could be gotten to court by 9 o'clock of the following morning. It will be seen, therefore, that the affidavit was not sufficient to authorize the court to lay the case over for further evidence. Besides, the evidence would have been cumulative, as it related to the alibi, and was similar to that of several witnesses who testified for appellant on that point.

There is no complaint of the instructions, but it is insisted that one of them was given after the argument of counsel for appellant had been made to the jury, which prevented him from discussing the instruction or showing its bearing upon the case, though the attorney for the Commonwealth, whose argument followed the giving of the instruction, had full opportunity to discuss it. Though it is true that the instruction in question was given after argument for appellant was closed, it appears from the record that his attorney was given and offered an opportunity by the court to re-argue the case to the jury upon that instruction, but declined to do so. The instruction was proper and highly favorable to appellant and so self-explanatory that it is doubtful whether any argument was needed to enable the jury to understand it. However, the giving of instructions, after the completion of the argument in whole or in part, is to be condemned. While it is the duty of the court to give the whole law in a criminal case, it should be done before the case is argued to the jury. We are, however, of opinion that the appellant was not prejudiced by the giving of the instruction in this case, after the conclusion of the argument made by his counsel.

We have been unable to find any error in the admission or rejection of evidence by the lower court, and finding nothing in the record to convince us that appellant did not have a fair trial, the judgment is affirmed.

GARROTT, &c. v. RIVES, &c.

RIVES, &c. v. GARROTT, &c.

(Filed May 5, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Settlement of estates—Advancements—Under Kentucky Statutes, section 1407, providing "that advancements shall be estimated according to the value of the property when given" the value of land actually received by an intestate's grandchildren, and not their father's debt to the intestate, constituted the amount of the advancement to such grandchildren from their grandfather's

2. Transacted and used by deceased person—Where one of intestate's heirs occupied land belonging to intestate prior to the death of intestate, his statements that he had paid the rent to his father are incompetent as relating to actions with a decedent.

3. Use of land by intestate—Where one of the heirs uses the land of an intestate must account for such use of it as an advancement.

C. H. Bush and Hunter Wood & Son for appellants.

Jas. Breathitt and John T. Edmonds for appellees.

Appeals from Christian Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

The above two appeals from the same judgment will be determined together. Robert W. Garrott died intestate in Christian county in November, 1898, the owner of considerable estate, and the only question to be determined is as to advancements made to his children and grandchildren. He had a daughter, the wife of H. P. Rives, who died before he did, leaving several infant children. Her husband, H. P. Rives, about the year 1882, bought a tract of land of 304 acres, and Robert W. Garrott lent or advanced to him $3,000 or $4,000 to pay for this land or improvements made on it. On September 7, 1896, this debt, with interest, amounted to $7,214.76, and in consideration of it H. P. Rives and his second wife conveyed to his three infant children by his first wife the tract of land referred to at the request of Robert W. Garrott and in settlement of the debt. The land was then incumbered by a mortgage to the Fidelity Trust and Safety Vault Co. for $4,200 and interest. The mortgage was foreclosed, and 187 acres of the land, which included the dwelling house and most of the improvements, were sold to satisfy the mortgage, leaving the three infant children with 167½ acres, the balance of the tract, without improvements. The special commissioner to whom the case was referred charged the infants with an advancement of the 167½ acres of land at $35 an acre. The other heirs at law filed exceptions to the commissioner's report because he did not charge the infants with $7,214.76, the full amount of the debt which Robert W. Garrott had against H. P. Rives. The court, upon the hearing of the exceptions to the commissioner's report, charged the infants with $5,448 93, which includes interest from the death of Robert W. Garrott. From this judgment both parties have appealed.

The amount of the debt which Robert Garrott had against H. P. Rives is entirely immaterial. The thing that the infants received was not the debt, but the land. H. P. Rives seems to have been influenced only by the idea of doing justice to the children of his first wife. He may have had some defense to part of the debt, or it may be that the debt could not have been made out of him. By section 1407, Kentucky Statutes, 1903, advancement shall be estimated according to the value of the property when given. The intention of the testator in making the advancement does not control, the cardinal object of the statute being to secure equity in the distribution of his estate. (Bowles v. Winchester, 13 Bush, 1; Stevenson v. Martin, 11 Bush, 485.) We, therefore, conclude that the court properly refused to charge the infants with anything more than the value of the land they got, and on the appeal of Isaac Garrott, &c. v. Harry A. Rives, &c., the judgment is affirmed.

The special commissioner's report which fixed the value of the 167½ acres at $25 an acre is supported by the weight of the evidence, or this is at least as high as the evidence warrants, considering the fact that the improvements were on the other end of the tract. The infants took the land incumbered by the mortgage. What they got was the value of the land less the mortgage. The mortgage was soon thereafter foreclosed, and so what they really got was the 167½ acres that was left. This at $25 an acre amounts to $4,181.83, and is as much as, under the evidence, should be charged to the infants on account of the advancement to them.

L. O. Garrott, one of the sons, for five years before his father's death occupied a tract of land belonging to his father, of the fair rental value of $500 a year. The infants insist that he should be charged with this rent as an advancement. He admits using the land, but claims that he paid his father the rent. He produced four receipts from his father, given from time to time, aggregating $209.83. The commissioner credited him by this amount, and charged him with the remainder of the rent as an advancement. The court sustained his exceptions to the commissioner's report above mentioned, and entered a judgment on said exceptions pursuant to the report as herein indicated, and refused to charge him with the rent. His statements that he had paid the rent to his father are incompetent, as he can not testify for himself to a transaction with the decedent. We do not find any competent evidence in the record that he paid the rent to his father. It has been often held that where one of the heirs uses land of the intestate, he must account for the use of it as an advancement. (Hamilton v. Moore, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 982, and cases cited.) Under the proof L. O. Garrott must be charged with the use of this land as an advancement as reported by the special commissioner.

Judgment reversed on the appeal of H. A. Rives, &c. v. Isaac Garrott, &c., and cause remanded, with directions to overrule the exceptions to the commissioner's report above mentioned, and enter a judgment on said exceptions pursuant to the report as herein indicated.

LOUISVILLE BANKING CO. v. BUCHANAN.

1. Defense to note—Discharge in bankruptcy—Limitation—Fraud in obtaining money on note—In an action not to obtain relief on the ground of fraud or mistake, but to recover on a note for $6,700, the payors defense being that he has been relieved of all liability thereon by his discharge in bankruptcy, which he pleads, in avoidance of which appellant pleads fraud by appellee in obtaining the money for which the note was given, to which plea of fraud appellee pleads the statute of limitation of ten years. Held—That the action not being bottomed on fraud, the plea of limitation does not apply to the cause of action, but to the defense, and can not be relied on to defeat a recovery on the note.

2. Res judicata—On a former trial of the action, the court held that the note sued on was not placed on the footing of a foreign bill of exchange, and that the five years' statute of limitation did not apply thereto. Held—That this was not such a judgment as would prevent appellee from pleading the statute of limitation upon a separate and distinct matter subsequently raised, affecting the question of fraud in obtaining the money on the note as applying to appellee's release therefrom by his discharge in bankruptcy.

Shackelford Miller and Barnett & Barnett for appellant.

D. W. Sanders for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Common Pleas Branch, First Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle.

This case is before us on a second appeal. After the filing of the record on this appeal, Thomas S. Buchanan, in whose favor the judgment went in the court below, died intestate, and by order of revivor Percival Moore, administrator of his estate, was substituted as appellee.

On February 8, 1888, Buchanan borrowed of the appellant, Louisville Banking Co., $6,700, for which the note in controversy was executed, payable four months after date. On June 1, 1896, this action was instituted upon the note against Buchanan by appellant and judgment prayed for the amount thereof, with interest from June 11, 1888. Among other defenses relied on in the answer was the plea of the five years' statute of limitation, it being averred therein by Buchanan, that the note sued on had been discounted by appellant and thereby placed upon the footing of a foreign bill of exchange, and that as more than five years elapsed between the maturity of the note and the institution of the action thereon, the five years' statute of limitation barred a recovery.

Upon the trial of the case the lower court rendered judgment sustaining the plea of limitation and dismissing the action. An appeal was taken from that judgment, and on November 20, 1899, this court held that the note was not on the footing of a bill of exchange, and, therefore, that the action was not barred by the five years' statute of limitation. Consequently the judgment of the lower court was reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings. (Louisville Banking Co. v. Buchanan, 107 Ky., 125.)

After the return of the case to the lower court, to wit: December 2, 1899, Buchanan, who, during the pendency of the appeal, had filed his petition in bankruptcy and obtained a discharge from his debts, filed a supplemental answer to the appellant's petition, in which he pleaded and relied on his discharge in bankruptcy in bar of any recovery upon this note.

On February 26, 1900, appellant filed a reply to the supplemental answer, in the second paragraph of which it was averred that his discharge in bankruptcy did not release Buchanan from the payment of the note sued on, as he procured from appellant the money for which it was given by fraud, and that by the provisions of the bankrupt law, as well as by the terms of the discharge itself, that instrument does not operate as a release from debts created by the fraud of the bankrupt. A demurrer filed by Buchanan to the second paragraph of the reply was overruled, and he thereupon filed a rejoinder, in the third paragraph of which, limitation was pleaded. It being therein alleged that the fraud complained of in the reply, if any there was, "was committed more than ten years before the filing of said plaintiff's reply * * * and that more than ten years have elapsed since plaintiff discovered said alleged fraud."

A demurrer to this paragraph, and also a motion to strike it out, was filed, but both were overruled, and appellant then filed its surrejoinder, the second paragraph of which controverted the plea of ten years' limitation relied on by Buchanan. The third paragraph set out the former plea of the five-years statute of limitation made by Buchanan, and which this court held did not apply to the note sued on, and relied upon the decision of this court as an adjudication of that question, and a bar to the right of Buchanan to rely upon the ten-year statute pleaded in the rejoinder. The fourth paragraph recited the facts relating to Buchanan's discharge in bankruptcy, and averred that it was not until then that appellant could plead the fraud of Buchanan, which is relied on only in avoidance of his plea of a discharge in bankruptcy.

By agreement of the parties the case was submitted to the judge of the lower court upon the issues of res judicata and limitation raised by the pleadings, and as evidence upon these issues the pleadings in the case of the Louisville Banking Co. v. Buchanan & Crowder, &c., were filed and made a part of the record.

The court, upon the trial, sustained the plea of limitation and dismissed the petition. Appellant entered motion and grounds for a new trial, but the motion was overruled, and he complains of the judgment and seeks its reversal. The only question presented by the record for our consideration is: Did Buchanan's plea of ten years' limitation bar a recovery upon the note? It may be remarked that section 17 of the present bankrupt act expressly excepts from the discharge that may be granted a bankrupt, debts created by fraud. Indeed, it does not seem to be denied by counsel for appellee that if the money for which the note was executed by Buchanan was obtained by fraud, his discharge in bankruptcy did not relieve him from liability upon the note. The sole contention on behalf of his administrator is that there can be no recovery by appellant upon the note, because the fraud was committed more than ten years before the reply complaining thereof was filed.

Section 2515 of the Kentucky Statutes provides: * * * "An action for relief on the ground of fraud or mistake * * * shall be commenced within five years next after the cause of action accrued."

Section 2519, Kentucky Statutes, provides: "In actions for relief for fraud or mistake, or damages for either, the cause of action shall not be deemed to have accrued until the discovery of the fraud or mistake; but no such action shall be brought ten years after the time of making the contract or the perpetration of the fraud."

It is manifest from the language of the statute, supra, that both refer to actions for relief on the ground of fraud or mistake.

In 19 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 163, it is said: "The statutes (of limitation) effect remedies, not defenses. But the word 'defenses,' as here used, is limited to matters purely of defense, and does not embrace matters which may be used as the basis of a counterclaim or a cross petition. The rule is further qualified in many of the States by statutory provisions and judicial decisions to the effect that a claim sought to be used as a set-off can not be so pleaded, unless it appears that it was not barred when the plaintiff's action was begun."

We have examined the authorities cited by counsel for appellant, and find that they support the doctrine announced in the above quotation. Among the authorities referred to is Amaker v. New, 38 S. Car., 28 L. R. A., 687, the facts of which to be as follows: One Inabnet being financially involved and under his debts, in 1866, made a voluntary conveyance by deed of 30 d, all he owned, to his son-in law, Bennett, in trust for the grantor's wife for life, with remainder to his children. The land was levied upon and sold in 1868, under nulla bona proceedings at the suit of Sistrunk, a creditor of Inabnet, at which sale Sistrunk became the purchaser, and thereafter got possession of the land. In the meantime Inabnet died and his widow, by proceedings in and judgment of the probate court was allotted in 1869 as dower 158¼ acres of the 300 acres of land. Sistrunk died in 1864, and the 158¼ acres of land were included in partition proceedings between his heirs and was sold subject to the widow's dower to Amaker in 1835. In the following year the widow, Mrs. Inabnet, died, and her daughter, Frances New, thereupon took possession of the dower land. Amaker sued in ejectment to recover the land of Mrs. New, claiming it under his deed from Sistrunk's heirs. Mrs. New resisted the recovery of the land by Amaker and relied upon the statute of limitation which, in South Carolina, is six years, insisting that Amaker's grantor, Sistrunk, should have sued to set aside the voluntary conveyance within that time after obtaining his title, and the lower court so adjudged. But upon appeal to the Supreme Court of the State that tribunal in an opinion by Judge McIver, said:

"The plea of the statute, as it is called improperly, as I think, for such a plea must be directed to the cause of action (set forth in the complaint), is not directed to the plaintiff's cause of action, but is interposed as a protection against an attack made by the plaintiff upon the defense set up by defendants. The plaintiff having made out a prima facie title, as shown by the refusal of the motion for a non suit, to which no exception was taken, the defendants undertook to show a superior title in themselves under the deed in question, and surely the plaintiff was entitled to show any defect in that deed which would render it insufficient to vest title in the defendants, either by showing that it was not under seal, or not executed in the presence of two subscribing witnesses, or that the grantor was non compos, or that it was not recorded. If so, why may it not also be shown that it was void for fraud?

"I do not understand that it was ever the rule that a deed or other instrument could not be attacked for fraud after the lapse of the prescribed time, in any way, but only that it could not be attacked by an action instituted for that purpose. I can very well understand how the law, from considerations of public policy, may forbid one from invoking its aid by bringing an action to set aside a deed for fraud after the time limited for the purpose, but I am unable to understand upon what principal, either of law, equity or good morals, one who had made out a prima facie case for the relief he demands, can be forbidden from showing that the defense set up against his claim is founded in fraud, simply because such fraud has been committed so long ago as to bar an action brought to obtain relief from such fraud; but I do not think any case can be found which could sustain such a doctrine."

In Jackson v. Plyler, 38 S. Car., 496, the same doctrine was upheld, and the case of Amaker v. New, supra, cited and approved, and again adhered to in Gaborth v. Gaborth, 47 S. Car., 126. In all these cases the facts were, in many respects, similar to those of the case at bar.

We also find the courts of last resort of Arkansas, Indiana and California to be in full accord with the Supreme Court of South Carolina upon the question under consideration. (Rhea v. Bagley, 66 Ark., 98; Robinson, &c. v. Glass, 94 Ind., 211; Hart v. Church, 126 Cal., 471.)

In Hart v. Church, supra, it appears that a note and mortgage were executed by Mrs. Hart through the compulsion of her husband, and that she subsequently brought suit to cancel them. By cross action Church set up the mortgage and asked that it be enforced. To which Mrs. Hart answered, pleading the fraud by which the note and mortgage were procured to be executed by her. Church replied, relying on limitation. Upon the issues thus presented the Supreme Court of California said: "It is insisted that the complaint itself shows a lack of equity, in that plaintiff's delay in commencing her action for cancellation is not sufficiently explained, and it is argued that the same omissions which render her complaint defective make her defense to the cross complaint upon the ground of fraud itself, insufficient. It is true, as appellant contends, that where a party seeks a rescission of a contract he must act with promptness, and that the question as to whether or not a prompt effort to rescind must depend in each case upon its own peculiar facts. It is also true that where a party seeks relief upon the ground of fraud or mistake the action must be commenced within three years after the discovery of the facts constituting the fraud or mistake, but a different case is presented where the party who has procured the fraudulent contract, or who seeks to take advantage of it, asks to have it declared valid or to enforce its executory terms, and is thus himself asking affirmative relief. The three years' statute does not bar the defendant in such a case from objecting to the validity or to the enforcement of the contract upon the ground of fraud. It is not incumbent upon one who has thus been defrauded to go into court and ask relief, but he may abide his time, and where enforcement is sought against him, excuse himself from performance by proof of the fraud. Of course, in such a case he incurs the risk of defeat by the intervention of the rights of innocent parties."

While this court has never decided the question of limitation here presented upon the precise state of case now before it, it has in effect held that it did not apply in a practically similar case. In Avritt v. Russell, 29 Ky. Law Rep., 752, it appears that on January 4, 1888, Avritt executed to Russell his note for $733.46, in renewal of an elder note and due bill which had theretofore been given by the former to the latter upon partial settlements of fees growing out of a former partnership between them in the practice of the law.

Subsequently a payment of $200 was made by Avritt upon the note of $733.46; some time after which he learned through his brother, Samuel Avritt, who had acted as his agent, that Russell had collected a partnership fee of $1,356.70, in the case of one Holt, Avritt's part of which had been retained by Russell, in payment of the $733.46 note.

"At the September term, 1895, appellant, Avritt, brought suit against Russell for the surrender of the $733.46 note, alleging concealment by Russell of the fact of the collection of the Holt fee, and that the note was executed by Avritt in ignorance of the fact that he was indebted to Russell, seeking also a recovery of the amount paid on the note, which was averred to have been paid by his mistake and the fraud of Russell in withholding the true state of the firm's account from him. A suit was also brought by Sylvester A. Russell, son of Judge Russell, against appellant upon the $733.46 note, it being alleged that it was assigned by W. E. Russell to his wife, Sue E. Russell, and by her to S. A. Russell. To this suit a plea of no consideration was interposed, it being averred that when the partnership was dissolved it was agreed that appellant's share in all fees thereafter collected from the unfinished business of the firm, should be applied to the discharge of the notes, and the surplus accounted for, to appellant. A plea of the statute of limitation was interposed by appellees, the Russells, upon the theory that relief was sought by appellant against fraud or mistake as to the date of the collection of the Holt fee."

The plea of limitation made by Russell was to the defense interposed by Avritt that it was procured by fraud. The two suits between the parties, the one brought by Avritt and the other by S. A. Russell, were consolidated and tried together. The issue was whether Avritt owed the note. His defense was that the note had been procured by fraud, to which limitation was pleaded by Russell. As to the plea of the statute of limitation this court said: "The statute of limitation in our judgment has no application whatever in this case. It is not sought here to set aside or annul any transaction as of the date of the collection of the Holt fee. Had the new note not been executed the plea would have been a plea of payment. As a new note was executed the plea relied upon was the plea of no consideration, to which the statute of limitation is equally inapplicable." * * *

In the case at bar the statute of limitation can not, in our opinion, be relied on to defeat a recovery upon the note. In fact it is not pleaded against the note, but by Buchanan for relief against his own fraud. The action is not one to obtain relief on the ground of fraud or mistake, but to recover $6,700 evidenced by a note. The payors' defense is that judgment can not go against him because he has been relieved of all liability upon the note by reason of his discharge in bankruptcy, which instrument is formally pleaded and filed. In avoidance of the discharge in bankruptcy, appellant pleads the alleged fraud committed by Buchanan in obtaining the money for which the note was executed, and that by reason of such fraud the discharge in bankruptcy does not operate as a release to Buchanan, and for the purpose of making his discharge effective as to the note, the latter pleads that the fraud of which complaint is made was committed more than ten years before the presenting of the complaint, and, therefore, can not, by reason of the statute of limitation, be relied on to exclude the note sued on from the operation of the discharge in bankruptcy.

The action not being bottomed on fraud or mistake, the fraud of Buchanan did not affect the validity of the note sued on, but only the question of whether he was relieved of liability thereon by the discharge in bankruptcy. It was not necessary to allege or prove the fraud in order to recover on the note. That question was injected into the case to avoid the discharge in bankruptcy, but for which it would not have been mentioned. It seems to us, therefore, that the plea of limitation in this case goes not to the cause of action, but is directed to the defense.

We have examined the authorities cited in support of the contention of appellee, but do not find that they militate against the conclusions herein on as against any new or additional cause of action that may be set up by way of amendment in a pending action, and time computed up to the introduction of the new matter. But no new cause of action was brought into this case, as already explained. The fraud of Buchanan does not constitute a new cause of action, but is only pleaded as against and in avoidance of the discharge in bankruptcy, hence the rule announced in the cases cited by counsel for appellee is inapplicable.

It is, however, insisted for appellee that the case of Treadway v. Pharis, 90 Ky., 664, fully sustains the plea of limitation made in this case. We do not think so. It will be found in that case that the action was instituted by the appellant's children and heirs at law of Pharis by his first wife against his children and heirs at law by his second wife, the latter also being made a defendant, for a division of his lands fairly, but in such manner as to exclude a tract of fifty-eight acres conveyed to the decedent in 1848, by one Tarleton Embrey, which they prayed be adjudged to belong to them to the exclusion of the decedent's second wife and children born to him by her. The ground, as averred in the petition upon which appellants' based their exclusive right to the tract of fifty-eight acres was, that "the consideration was paid to Embrey out of the estate of their mother, and that though there was an agreement between her and their father the deed therefor was to be made to her, he fraudulently and without her knowledge or consent procured same to be conveyed to himself."

The plea of the statute of limitation set up by way of defense to the claim of appellants to the sole ownership of the fifty-eight acres was sustained by the lower court and affirmed by this court in an opinion by Judge Lewis for the reason that "as the ground of relief is the alleged fraud of their father in causing the deed to be made to himself instead of their mother, they had a cause of action, if ever, upon her death, and not having sued within either five or ten years thereafter, they can not now maintain an action to set aside the deed which has to be done before they can recover the land. While they could not recover the land during the lifetime of their father, there was nothing to prevent institution of an action to set aside the deed, and thereby change the character of his claim and possession from that of absolute ownership to a tenancy by curtesy."

It will be seen that the case supra, in so far as it was sought to exclude the last wife and her children from any interest in the fifty-eight acres of land, was an action for relief upon the ground of fraud, it being distinctly averred in the petition that the fraud of the father caused the title to the land in which the money of his first wife, plaintiff's mother, had been invested, to be conveyed to himself without the knowledge or consent of the wife, and in violation of the agreement that it should be conveyed to her. Therefore, the plea of the statute of limitation interposed by the answer went to and effected the cause of action and the remedy.

We do not think a plea of res judicata interposed by the appellant can be sustained. It is based upon the theory that because this court held that the five years' statute of limitation relied on as a bar to a recovery upon the note did not apply, that, therefore, an action could not on any ground whatsoever again plead limitation in this case. The question of limitation raised and decided on the former appeal was as to the five-year statute relied on to bar the note, which it was alleged had been placed on the footing of a bill of exchange. The question of limitation now raised is a separate and distinct matter, which arose after the filing of Buchanan's supplemental answer, and because of appellant's plea that he had procured the money on the note sued on by fraud, and thereby prevented his discharge in bankruptcy from releasing him from liability on the note. While for the reasons hereinbefore indicated the statute of limitation can not be relied on as a defense to the note, or in avoidance of the alleged fraud whereby the money was obtained thereon by Buchanan, the question is, in our opinion, unaffected by the decision of this court on the former appeal.

The judgment is reversed and cause remanded for further proceedings consistent with the opinion herein.

CITY OF LOUISVILLE v. CORLEY, &c.

(Filed April 20, 1901—Not to be reported.)

1. Suspension by city of police force—The act of the board of safety in attempting to suspend or lay off the detective and police force of a city for four days in each month, was an illegal and void act.

2. Same—Where there is nothing in the pay rolls showing that the officers of a city accepted suspension for a certain time, the signing of the pay rolls should not be deemed as consenting to the suspension, and they are not estopped by reason of having signed the pay rolls for the months in which they suffered the diminution of their pay.

H. L. Stone for appellant.

Barker & Woods for appellees.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery Branch, Second Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

This is the second appeal in this case. The opinion on the former appeal is reported in 23 Ky. Law Rep., 1782. That opinion settled all the legal questions involved. The act of the board of safety, in attempting to suspend or lay off the detective and police force of the city for four days in each month, was an illegal and void act. Under the charter of cities of the first class, this power is alone given to the general council. On the return of the case the city made two defenses: first, the suspension of the appellees was a necessity forced on the board of safety under sections 2820 and 2821, Kentucky Statutes, because of an insufficient appropriation of the general council; second, the appellees are estopped from recovering anything by reason of their having signed the pay rolls for the months in which they suffered the diminution of their pay.

As to the first proposition, even admitting that there was a necessity in suspending the policemen for a few days in each month or discharging a portion of them to keep within the appropriation for the payment of their salaries, the board of safety was without power to remedy this matter. This power existed alone in the council. Sections 2820 and 2821 have no application to the question involved in this action. These provisions of the stat-being to prevent extravagance on the part of public officers. The appellees derived their pay by reason of law and not by contract.

The case of Hopkins County v. The St. Bernard Coal Co., 24 Ky. Law Rep., 944, settles this question. In that case the county had become involved in something over $10,000 for the payment of guards authorized and appointed under section 1241a, Kentucky Statutes. The county defended and one of its defenses was, this liability was imposed on the county in violation of section 157 of the Constitution. We quote that part of the section applicable: "No county, city, town, taxing district or other municipality shall be authorized or permitted to become indebted in any manner or for any purpose to an amount exceeding in any year the income and revenue provided for such year without the assent of two thirds of the voters thereof voting at an election to be held for that purpose and any indebtedness contracted in violation of this section shall be void. Nor shall such contract be enforceable by the person with whom made; nor shall such municipality ever be authorized to assume the same." The court in that case in commenting upon this section of the Constitution, said: "The prohibition is against becoming indebted or voluntarily incurring a legal liability. The words 'no county * * * shall be authorized or permitted to become indebted,' can not reasonably refer to the necessary expenses of the governmental functions of the county which are compulsory obligations cast on it by law, but only to that class of debts which it is optional with the county to incur. Any other construction, as has been well said, would destroy the fundamental safeguards and bulwarks of organized society. * * * The duty of preserving public peace and protecting life and property can not be avoided because the income provided for the year by the fiscal court will be insufficient to pay the guards provided by the statutes. It is the duty of the fiscal court to provide a sufficient fund for this purpose when the necessity arises, if it has not been provided before. It was not the purpose of the Constitution to disable the municipalities of the State from maintaining the public peace or protecting the good name of the State."

As to the second proposition, appellant pleaded in its answer that appellees are estopped from recovering in this action for the reason that they signed the pay rolls for the months during the time this order was enforced and by reason of signing same accepted the reduction or suspension. There is nothing in the pay rolls showing that they accepted the suspension. They were made out in the usual form except four days were left blank. It was not proven that they in terms accepted or consented to this suspension.

The only two persons who spoke on this subject were Tilford, chairman of the board of safety, and Major Gunther, who stated in substance that the proposition of this suspension was reported to them by the captains of police as having been submitted to and accepted by the appellees. This was only hearsay. Not a witness testified that the appellees or any one of them ever accounted or consented to this suspension. By the order of the board of safety to the chief of police the appellees were made to understand that it was one alternative or the other; compliance with this order or discharge the force. Under such circumstances the signing of the pay rolls did not be deemed as consenting and acquiescing in the suspension, on part of appellees, and they are not estopped.

Therefore, the judgment of the lower court is affirmed, with damages.

1. Lands—Patents—Pleading—In an action by appellants against appellees, under section 11 of the Kentucky Statutes, the petition was defective in that it failed to allege that appellants were in possession of the land in controversy, and the demurrer should have been sustained to the paragraph which set out ownership of the land, but which failed to aver possession.

2. Same—It was error to sustain a demurrer to a petition which alleged that defendants were cutting and removing timber, confusing boundary lines and destroying marked corners, because, for this trespass an action could be maintained under section 2361, Kentucky Statutes, without having the actual possession of the land.

James Goble, W. S. Harkins and R. T. Burns for appellants.

J. M. York and J. F. Butler for appellees.

Appeal from Pike Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

The appellants, descendants and heirs at law of John B. Goff, deceased, brought this action against appellees, alleging in substance that their ancestor, John B. Goff, obtained a patent from the Commonwealth of Kentucky, dated August 16, 1861, granting to him a certain tract or parcel of land containing 1,000 acres by survey, bearing date June 20, 1860, the patent giving the metes and bounds, courses and distances, closing with these words: "Including in said bounds 2,700 acres of former patented land, which is excluded in the calculation of the preceding plat." Appellants in their petition, then gave the metes and bounds of twenty-three parcels of land which they say were excluded by the patent, and then alleged that the appellees, since the date of the John B. Goff patent, and within its bounds without right, surveyed and patented six parcels of land, five of 200 acres each, and the other of 150 acres. They then averred, "that having procured these patents as on vacant and unappropriated land and have thus cast a cloud upon the title to the land of these plaintiffs, and are now giving it out in speech that they are the owners of this land, and thus impairing the value thereof and otherwise harassing and annoying plaintiffs in the use and occupation of the same. Plaintiffs further say that the defendants, O. B. M. Lowe, Orrison R. Lowe, Jr., O. R. Lowe, Sr., Lawyer Lowe, Henderson Scott and Thomas Runyon are threatening to enter upon the lands owned by these plaintiffs inside of the grant of their ancestor and outside of the exclusions in the patent and to cut, remove and to carry away the timber growing upon this land; that the same is its chief value and is of the substance of the inheritance, and by doing so great and irreparable injury will be done them, which could not be compensated for in damages; that in removing the timber from plaintiffs' land they will commit numerous and repeated trespasses, and will involve the plaintiffs in numerous and vexatious suits of law, and by cutting and removing the timber and entering and surveying this land they are confusing the boundary lines of plaintiffs' land and are destroying the marked corners, line trees and other monuments of title."

The appellees filed their answer in two paragraphs. In the first they purchase and described in the following described lands, patented November 18, 1881, and giving the boundary of each of the six patents; five for two hundred each, and the other for one hundred and 50 acres, being the same six boundaries of land named and described in the petition. They then denied that they had entered upon any of the land bounded and described in the appellants' petition, and then in the usual terms stated that they and those under whom they claimed, have had the peaceable, uninterrupted and adverse possession of the last named six surveys of land for more than fifteen years prior to the bringing of this action, and pleaded the fifteen years' statute in bar of appellants' right of recovery.

The second paragraph of the answer is as follows: "The Commonwealth of Kentucky for the use and benefit of the defendants, O. B. M. Lowe, says for further answer and counterclaim herein, that the ancestor of plaintiffs, John B. Goff, on the 20th day of June, 1860, only entered and paid for warrants authorizing the entering of 1,000 acres of vacant and unappropriated land and the patent issued to the said John B. Goff only called for and conveys to him 1,000 acres of land, but through fraud or mistake (an allegation, one of which is true, but defendant does not know which) when the survey was caused to be made and when the patent from the Commonwealth of Kentucky to John B. Goff was caused to be issued, it contained by metes and bounds 2,700 acres outside of and beyond the exclusions called for in the patent, and that plaintiffs' ancestor only paid for a sufficient amount of treasury warrants, claims, to appropriate 1,000 acres of land and beyond the said 1,000 acres the patent is void in so far as it conflicts with defendants' land as described in the first paragraph of his answer and counterclaim. Defendants say that if plaintiffs should be required to begin at the beginning corner of their survey that they could and would have their full 1,000 acres outside of the exclusions called for in the patent before they reach or come in conflict with the land described in the first paragraph of their answer."

Appellants then filed a demurrer to each of the paragraphs of appellees' answer, and the court made the following order with reference thereto: "The plaintiffs produced and filed demurrer to answer of defendants; O. B. M. Lowe, the defendant, then insisted on demurrer relating back to the petition, and the court being sufficiently advised, adjudges that the demurrer be and is sustained to the petition of the plaintiffs, and the patent sued on and made a part of the petition is void upon its face for indefiniteness, and the court adjudges that the petition be dismissed."

The court was correct in sustaining the demurrer to the first paragraph of appellants' petition. This paragraph was instituted by authority of section 11 of the Kentucky Statutes, which in part reads as follows: "It shall and may be lawful for any person having both the legal title and possession of lands to institute and prosecute suit, by petition in equity in the circuit court of the county where the lands or some part of them may lie, against any other person setting up claims thereto." * * *

It was not only necessary for appellants to allege that they were the owners of the land, but also that they were in the possession of the land. Appellants failed to allege that they were in session thereof. The court given them leave to amend if they desired.

The court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the second paragraph of the petition. By it appellants alleged that appellees were cutting and removing the timber and were confusing the boundary lines of their land and destroying the marked corners, line trees and other monuments of title. For this trespass, they, as the owners of the land, could maintain the action without having the actual possession of the land at the time it was committed. Section 2861 of the Kentucky Statutes reads as follows: "The owner of land may maintain appropriate action to recover damages for any trespass for injury committed thereon, or to prevent or restrain any trespasses or other injury thereto or thereon, notwithstanding such owner may not have the actual possession of the land at the time of the commission of the trespass."

The court erred in adjudging the patent void upon its face for indefiniteness. The patent gave the metes and bounds, courses and distances. The exterior of the patent boundary was definite and made certain. The prior patents excluded, amounting to 2,700 acres, were not described or defined in any way, and we suppose for this reason the lower court declared the patent void upon its face, but this court, in the case of Hall v. Martin, 89 Ky., 11, declared a patent valid which was similar in all respects to the one at bar. In that case the court said: "If in every patent that contains exclusions it is necessary to describe the grant excluded, or to so identify it, either as to the number of acres, the boundary, or by giving the name of the grantee or the patentee of the elder grant, then the patent to McNew is void, as it is silent as to the boundary, the number of acres or the owners of the excluded land. We perceive no reason why such a grant should be held void, or the party under such a patent denied the right of showing title in himself to all but the exclusions contained in the grant. The burden is on the plaintiff in such a case to show that he is outside of the excluded territory and encroaching on the elder grant that he concedes, by the patent under which he claims, to be superior to his." (Frazier v. Frazier, 81 Ky., 187.)

The only other question to be determined is the sufficiency of the second paragraph of appellees' answer. As we understand it, there is not any fact alleged in it that would render the patent void as declared by any statute or any circumstances that the statute declares to be fraudulent.

In the case of Frazier v. Frazier, supra, a patent was issued for 900 acres, when within the bounds there were 800 acres. In that case the court said: "It is not necessary to decide what the law is in a direct proceeding in the name of or by the Commonwealth to repeal or vacate the Field's patent for the excess of 100 acres; it is enough for us to say in this case, as between the parties, the patent is conclusive, it not being void upon its face or shown to be fraudulent or void because in contravention of any statutory law specifying the state of case which would render it void or fraudulent. The metes and bounds, courses and distances from which the true quantity of the boundary can be ascertained, and by which it is to be governed in construing the extent of the conveyance by the patent from the Commonwealth, are the highest and best evidence of the number of acres the Commonwealth intended to convey, and they must control a general statement in the patent that the boundary contained 200 acres. The State, therefore, having parted with the title to the 800 acres as vacant land, can not again issue a patent for any part thereof."

For these reasons the judgment of the lower court is reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings consistent herewith.

TOWN OF CENTRAL COVINGTON v. BUSSE & DRESSMAN.

DRESSMAN v. BUSSE.

(Filed April 21, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Towns and cities—Street improvement—Where, pursuant to an ordinance requiring the south half of Willow street to be improved at the exclusive cost of the property owners, an owner of lots refusing to pay the warrant, in an action by the contractor against both the owner of the lots and the city, it appearing that only one-half of the street was within the corporate limits of the city, it had no authority to require the improvement of a part not in the city, or to levy a special tax upon the abutting lot owners.

O. P. Schmidt and T. B. Wise for appellants.

S. D. Rouse for appellee Henry Busse.

Appeal from Kenton Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

The board of trustees of the town of Central Covington on the 17th day of August, 1901, passed an ordinance requiring the south half of Willow street to be graded, macadamized and curbed as specified in the ordinance, at the exclusive cost of the property abutting the south side as required by section 8706 of the Kentucky Statutes. This work was performed by the appellant, Ben Dressman, under contract with the city, in accordance with the plans and specifications, the work accepted and warrants issued apportioning the cost of the improvement among the abutting property holders, as required by the charter. The appellee, Henry Busse, owned two lots fronting the south side of the street, one forty and the other seventy feet, which were charged with $258 as their part of the cost of the improvement. Having refused to pay, Dressman instituted this suit against both Busse and the town of Central Covington, asking judgment therefor primarily against Busse, but in the event it should be adjudged that he was not entitled to a judgment against him, then against the town of Central Covington for the amount due him. Busse resisted a judgment, first, on the ground that the assessment was exorbitant and the result of fraud and collusion between the authorities of the town and the plaintiff; and, second, because, as he alleges, the northern boundary of the town of Central Covington runs with the center of Willow street from east to west in the square improved; and that the city had, under section 8706 of the Kentucky Statutes, no power to assess more than one-half of the cost of improving the street upon an abutting property holder. The city also answered, denying any liability and claiming that the property of the defendant, Busse, was liable for the cost of the improvement.

The trial judge found the charge of fraud was not sustained by the proof, but that only the south half of Willow street was located in the town of the town and within the limits of the city of Covington; that the board of trustees could only assess one-half the cost of the improvement of the street upon the abutting property holders on the south side thereof; that as the assessment of the cost against them was for the entire cost thereof, and the statute did not authorize an apportionment thereof by the court; that plaintiff's petition as against Busse should be dismissed, but he gave a judgment against the town of Central Covington for the amount claimed. From this judgment both the town and Dressman have appealed.

The record discloses that the boundary line between the city of Covington and the town of Central Covington is the center line of Willow street; and that consequently only the south half of willow street is within the corporate limits of the town. On this account the board of trustees of Central Covington had no authority to require the improvement of the north half of Willow street, or to levy a special tax upon the abutting property holders on that side for the purpose; but as only the south side of this street was required to be improved by the ordinance and only the cost of improving this half was actually assessed against the abutting property, we are unable to perceive any legal ground for releasing the abutting property holders from the payment of the cost thereof. When the other part of the street is improved it will have to be paid for by the abutting property holders on the north side. Section 3706 of the Kentucky Statutes, which is a section in the charters of towns of the sixth class, authorizes the board of trustees to improve the street, as required by the ordinance in this case at the exclusive cost of the owners of lots abutting upon the proposed improvement, to be equally apportioned among them.

For reasons indicated so much of the judgment as denied to the appellant, Dressman, a lien upon the abutting lots of Henry Busse is reversed and cause remanded, with instructions to enter a judgment subjecting the lots owned by him to the payment of the sums assessed against them, and the judgment against the town of Central Covington is also reversed and cause remanded, with instructions to set this judgment aside, and for other proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

LOUISVILLE & NASHVILLE R. R. CO. v. BOARD.

(Filed April 21, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Passenger on freight train attending on stock—Thrown from car by trainman—Somnambulism—The injury to plaintiff having been received between Colesburg and the tunnel, and as there is no testimony that the train stopped between these points, there can be no escape from the conclusion that the plaintiff was thrown from the car in which he was riding, by some of the trainmen, or that while in a state of somnambulism or noctambulism he himself untied the car door and fell out of the car.

2. Instructions—There is no proof upon which to hypothecate an instruction given to the jury authorizing a recovery in the event they believed the plaintiff was injured by being thrown from the train by other person than defendants' agents or servants in charge of the train, or that they negligently permitted any other person to do so, and this instruction was prejudicial to appellant. The instruction should have been, that unless they believed from the evidence that the defendant's employes, or some of them in charge of the freight train, threw the plaintiff off that they should find for the defendant.

J. A. Mitchell and Ben D. Warfield for appellant.

B. F. Proctor and R. L. Greens for appellee.

Appeal from Warren Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

The Louisville & Nashville R. R. Co. appeals from a judgment in favor of the appellee, Lem Board, for personal injuries alleged to have been received by him at the hands of their servants, whilst a passenger on one of their freight trains on the 29th of September, 1901. He alleges in his petition, that whilst such passenger "the defendant, its agents and servants in charge of said train did, with gross negligence, throw him from its car whilst the train was in motion, or did permit other person, to him unknown, to do so;" that one of these statements of fact is true, but that he did not know which. The defendant, in their answer, admit that the plaintiff was riding in one of their freight cars as an attendant in charge of live stock belonging to E. R. Bagby, which were being shipped from Louisville to Bowling Green about the time charged, but deny that he was, with gross negligence, or at all, throw from such car, while the train was in motion, or at all, by its agent or servants; or that they permitted him to be so thrown.

In a second paragraph they plead contributory negligence. The plaintiff testified that on the 29th of September, 1901, he left the city of Louisville on one of appellant's freight trains as an attendant in charge of seven head of cattle and a horse belonging to E. R. Bagby, of Bowling Green, after 1 o'clock at night; that he was awake until he arrived at Colesburg, the last station before the big tunnel; that after leaving this station he and another man named Taylor took off their coats and shoes, made down their pallet, pulled the door to and tied it with a rope on the inside; that he laid down and went to sleep, leaving a lantern burning in the car; that shortly after the train had gotten through the tunnel and into the cut on the south side, he was awakened by two men dragging him from the car by his legs; that he did not see either of them after he fell off, and could not tell whether they were white or black or whether they were railroad men or not; that he walked to the tunnel hill station, and informed the telegraph operator what had occurred, who telegraphed to the operator at Elizabethtown, and requested him to get his coat, hat and boots off the train, and send them to him, which he did, and that he went on to Bowling Green in a passenger train the next day. The statements of the witness as to tying the car door and going to sleep are corroborated by the witness, Taylor. The railroad company introduced as witnesses the conductor and three brakemen in charge of this freight train, each of whom testified to the presence of the plaintiff on the train, and that they did not know that he had gotten off until the receipt by the conductor of the telegram from the operator at the tunnel hill station. They all emphatically deny having thrown him off or that there was any other persons on the train than the regular crew thereof, who could have done so.

One of them testifies that it was impossible for the plaintiff to have been on the train. As there is no testimony that the train stopped between Colesburg and the point where the accident occurred, we think there can be no escape from the conclusion that the plaintiff was thrown from the car by some of the agents or servants of the railroad company in charge thereof, or that while in a condition of somnambulism or noctambulism he himself untied the car door and walked or fell out of the car.

There is no proof on which to hypothecate the second instruction given to the jury authorizing a recovery, in the event that they believed that the plaintiff was injured by being thrown from the train by other person than defendant's agents or servants in charge thereof, or that they negligently permitted any other person to do so. We think this instruction was erroneous and prejudicial to the substantial rights of the defendant and the jury should have been instructed on this point that unless they believed from the evidence that the defendant's employes or some of them in charge of the freight train threw the plaintiff off that they should find for the defendant.

For these reasons indicated the judgment is reversed and cause remanded for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

CHAPMAN, &c. v. HALEY.

(Filed April 21, 1904.)

1. Illegal contract—Money furnished to buy counterfeit money—Appellee gave George Chapman $300 in money upon a promise by C. to sell him $3,000 in "good" money which he was to bring to him in a few minutes, but did not deliver, the appellee evidently understanding he was purchasing counterfeit money. Held—The contract was void and appellee can not recover the money paid by him in pursuance of this criminal conspiracy.

2. Appeals—Jurisdiction of Court of Appeals—Upon a trial in the lower court to set aside a deed made to the wife of C. on the ground that the land was paid for by the money of appellee which was fraudulently obtained by C., the lower court adjudged the deed void and gave a personal judgment against C. for $175. Held—That the judgment setting aside the deed be reversed and the court would reverse the personal judgment against C., but under the authority of the case of Rhodes v. Frankfort Chair Co., decided March 19, 1904, the appeal being for $175, must be dismissed for want of jurisdiction.

W. R. Ramsey and E. H. Johnson for appellants.

T. J. Coyle for appellee.

Appeal from Laurel Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

This action was instituted by the appellee to recover of appellant, George Chapman, the sum of $300, alleged to have been given him by appellee to be invested in some manner, not stated in the petition, and which he had fraudulently converted to his own use, and failed and refused to pay over or return to appellee. As an ancillary remedy, an attachment was sued out and levied upon a small tract of land situated in Laurel county, Kentucky, the title of which was in Gertie Chapman, the wife of George Chapman.

The wife was made a defendant, and the allegation made against her that the land was purchased with the money of which appellee had been defrauded, and the prayer was made that the conveyance to the wife should be cancelled the land sold, and the proceeds applied to the repayment of appellee's debt.

Separate answers were filed by the husband and wife, placing in issue all of the material allegations of the petition. A judgment was rendered by the chancellor awarding a personal judgment against George Chapman for $175, sustaining the attachment levied upon the land, cancelling the conveyance to the wife, and subjecting it to the payment of appellees' debt. From this judgment both husband and wife have appealed.

Appellee's evidence revealed the following state of facts upon which he predicated his right to the judgment he obtained. About five years before the institution of this action, appellant, who lived in Laurel county, came to the home of appellee, in Madison county, and there proposed to him that if he would meet him in Cincinnati, O., he would sell to him $3,000 of "good" money for the sum of $300. This proposition was accepted by appellee, who, not having the $300, took two of his neighbors into his golden venture, each of whom contributed $89.50. In pursuance of this arrangement, appellee met appellant in Cincinnati, in a small room, at night, and there turned over to him the sum of $300, relying upon the word of the latter to return in fifteen or twenty minutes with the promised $3,000 of "good" money in exchange for his $300. To his great surprise, appellant failed to return, and appellee neither saw nor heard of him again, until just prior to the institution of this action; that appellee fully understood that, under the contract, he was to purchase counterfeit money from appellant can not be doubted. The following excerpts from his evidence, as shown by the bill of exceptions, will fully illustrate what he knew of the moral quality of the transaction: "He (Chapman) told me he would give me $3,000 for $300, and showed me the kind of money. He told me there was a firm in Cincinnati that had this money, and he was one of the members. He was to get me $3,000 for $300. I gave him the $300. He showed me new bills, one $2 and a $20, and I think a $5 and a $10, and he had plenty of it, apparently. The money I was to get was to be just like those he showed me. Silver certificates and not counterfeit. I gave him the $300 in Cincinnati, I gave it to him in the night. No one was present at the time I gave it (the money) to him. We were in a little room where there was a light, and I counted the money out to Mr. Jones, as I thought then."

"Q. Was there any agreed time as to when he was to return with your $3,000?"

"A. He told me to sit down here on the walls of the waterworks, and he would step right across the street here, and would get it and be back in twenty minutes, and he never returned."

In answer to a question regarding the character of the money, appellee stated that "he (Chapman) told me it was good money, and said there was only one trouble about this money, and that was, when deposited in bank, two numbers running of the same date might be detected in that way. He said that was the only trouble."

"Q. What did you understand there was wrong with that money that bankers might detect?"

"A. Just only what he said about the numbers. I did not doubt the money at all."

"Q. Did you really believe that you were going to get $3,000 good and lawful money for $300?"

"A. Yes, sir."

It is unnecessary to say that this conspiracy between these two men to purchase counterfeit money constituted an illegal contract, and was void.

The possession of counterfeit money for the purpose of circulation constitutes a crime both under the Federal and State Statutes. The question, as to whether or not appellee, who was equally guilty with appellant, can recover the money paid by him in pursuance of this criminal conspiracy is the first question for adjudication.

In the case of Kimbrough v. Lane, 11 Bush, 556, the contract was for the payment of $3,000 to secure the dismissal of an indictment against Lane for a felony. In affirming a judgment dismissing the petition in the action wherein it was sought to recover the $3,000, this court said: "It is sufficient to say on this point that the rule of law inhibiting such contracts was not made for the benefit of the obligors. The courts will not enforce such contracts, because they are leveled at the safety and repose of society, and are calculated to shield the guilty from punishment and leave them free to prey upon the public. If money is paid upon such a contract, the courts will not aid in recovering it back; they will leave both parties in the exact position in which they have placed themselves."

In the case of Gray v. Roberts, 2 A. K. Marsh, 209, it is said: "If both parties are equally guilty of a breach of the law, a court of justice cannot interpose to aid in behalf of either; for it is a settled rule that in pari delicto potior est conditio defendantis." * * *

In the case of Davezac v. Sellar, 12 Ky. Law Rep., 599, the Superior Court, through Judge Barbour, said: "But aside from the question of mistake, we are of the opinion that where property is sold at a judicial sale, and agreement by the purchaser to give one an interest in it, or some benefit if he will not object to the confirmation of the sale, is void as against public policy. The effect of it is to prevent fair competition and to sacrifice the property of the debtor. As the money sought to be recovered in this case was voluntarily paid, under such an agreement, it can not be recovered back."

In the case of Smith v. Richmond, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 1117, it appeared that the plaintiff was running a lottery office in Cincinnati, O., and that to unlawfully obtain immunity at the hands of the officers of the law, he paid Richmond, from time to time during a period of seven years, various sums aggregating $16,075. These sums were pocketed by Richmond, and not paid over to the police authorities, as agreed. In affirming a judgment dismissing the petition seeking a recovery of the money so paid, this court said: "To allow the appellant to recover in this case would be in effect saying to all parties that you can go on with reasonable safety, furnish money to a person for illegal and criminal purposes, and after you have derived the benefit therefrom, sue the so-called agent and recover back the money, unless he, perchance, was able to prove to the satisfaction of the court that he, in like manner, had paid over the money for the said unlawful purpose. As before stated, we do not think that Richmond was the agent of plaintiff in the legal sense of agency, but was simply one of the partners in crime; and we know of no court that has ever sustained a suit of one partner for an accounting of the money invested in an unlawful purpose, especially if such purpose was to violate the criminal laws of a State and shield offenders from punishment or corrupt public officers."

In the case of Central Trust and Safe Deposit Co. v. Respass, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 1901, Respass and Sharp were partners in "book making," which was an arrangement by which the partners carried on a betting business on horse races, and they also owned, in partnership, a racing stable. Sharp died suddenly, having in his possession at the time $4,734 of the firm's money, which had not been divided at the time of his death. The trust company qualified as his executor, and Respass brought a suit against it for a division of the money constituting the "bank role." In reversing the judgment of the lower court, this court, through Judge DuRelle, delivered an opinion reviewing the authorities on the subject in hand, and fully sustaining the doctrine of the cases hereinbefore recited, and, among the cases reviewed, is one peculiarly analagous to that at bar, of which it was thus said: "One of the most interesting cases upon this subject is that of Everett v. Williams, the celebrated highwaymen's case, an account of which is given in 9 L. Q. R., 197. That was a bill for an accounting of a partnership business of highwaymen, though the true nature of the partnership was veiled in ambiguous language. The bill set up the partnership between defendant and plaintiff, who was 'skilled in dealing in several sorts of commodities;' that they 'proceeded jointly in the said dealing with good success on Houndslow Heath, where they dealt with a gentleman for a gold watch;' that defendant informed plaintiff that Finchley 'was a good and convenient place to deal in,' such commodities being 'very plenty' there, and if they were to deal there 'it would be almost all gain to them;' that they accordingly 'dealt with several gentlemen for divers watches, rings, swords, canes, hats, clocks, horses, bridles, saddles and other things, to the value of 200£ and upwards;' that a gentleman at Black Heath had several articles which defendant thought 'might be had for little or no money in case they could prevail on the said gentleman to part with the said things;' and that 'after some small discourse with the said gentleman said things were dealt for at a very cheap rate.' The dealings were alleged to have amounted to 2,000£ and upwards. This case, while interesting from the views it gives of the audacity of the parties and their solicitors, sheds little light upon the legal question involved, for the bill was condemned for scandal and impertinence. The solicitors were taken into custody and 'fyned' 50£ each for 'reflecting upon the honor and dignity of this court;' the counsel whose name was signed to the bill was required to pay the cost, and both the litigants were subsequently hanged at Tyburn and Maldstone, respectively, while one of the solicitors was transported."

As appellant does not seem to require the supervising care of a committee to conduct his case, his naive declaration that he believed he was to get $3,000 "in good money" for $300 in old, worn government bills, may be regarded as apocryphal; although we can not but sympathize with the pleasing simplicity with which he ignores the patent fact that the goodness of the "new silver certificates," barring the peccadillo as to the "numbers," constitute their chief bane, and affords a constant ground for the watchful anxiety on the part of the government detectives; and the same may be said of the untutored faith with which he watched in vain for the promised return of his cotenant in crime. Taken as a whole, we do not believe the books disclose a parallel in audacity to the case at bar, saving always the history of the dark lantern firm of Houndslow Heath detailed above; that a like judgment did not overtake parties litigant here as dissolved the ancient partnership, marks the lapse of our modern procedure from that vigorous integrity with which the ancient judges administered the common law in its primitive virtue.

In the Am. & Eng. Encycl. of Law, volume 15, page 1001, the rule is thus stated: "And so when money is paid on an illegal contract or personal property is transferred, the aid of the law can not, as a rule, be invoked for its recovery, although the other party refuses to perform his part of the contract."

Under the foregoing authority, we would reverse this judgment as a whole, but for the fact that the personal judgment against George Chapman is for only $175, which is less than the jurisdictional sum provided by the statute regulating appeals to this court; under the authority of the case of Rhodes v. Frankfort Chair Co., decided March 17, 1904, ante —, his appeal must be dismissed for want of jurisdiction. The judgment as to Gertie Chapman is reversed, with directions to set aside the judgment, and dismiss the petition as to her.

REGISTER NEWSPAPER CO., &c. v. YEISER, MAYOR, &c.

(Filed April 21, 1904.)

Sale of city tax bills—Advertising sale—Mandamus—Official newspaper—Under sections 3186 and 3187, Kentucky Statutes, part of the charter of second class cities providing for the sale by the city treasurer of unpaid tax bills at public auction at the door of the courthouse or city building, notice of which sale shall be advertised by the city treasurer for at least two weeks in the city's official newspaper, the plaintiff, Register Newspaper Co., being admitted to be the city's official newspaper has the right by mandamus to require the city's officer to discharge the duties imposed upon him by the law.

Hendrick & Miller for appellants.

E. H. Puryear for appellees.

Appeal from McCracken Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

Paducah is a city of the second class. Sections 3184, 3185, 3186 and 1887 of the Kentucky Statutes, are parts of the act for the government of cities of the second class.

Section 3184 fixes the dates when taxes are payable. Section 3185 directs that the assessment books shall be delivered by the auditor to the city clerk; that the city clerk shall make out the tax bills, deliver them to the auditor whose duty it is to deliver them to the city treasurer. Under the foregoing sections the taxes are due, one-half the 1st of June and the other half the 1st of December in each year. Section 8186 provides that on the first Monday in the third calendar month after each half year's bill is due it shall be returned to the treasurer. Section 8187 provides that when such tax bills are returned to the treasurer it is his duty on the first Monday in the next month to sell at the courthouse door or the city building door by auction, to the highest and best bidder, for cash, each of the tax bills, unless they are in the meantime paid to the treasurer; that the list and notice shall be published for at least two weeks in the city's official paper. The owner of a lot has the right to redeem a tax bill within one year of the tax sale. The section then provides how the purchaser may enforce a tax bill.

It will be observed that it is the tax bill which is ordered sold, not the lot, except it may thereafter be sold for the tax bill, interest and penalty. It is expressly stated in the statute that after each one half year's tax bill is due and unpaid the treasurer shall return it to the auditor. It is equally clear from the language of the statute that "on the first Monday in the next month" the sale shall take place. The language employed shows that the general assembly intended that a one-half year tax bill should be sold. The evident intention was to enforce prompt payment of the taxes due the city.

The Register Newspaper Co., by the demurrer, is admitted to be the city's official paper. It being the duty of the city's officer to advertise the sale of property for taxes, the official paper has the right to require him by mandamus to discharge the duties imposed upon him by law.

The judgment is reversed for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

COMMONWEALTH v. LAWSON.

(Filed April 21, 1904.)

Homocide—Dying declarations—Identity of accused—Controversy as to whether any declaration was made. question for the jury—On the trial of Nev. Lawson for the murder of Josh Faulkner, a witness was introduced for the Commonwealth who testified as follows: "John Faulkner was my nephew. He was shot about 2 o'clock at night and died the next night of the gunshot wound. About two hours after he was shot I went to his house where he was, and he said: 'I'm killed and can not recover;' I asked him who shot him and he said, 'Nev. Lawson shot me.'" The defense introduced two witnesses who testified that they were present; that deceased made no dying declaration, and was never able to speak after he was shot, whereupon the court excluded the testimony of the Commonwealth witness upon the idea that the preponderance of the evidence showed that no dying declaration was made. Held—It was error in the court to exclude the declaration of deceased, as testified to by the Commonwealth witness. The question as to whether or not deceased made the declaration as testified to, or whether it was true in whole or in part, or whether he made a declaration at all, were issues for the determination of the jury, and not for the court.

N. B. Hays, J. N. Sharp and Lorraine Mix for appellant.

C. W. Lester for appellee.

Appeal from Whitley Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

The appellee, Nev. Lawson, was indicted by the grand jury of Whitley county, charged with the willful murder of Josh Faulkner. The tragedy took place at a dance at the house of appellee. Upon the trial, appellee admitted that he had a difficulty with the deceased, but denied the shooting. The identity of the murderer was the real issue in the case. The Commonwealth introduced John W. Faulkner, an uncle of deceased, who testified as follows: "Josh Faulkner was my nephew; he was shot along about 2 o'clock at night and died the next night of the gunshot wound. About two hours after he was shot, I went to Nev. Lawson's house, where he was, and he said, 'I'm killed, and can not recover.' I asked him who shot him, and he said, 'Nev. Lawson shot me.'"

After the Commonwealth's evidence was in, the defense introduced two witnesses, who testified that they were present; that Josh Faulkner made no dying declaration, and was never able to speak after he was shot; whereupon the court, on motion of appellee, excluded the dying declaration as testified to by John W. Faulkner, on the ground that a preponderance of the evidence showed that the deceased had made no declaration. The trial resulted in a failure on the part of the jury to agree on a verdict; whereupon the case was re-assigned on the docket for trial, and the Commonwealth has appealed to this court under the provision of the Criminal Code, for an adjudication as to the validity of the order made by the trial judge, in excluding the evidence of the dying declaration of the decedent.

There can be no question that the testimony of John W. Faulkner fully established that condition of mind in the dying man which authorized the admission of his declaration as to the manner of his taking off. The rule is, that declarations must be made under the sanction of a full realization that the party stands in the presence of immediate dissolution. In the case of Kehoe v. Commonwealth, 85 Pa., 127, the testimony was as follows: "Bill, its all up with me; I will never get over it." The declarant died two days thereafter; the declaration was admitted.

We fully recognize that the question of the admission of such declarations is primarily for the determination of the court (Greenleaf on Evidence, section 160; Roscoe's Criminal Evidence, 8 edition, page 37; Thompson v. State, 31 Fla., 520, and Mann v. People, 9 Hun., 116); but this only relates to the question of the admissibility of the evidence; in other words, whether or not the condition of the decedent's mind, with reference to his death, is such as that the awfulness of his situation will supply the sanctity of an oath. After the testimony is in, the weight that is to be given to it, either in part or in whole, is for the determination of the jury. The defense may impeach the credibility of the declarant; may show that he made a different statement to that contained in the declaration, or that the declaration is untrue, in fact; but, after all, the question as to whether or not the declarant made the declaration as testified to, or whether it is true in whole or in part, or whether he made a declaration at all, are issues for the determination of the jury, and not for the court.

We are of opinion that the court erred in excluding the dying declaration of Josh Faulkner, as testified to by his uncle, John W. Faulkner, and we, therefore, certify our conclusion to the trial court for future guidance.

CITY OF LANCASTER v. WALTER.

(Filed April 21, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Damages—Contributory negligence—Pleading—In an action against a city for injuries resulting from falling over obstructions in a street, the fact that the petition did not state that plaintiff was unaware of the obstruction which caused the injury, did not render it defective. The absence of contributory negligence need not be stated in the petition, it being a plea that is due from the defendant.

2. Street improvement—Where an ordinance provides that certain improvement be made by abutting property owners, the performance of that work by the city upon the failure of the property owner to do it, does not render the city the agent of the property holder. The liability in a case of this kind for wrongful injury is as great as if the city had undertaken it in the first place without reference to any duty of the property holders.

G. B. Swinebroad, J. M. Rothwell and William Herndon for appellant.

R. H. Tomlinson and W. J. Williams for appellee.

Appeal from Garrard Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

The appellee, M. C. Walter, and her husband, Dr. B. F. Walter, are owners of property in, and residents of Lancaster, Ky. Their home fronts on Hill street.

In March, 1903, the city was engaged in the construction of a sidewalk on the highway named, in front of appellee's home, and in order to place curbing along the proposed sidewalk, a ditch had been dug along its edge and the curb stones which were to be set therein, had been strung along in the street next to the pavement and in front of appellee's gate. These stones were four or five feet long, eighteen to twenty inches in width, and about six inches thick. In some instances, the end of one of the stones rested upon that of another.

On a night in March, 1903, between 10 and 11 o'clock, the husband of appellee was suddenly taken violently ill, and fell in a swoon; whereupon she, being much alarmed and excited, ran across the street to her nearest neighbor, William Ward, for help; having aroused Mr. Ward, he consented to go for a physician, and she then undertook to return across the street to her home. The night was dark, and it was raining hard at the time. Returning in haste, she tripped on and fell over one of the large curb stones lying in the street in front of her gate, and was thrown into the ditch, which had been excavated as before stated, receiving injuries of so serious and painful a nature as to confine her to her bed for three or four weeks, and which, she complains, has resulted in leaving her permanently lame; to recover indemnity for which, this action was instituted. The petition alleges, substantially, the foregoing facts, which were denied by the answer, which contains, also, a plea of contributory negligence, which, being controverted by reply, completed the issues.

The evidence shows, without contradiction, that the ditch, and large stones lying along the edge thereof, had remained in that condition for several weeks; that the work was being done under an ordinance of the city, and by its direction; that no safeguards or lights to warn persons using the highway at night had ever been placed around these obstructions, and the condition of affairs complained of had not only remained for a sufficient length of time to put the city upon notice, but several members of the municipal government, who testified in the case, showed their possession of actual knowledge. The jury returned a verdict of $1,000 in favor of appellee; of this, the municipality is now complaining.

It is urged that appellee's petition is fatally defective in failing to state that she was unaware of the obstruction in the highway, which caused her injury. This objection is not well taken. The absence of contributory negligence need not be alleged in the petition; it is a plea due from the defendant. (Sections 109 and 118, Shearman and Redfield on the Law of Negligence, 5 edition.)

It is also contended for appellant that by one of its ordinances, the improvement in question was ordered to be done by the abutting property holders, among whom was appellee, and that, upon their failure so to do, the city undertook to have the work done at their expense, and, therefore, the contractor was really the agent of the property holders. This position is unsound. While the local law required the property holders to make the improvement in question, the alternative was, upon default upon their part, the city would do the work at their expense. When the city, under this ordinance, undertook to have the improvement constructed, its liability for wrongful injury was just the same as if it had undertaken the work in the first place, without reference to any duty of the property holders.

The following language in the first instruction is complained of: "It was negligence on the part of the city of Lancaster to allow the curb stones to remain as they were, and as long as they did on Hill street, without any contrivance to serve as a notice and reminder to night pedestrians of the condition of the street."

There was no dispute as to the facts constituting the negligence of the municipality. Neither the existence of the obstruction by which appellee was injured, nor the fact that it had remained in the same condition several weeks without any sort of safeguard or light, was denied by appellant; and these facts were fully established by the evidence for appellee. Where the facts constituting negligence are undisputed, it becomes, then, a rule of law to be applied by the court. In the case of Henderson Trust Co., Adm'r, &c. v. Stewart, decided by this court, and reported in 48 L. R. A., 49, it is said: "The negligence or absence of care is always a question of fact for the jury when there is a reasonable doubt as to the facts or inferences to be drawn from them, but when the facts or evidence admitted are established by undisputed testimony, it is the duty of the court to declare the law applicable to them." (Citing Field on Negligence, section 519, and Ashland Coal and Iron Co. v. Wallace, 101 Ky., 687.)

While we do not think the evidence showed gross negligence on the part of the municipality in the matter complained of, the verdict of the jury, considering the extent of appellee's injury, is so clearly compensatory, that we are of opinion appellant was not injured by the erroneous instruction. The fact that appellee knew of the existence of the dangerous obstruction in the highway did not, under the circumstances of this case, show her guilty of contributory negligence in undertaking to pass over it in the manner in which she did; the sudden, and apparently serious, illness of her husband, the immediate need for a physician, the great excitement and perturbation of mind incident to the calamity with which she was confronted, naturally rendered her forgetful of everything except the urgent mission upon which she was bent. It would have been strange, indeed, if this good wife had thought of herself for one moment in the presence of the urgent need of her husband for medical attention; that, under these distressing circumstances, she should have forgotten herself, should cause neither surprise nor condemnation. This court in the cases of City of Louisville v. Brewer's Adm'r, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 1671; City of Maysville v. Guilfoyle, 28 Ky. Law Rep., 48; City of Madisonville v. Pemberton's Adm'r, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 847, held that, although the injured parties knew of the existence of the obstructions in the highways by which they were injured, yet momentarily forgot them, they were not necessarily guilty of contributory negligence by reason of such mental aberration. The principles of law governing this branch of the case at bar are so fully illustrated in the cases cited as to make it unnecessary for us to further extend this opinion. The instructions of the court, except in the harmless instance mentioned, are unobjectionable.

The judgment is affirmed.

TANNER, &c. v. NICHOLS.

(Filed April 21, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Railroads—Subscription to capital stock—Action against subscribers to stock—In an action against subscribers to the capital stock of a railroad to recover a debt against the company after judgment against it and return of no property, the fact that appellants were elected directors of the company and acted as such, authorizing the survey of the right of way, they are estopped to raise the question that the road was not incorporated. By assuming to act they treated the company as incorporated, and the appellant having been employed by the surveyor who was employed by the directors to survey the right of way, may maintain an action for the recovery of the amount of the judgment which he recovered against the corporation.

R. E. Roberts and Fennell & Fennell for appellants.

Victor F. Bradley and James F. Askew for appellee.

Appeal from Scott Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

Appellee filed this suit against appellants. He alleged in his petition that at the May term, 1900, of the Scott Circuit Court he recovered judgment against the Green River Valley R. R. Co. for $233.33, with interest and costs, on which he had execution issued and returned no property found; that the capital stock of the railroad company is $40,000, no part of which has been paid in; that the defendants, K. L. Tanner, subscribed and agreed to pay for ten shares of stock in the company of the value of $100, E. J. Tanner for one share, Walter Dudderrar for one share, C. H. Williams for fifty shares; that none of them had paid any part of their subscription; that Williams is insolvent and was not to pay any money for his stock, but was to secure the right of way for the road, which he did; and that his judgment was unpaid. He prayed judgment requiring the defendants to pay so much of their subscription as might be necessary to satisfy his debt. The defendants answered, alleging that C. H. Williams in the summer of 1899 was soliciting stock for a railroad company, the line of which was to run from McKinney, Ky., through Mount Salem to Nashville, Tenn., and to be known as the Green River Valley R. R. Co.; that Williams applied to them to take stock in the company, fraudulently representing to them that he had the money up to build the road, and that work would begin on it as soon as the right of way could be secured; that he represented to them that they would not have to pay any money on the shares subscribed by them until the road was completed from McKinney to Mount Salem; that relying on these representations they subscribed for the stock, but that the road was not built and the company was never organized; that the plaintiff, Nichols, also subscribed for one share of stock, agreeing to pay therefor in surveying the proposed line; that the writing showing the terms and conditions upon which they subscribed the stock was in possession of the plaintiff; and that by reason of the misrepresentations made to them by Williams and the failure of the company to build the road from McKinney to Mount Salem, they were absolved from liability. The allegations of the answer were denied, and on final hearing the court entered judgment in favor of the plaintiff.

It is insisted for the defendants that the company was never incorporated; and, therefore, it could maintain no action against them on their subscriptions; and that the plaintiff has no better right than the company itself would have. It is also insisted that the plaintiffs' subscriptions were conditional on the road's being completed from McKinney to Mt. Salem, and that as the condition was not complied with they are not liable.

It is shown by the evidence that the defendants were elected directors in the company and acted as such, authorizing Williams to have the right of way surveyed. They are, therefore, estopped to raise the question as to whether the company was incorporated. By assuming to act they treated the company as incorporated, and the plaintiff having been employed by Williams, they can not, when sued for his services, defend upon the idea that the company had not been incorporated or had not complied with certain provisions of the laws of this State before doing business in it.

The answer does not make the defense that the defendants' subscription was upon the condition that they were to pay nothing unless the road was completed from McKinney to Mt. Salem. It is only alleged that Williams so represented to them. But the nature of their obligation would depend upon the paper which they signed, and not upon the representations which Williams made to induce them to make the subscription; for the previous negotiation was urged in the writing. There is no plea that Williams knew any statement he made to be untrue, and the facts alleged are not sufficient to invalidate the subscription on account of fraud in its obtaining. Besides, the evidence strongly tends to show that it was not originally contemplated that the line of road would run through Mt. Salem.

Judgment affirmed.

PARKER, JONES & STEELE v. PARKER.

(Filed April 21, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Husband and wife—Validity of note—Where the wife lent a firm money which was used by it in the conduct of its business, he never having reduced it to possession, her right to assert a claim to it was not merged into that of the husband, and she may maintain an action for its recovery.

2. Same—A debt due the wife being in existence when the present married woman's act was passed, she is entitled to all the remedies for its enforcement she would have had if the debt had been contracted under the present law.

Sam C. Hardin for appellant.

E. H. Johnson for appellee.

Appeal from Laurel Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

This action is based on a note for $400, payable to the order of the appellee, Matilda Parker, which purports to have been signed by Parker, Jones & Steele, with J. T. Williams as surety. The firm was composed of Ed. Parker Evan Jones and S. G. Steele, who conducted a "Star Route" business as partners under the firm name above mentioned. Williams prevented a recovery against him by pleading the seven year statute of limitation, as he was only surety. The principal grounds relied upon by Parker, Jones & Steele are, first, a plea of non est factum; second, that Matilda Parker is the wife of Ed Parker, a member of the firm, and could not maintain the action; third, want of consideration.

The evidence tends to show that Miss Dora Farris conducted the business of the firm at their office in London, Ky. She made the deposits in the bank and drew the firm's checks thereon. The firm's name was signed to the note by Miss Farris. She was requested by Ed. Parker to borrow the money from his wife for the firm, which she did, and signed the firm's name to the note. The money was used in the business and for its benefit. As a member of the firm, Ed. Parker had the right to borrow money to be used for the benefit of the firm. Consequently he had the right to direct an agent of the firm to do so for it. The plea of non est factum was not sustained.

Ed. Parker did not reduce his wife's money to his possession. He did not borrow the money individually. It was borrowed for the firm and used for its benefit. He not having reduced his wife's money to his possession, her right to assert claim to it was not merged into that of her husband, although the money was loaned to the firm before the passage of the present "married woman's act."

It is suggested that she can not maintain this action, because her husband is a party to it. Under the present law a wife may sue a husband. While this law does not give a wife new rights, so as to render valid a contract which was invalid under the former law, still it would afford her a new remedy for the enforcement of a right which previously existed. This debt being in existence when the present "married woman's act" was passed, she is entitled to all the remedies for its enforcement she would have had if the debt had been contracted under the present law. There was a consideration to uphold the note, because the firm received and used the money for which it was executed.

The judgment is affirmed.

ZOOK, &c. v. ILLINOIS CENTRAL R. R. CO.

(Filed April 21, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Pleading—In an action against a railroad for the destruction of a crossing and its refusal to restore it, it was not necessary to aver that plaintiffs were in possession of the land, because they averred that they owned it, and the action may be maintained for injury to it without being in possession of it.

Wickliffe & Wiley for appellants.

J. M. Dickinson, Pirtle & Trabue, Robbins, Thomas & Bridgewater for appellee.

Appeal from Carlisle Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

This case went off on demurrer. The petition as amended is very inartificially drawn, but the substance of the averments which it contains is to the following effect; that the plaintiffs owned a farm through which appellee's road was constructed; that when the road was constructed a crossing was made at a point on their farm by the appellee's lessor; that it was maintained and used by the plaintiffs and their vendors continuously and adversely and under a claim of right for more than fifteen years before the destruction of it by the appellee; that it was an easement which they had acquired by contract and the adverse use mentioned; that the defendant had destroyed the crossing, refused to restore it, thus forcing the plaintiffs to travel two miles to reach that part of the farm on the opposite side of the railroad. The criticisms of the petition are hypercritical. It is urged that the averments of the petition did not show that the plaintiffs have a personal interest in the land. They aver that it is their farm which is equivalent to saying they own the land.

They showed that they had an interest in the crossing because it was an easement, appurtenant to their freehold and an invasion or destruction of their right therein could be the foundation of an action, as could be an injury to any part of their freehold. It is urged that appellant's claim of right to the crossing by the continued use for more than fifteen years is inconsistent with their claims for damages as a result of their being kept out of possession; and that it is not a good plea as a claim of prescriptive right, because it is a statement of evidence, not a statement of substantive right. The plaintiffs recognized that the appellee had a perpetual right of way, and that it was necessary to show that they had acquired a right to a passway over its right of way. They, therefore, averred that they had continuously used the crossing or passway under a claim of right for more than fifteen years. This is a statement of fact, just like it would have been to have averred that the defendant, by deed, had granted to them the right to use the passway, or that under the statute it was the duty of the defendant to maintain the crossing for this use. An easement can be acquired by the continued adverse use under a claim of right for fifteen years, as the right of entry may be tolled by the continued actual adverse possession of land. While plaintiffs averred that originally there was a contract under which the crossing was constructed, still it was not necessary in order to state a cause of action, that its terms should have been stated, because their right to the easement was sufficiently stated by the averments that they owned the land and in connection therewith had used the crossing under a claim of right. The averments summarized are to the effect that they owned the land and had acquired the right to enjoy the crossing in question. It was not necessary to aver a contract and its breach, because the action is not founded upon contract.

They averred that they had rights in real estate which had been invaded and sought to recover damages for the injuries which had been inflicted thereby. It was not necessary to aver that they were in the possession of the land, because they had averred that they owned it and they could maintain an action for injury thereto without being in possession of it. We are of the opinion that the petition stated a cause of action.

The judgment is reversed for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

McMAKIN v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed April 22, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Taxation—Place of residence—In an action by an auditor's agent for the recovery of taxes, where the only issue was as to the place of residence of the owner of property sought to be assessed for taxation, where it appeared that the person was a nonresident of this State during the period for which the tax was sought to be collected, it was error for the trial court to adjudge that such person was a resident of this State and render judgment for the recovery of the taxes.

Morgan Yewell for appellant.

J. Smith Barlow for appellee.

Appeal from Nelson Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

This action was instituted by the auditors' agent for Nelson county against appellant, Mollie V. McMakin, by which he sought to recover a judgment against her for taxes upon about $8,000 worth of personal property. It was alleged that she omitted to list with the assessor for the years beginning with 1898 up to and including 1901, and this property was not assessed in any of these years and that she failed to pay any taxes thereon. By her answer she in effect admits the ownership of this property for the years 1898, 1894 and 1895, but alleged that for the other years named she was not the owner thereof; that her former husband, one Hardesty, devised this property to her with the provisions that if she remarried the property was to go to her children by him, and that she did marry McMakin in the year 1896, and that after that date the property belonged to her Hardesty children. She denied that she was a resident of Nelson county, and alleged that she was a resident of Colorado during the years 1893, 1894 and 1895.

A copy of the will of Hardesty was filed as evidence, and it appears from that and other evidence that she was not the owner of this property after her marriage with McMakin. The only issue involved is as to whether or not appellant was a resident and domiciled in Nelson county, Ky., on the 15th of September of each of the years 1893, 1894 and 1895. The lower court on the trial determined that she was, and from this judgment she has appealed. Appellant and four or five witnesses testify that during these years she was a resident and domiciled in the State of Colorado, where her sons were engaged in business; that she was temporarily in Nelson county during portions of these years nursing and giving attention to her sick mother. We have carefully examined the record and have been unable to find any evidence contradicting appellant's version of this matter. There was no competent proof that she ever at any time resided in Nelson county before her marriage with McMakin in the year 1896.

Wherefore, the judgment of the lower court is reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings consistent herewith.

CITY OF LOUISVILLE v. WERNE, &c.

(Filed April 21, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Taxation—House of worship—Lot adjoining and used in connection therewith—Under constitution, section 170, exempting from taxation "places actually used for religious worship with the grounds attached thereto, and used and appurtenant to the house of worship not exceeding one-half acre in cities, and two acres in the country," a lot 100 feet wide by 200 feet deep on which a house of worship was erected in March, 1891, is exempt from taxation.

2. Taxes prior to the adoption of the Constitution of 1891—Hewitt Act of 1886—Under the Hewitt Act of 1886, exempting from taxation "churches and all property devoted to charitable purposes," a lot in a city leased to a church in 1890 for the purposes of a mission church, is exempt from taxation for the year 1890, although the church thereon was not erected until 1891.

3. Title to the lot—The fact that the church has possession and use of the church building and lot, exempts it from taxation, although the legal title is in the lessor.

Henry L. Stone for appellant.

Isaac T. Woodson for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Chancery Court, First Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

The city of Louisville filed these actions to enforce its tax lien on a lot of ground on Third street for the years 1891 to 1898, inclusive, which it is claimed by defendants, was exempt from taxation. The facts as to the matter are as follows: In the year 1890 the Walnut Street Baptist Church desired to establish a mission out on Third street, and with a view to further the cause Joseph Werne, who was a Baptist, and owned the lot in controversy, at the request of one of those interested in the movement on March 31, 1890, leased the lot to the trustees of the Walnut Street Baptist Church for a term of twenty years, without rent, for the purpose of a mission church, it being stipulated in the lease that the lessees would pay any taxes chargeable to the property. The trustees took possession of the lot, which had no buildings on it, and in May or June, 1891, moved a house upon it and began holding services in it. They began the construction of a church building, which was completed in August, 1891, and after that the regular services were held in it, including a Sunday-school and the usual services on Sunday and prayer meetings on Wednesday evenings. From that time to this these have been continual. In about three years the congregation had become sufficiently strong to form a separate organization; the Third Avenue Baptist Church was then formed out of it, and the lease was assigned to it by the trustees of the Walnut Street Church. The present Constitution of Kentucky took effect on September 21, 1891. The question of exemption since then depends upon its provisions. By section 170, among other things, the following property is exempted from taxation: "Places actually used for religious worship with the grounds attached thereto and used and appurtenant to the house of worship not exceeding one-half acre in cities or towns and not exceeding two acres in the country."

The lot is 100 feet wide and 200 feet deep. It is all used and appurtenant to the house of worship. The makers of the Constitution, when they limited the exemption to one-half acre in cities or towns, had in view that light and air are necessary as well as room for out-buildings, and that the exemption should not be restricted simply to the ground the church stands on. It is insisted for the city that as there is forty-three feet of the lot on the south side unoccupied except by two coal sheds, this much at least should be taxed, but the whole lot is appurtenant to the house of worship and used with it by the congregation. It no doubt contributes much to their comfortable enjoyment of the premises, and we see no reason for distinguishing this forty-three feet from the remainder of the lot.

It is also earnestly insisted for the city that as the congregation does not own the lot, but simply leases it for twenty years, it may be taxed. But the Constitution does not make the exemption depend upon the title. Its language is, "Places actually used for religious worship with the grounds attached thereto and used and appurtenant to the house of worship." It is the use of the property and not the ownership which determines the question of exemption. (Broadway Christian Church v. Commonwealth, 28 Ky. Law Rep., 1895.) To hold that the congregation must be the absolute owner of the property used exclusively for religious worship in order to create the exemption would be to inject words into the Constitution and to narrow the exemption which it expressly makes. (Scott v. Society of Russian Israelites, 81 N. W., 624; Gerke v. Purcell, 25 Ohio St., 242, and cases cited.) The cases relied on for the city as sustaining the contrary rule seem to be based on provisions materially different from that quoted. It is shown that Werne gets no rent from the property, and it, therefore, is not held for corporate or private profit nor used nor employed for gain by any person or corporation. We see no reason, therefore, under the letter or the spirit or the purpose of the constitutional provision for denying the exemption claimed, and conclude that the circuit court properly held the lot exempt since the adoption of the present Constitution.

It remains to consider whether it was exempt under the previous statute. By the act of 1886, known as the Hewitt Act, the following property was exempt: "Public schools, churches, and all property of seminaries, asylums, hospitals, infirmaries and colleges and all other funds devoted to charitable purposes and church parsonages, public cemeteries, except those owned by joint stock companies or associations which declare a dividend, provided that nothing herein shall be construed as exempting any property which is used or employed for gain of any person." * * *

The property was not used for gain of any person, after the lease was made in March, 1890. The taxes for the year 1892 were assessed as of September 1, 1891, which was before the present Constitution took effect. The taxes for the year 1892 are, therefore, governed by the statute quoted. The new church was begun in March, 1891, and the services were begun in it in August. On September 1, it was, therefore, church property, and exempt as a church. The circuit court properly so held.

As to the preceding year a more difficult question is presented, as the taxes for the year 1891 were assessed as of September 1, 1890, and at that time there was no building on the lot; but the church trustees took charge of it when the lease was made and held it from that time forward for the purposes for which it was granted. They had no right to use it for any other purpose than a mission church. If they had erected a house on it for other purposes and rented it out for gain, it would have been a palpable violation of the trust confided in them, for which Werne might have had remedy by action. The establishment of a mission for the preaching of the gospel was a charitable purpose within the meaning of the statute. The word "funds" is used in the statute in the sense of capital. It will be observed that the language is churches and all property of seminaries, asylums, hospitals, infirmaries and colleges, and all other funds devoted to charitable purposes. Under the previous statute which had for many years existed the lot would undoubtedly have been exempt, and we do not think there is enough in this act to change the rule as to a lot like this which was clearly devoted to charitable purposes. In construing the statute all its terms must be read together, and some regard must be had to the settled legislative policy of the State, which had then so long been followed. When the statute is thus read, taking it all together, we conclude that its terms sufficiently evidence a purpose to exempt from taxation, property which, like this, was devoted to religious uses, although the trustees had been unable to begin the erection of a church building before September 1.

On the original appeal the judgment is affirmed. On the cross appeal the judgment adjudging a lien upon the property for the year 1891 is reversed and the cause is remanded for a judgment dismissing the petition.

TURNER'S TRUSTEE, &c. v. WASHBURN, &c.

(Filed April 22, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Vendor and purchaser—Fraud in procuring deed—Ignorance of vendor—Superior knowledge of vendee—Inadequacy of consideration—Legal fraud—Three tracts of land were devised by Oscar Turner, Sr., to his son, Henry, for life, with remainder in two of the tracts to all of Henry's children, and remainder in one tract to Henry's son, Oscar. Henry died in February, 1896, leaving four children. Oscar died in August, 1896, at the age of five.

years. In August, 1901, Henry's widow, who was then the wife of Thomas Williams, sold and conveyed to Henry's brother, Oscar Turner, who was the executor of the will of Oscar Turner, Sr., all her present and future interest in all of said land, at the price of $3,000, in which conveyance her husband joined. Her interest was then worth from $10,000 to $15,000. This conveyance was made by her under the belief that she was selling her life interest in two of the tracts and not the interest she had inherited from her son, Oscar. Held—That while there may have been no actual fraud in the purchase, yet she having sold under a misapprehension of her interest, and the purchaser being a lawyer and fully advised thereof, the sale was inequitable and unjust and amounts to a fraud in law.

2. Evidence—Competency of divorced husband to testify for wife—After said conveyance, the appellee obtained a divorce from her second husband, Williams, and married her present husband, D. A. Washburn. On the trial of this case her second husband, Williams, from whom she had been divorced, testified as a witness for her as to conversations he had with her vendee, Oscar Turner, concerning this transaction, the said Oscar having died after obtaining said deed. Held—That appellee not being his wife at the time he testified, he was a competent witness for her as to conversations and statements made to the witness by vendee, not in her presence.

3. Decree of rescission—Purchase money restored with interest and lien on the land—A judgment setting aside said deed and giving Oscar Turner's representative a lien on the land for the repayment of the purchase money, with interest, is affirmed.

Quigley & Mocquot for appellants.

J. B. Wickliffe for appellees.

Appeal from Ballard Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

Oscar Turner, Sr., departed this life about the year 1895, a resident of Jefferson county, Kentucky. He left a will which was duly probated in that county, by which he devised all of his property to his wife and three children. We refer only to the devises to his son, Henry, as a portion of these devises is the subject of this litigation. He devised 548 acres of land on Clark's river in McCracken county, Kentucky, to his son, Henry, for life, with remainder to Henry's son, Oscar. And 592 $\frac{3}{4}$ acres, that being one-third of testators' home farm in Ballard county, Kentucky, which was also devised to him for life, with remainder to all the children of Henry Turner. Testator also devised to his son, Henry, for life one-half of a tract of land, situated in Ballard county, on the Ohio river, and near the mouth of Garr's creek, and at his death to go to all the children of Henry Turner. Henry Turner died in February, 1896, and left Rebecca F. Turner, now Washburn, appellee, and four and only four children, Oscar being one of them, and he died in August, 1896, at the age of five years.

On August 21, 1901, Oscar Turner, her brother-in-law, who was the executor of the will of Oscar Turner, Sr., obtained a conveyance from her and her then husband, Thomas Williams, which conveyance is as follows: "This deed between Rebecca F. Williams and Thomas Williams of the first part and Oscar Turner, of Jefferson county, of the second part, Witnesseth: That in consideration of $3,000 cash in hand paid and other good and valuable considerations, the receipt of all of which are hereby acknowledged, the parties of the first part do hereby convey to the parties of the second part in fee simple the following described property, namely: All the right, title or interest which they or either of them now have or may hereafter in any way acquired or become entitled to in the estate of any kind left by Oscar Turner, Sr., H. L. Turner or Oscar Turner, all deceased, to have and to hold the same with covenant of general warranty, and said parties of the first part further covenant and warrant that they are seized of an indefeasible estate of fee simple in the property hereby conveyed, that they have good right and full power to convey the same, and that it is free from any incumbrance."

Appellee instituted this action to have this conveyance set aside, alleging that it was obtained by fraud; that she did not understand the effect of the conveyance at the time she executed it; that she had full and complete confidence in the vendee, her brother-in-law, who led her to believe that the conveyance only included her interests in these estates and property until her youngest child by Turner should arrive at the age of twenty-one years; that she signed this writing under the belief that this was the extent of the conveyance, and that the only consideration received was the $3,000 in cash, and the property conveyed therein at the date of the conveyance was reasonably worth $15,000 or more. Her brother-in-law, Oscar Turner, died the year following the date of the deed. His representatives answered appellee's petition, traversing the allegations thereof. The proof was heard and the lower court adjudged that the deed was obtained by fraud and set it aside and gave Oscar Turner's representatives a lien upon this real estate for the repayment of the $3,000, with its interest. From that judgment appellants have appealed.

The lower court properly refused to allow the deposition of appellee to be read as evidence, for the reason that under the Code she could not testify in her own interest concerning a transaction had with a person who was dead at the time she gave her deposition. The appellant claims that the lower court erred in allowing the deposition of Thomas Williams to be read as evidence on the trial of this action. Williams was the husband of appellee at the time this conveyance was made, but afterwards she obtained a divorce from him. At the time he gave his deposition she was not his wife, but the wife of appellee D. A. Washburn. The witness did not undertake, in his deposition, to testify concerning any communications between himself and appellee during their marriage relations. At the time he testified, and at all times since the divorce was granted, he had no interest whatever in the result of the matter in litigation. His whole testimony related to conversations and communications between himself and Oscar Turner, the vendee in the conveyance. (Section 606 of the Code of Practice.) In our opinion, the court did not err in permitting this deposition to be read as evidence. The testimony, as produced by appellees, showed that the land that descended to appellee upon the death of her infant son, Oscar, at the time of this conveyance was reasonably worth more than $12,000. The proof introduced by appellants showed that it was worth something over $6,000 at that time. The appellants refer to the case of Banta's Exors v. Terry, &c. 2 Ky. Law Rep., 202, and claim under that decision, there being a doubt concerning the title to the land, the inadequacy of price should not be sufficient to au-authorize the court to set aside the conveyance. The case before us is unlike that. In that case there was a doubt as to the title, and in fact Bell actually owned the life estate by the curtesy in the land. In the case at bar the appellee owned the fee-simple title unincumbered in any way to the 548 acres of land in McCracken county, and a like title to one undivided fourth in the two surveys of land devised by Oscar Turner, Sr., to his son, Henry, situated in Ballard county.

The child, Oscar, the son of appellee, and Henry Turner, derived this land not from either of his parents, but from his grandparent, Oscar Turner, Sr. In such a case, when an infant dies without issue, leaving lands, they descend as if he were an adult. Section 1401 of the Kentucky Statutes, which provides that if an infant dies without issue having title to land derived by gift, devise or descent from one of his parents, the whole shall descend to that parent and his or her kindred, etc., does not apply to land derived from a grandparent. (Cooksey v. Hill, 20 Ky. Law Rep., 1878.) This opinion was rendered about two years before this conveyance was made, and the proof shows that Oscar Turner, vendee, was a lawyer, and it is reasonable to suppose that he had no doubt as to appellee's title to these lands at the time he made the trade for them.

Thomas Williams testified that Oscar Turner wrote him a letter to meet him upon the old Oscar Turner farm in Ballard county, in the letter fixing the day. They met at the appointed time, and at that meeting Turner said to him that lawyers told him that appellee had an interest in this land, but that he did not believe she had any, but to avoid any trouble he was willing to pay her $2,500 for her interest, which would be more than the rent would amount to by the time her youngest child arrived at the age of twenty-one years, and asked the witness to explain the matter to his wife, and if they would sign the deed he would give the witness $1,000 in money. Turner charged Williams to keep this matter a secret from his wife, the appellee. Afterwards the deed was executed.

F. L. Turner, a lawyer of Wickliffe, Ky., and a first cousin of Oscar Turner, testified that in a conversation with Oscar Turner at witness' house in Wickliffe in April or May, 1902, just prior to the time that Oscar Turner took a trip to Dallas, Tex., where he was stricken with a fatal illness, the following passed between them: "I told him that I had read the deed he had from Rebecca and was very much astonished as on its face it purported to convey both her present interest or any future interest she might inherit in any of the Turner lands, and for a consideration of only $3,000; that she certainly did not understand what she was selling, that her property rights at the time of the deed was worth at least $15,000, and that her inheritance might amount to many thousands; that after seeing the deed, I had asked her about the matter, and she said she had only sold her interest in the Ballard county land until her youngest Turner child became of age; that I told her that it included her fee-simple title to the Ballard county land, and also to the McCracken county land; that she then said she did not own the McCracken county land, that the McCracken county land was never mentioned, and that she was only selling her dower interest, as she called it, in the Ballard land until her son, Gardner, was twenty-one years old; that I told her she had misunderstood the terms of the deed on its face; that she asked me what to do about the matter and I told her I would see Oscar and advise her later, which I did; to this statement made by me to Oscar he said, 'well, I intended to buy everything she had, and that is what I bought; that she would sell her property and spend the proceeds, and I knew that I would have to take care of her and the children, and I wanted to save the property to help support them. I did not tell her that she owned any land in McCracken county, nor how much nor what interest she owned in Ballard, he said as soon as she spent the money he paid her he would try and get her to go to Louisville where he could look after her and the children.' I then told him that I thought probably that that was the best, and I would assist him in getting her to go to Louisville by telling her to let the matter drop and go with him; I then advised her to do as Oscar wanted her to do; for he seemed willing and was amply able to take care of her and the children, and if this was his purpose, I believed he would carry it out, and that she could not afford to have a misunderstanding or falling out with the Turners in Louisville, for they were the only ones to help her. She promised me to accept his offer to go to Louisville, but married Washburn, and did not go."

Under the evidence in this case we are impressed with the belief that it was the intention of Oscar Turner to carry out his purpose as expressed by the witness, F. L. Turner, and that it was his purpose to save the estate for the benefit of appellee and her children, and to prevent its being wasted by her then husband, but unfortunately he died soon thereafter without effectuating his intent, and failed to express his purpose and intent with reference to this property in his will or by any writing. This theory, however, is not presented as a defense, the only defense being a denial of any wrong perpetrated upon the appellee. To uphold appellants' contention would result in allowing the heirs of Oscar Turner to retain property of the value of at least $10,000 for the price of $3,000, and which was obtained in the manner stated by the witness. This would be inequitable and unjust, and while it may not be actual fraud, it amounts to fraud in law. (14 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law, 2 edition, 20, and Cabell, &c. v. Cabell's Adm'r, &c., 1 Met., 385.)

For these reasons the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

IPSER v. ROSENBAUM.

(Filed April 22, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Adverse possession—This case was affirmed upon the evidence showing sixty or seventy years adverse possession of a strip of ground less than three inches in width.

W. T. Burch for appellant.

Kohn, Baird & Spindle and R. L. Greene for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery Branch, First division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

It appears from the record that appellant and appellee own adjoining lots in the city of Louisville, Ky., fronting on Market street. Upon these lots brick houses were erected sixty or seventy years ago. They were not erected at the same time and did not have a common or partition wall, but the walls were nine inches thick and built so close that they appeared to an ordinary observer as one wall. A few years since, appellee had his old house torn down and a large brick building erected in its stead. Appellant brought this action, alleging that appellee erected his new building three inches over the line on her property, and asks that appellee be required to remove it and surrender to her this three inches of ground and $300 in damages for its detention. Appellee denied the allegations of the petition and alleged that his new house occupied the ground that the old one occupied and no more, except it extended further back from the street, and that he and those under whom he claimed had owned and occupied this lot and house for seventy-five years or more with the usual and proper averments of the plea of the statutes of limitations.

The issues were completed, proof was heard and the court adjudged that appellant was not entitled to recover, and dismissed her petition, of which she complains. The only question involved was one of fact. Appellant introduced testimony tending to sustain her petition and to the effect that from the appearance of the walls, looking at them from the front and by measuring through a crack or hole from the inside of appellant's building, that appellee, to obtain the land of appellant, had cut or hewn off the side of her three-story brick building. Appellant, with her husband and several tenants, occupied her building during the time appellee's building was being erected, and it is strange that no one professed to see the cutting or chipping off of this brick wall, which must have necessarily been tedious. Her surveyors testified that, by actual measurements, appellee's house was erected over the line and upon appellant's lot to the extent of six-eighths of an inch. Appellee's old building was torn down and the new one erected by contract. These contractors and persons who labored for them testified that the new building was erected on the ground that the old one occupied except the new one was deeper or longer, and also testified that appellant's wall was not cut, chipped or disturbed in any way, and his surveyors testified that by actual measurements, appellant's wall was on the line and did not extend across it.

Wherefore, the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

SEABORN v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed April 22, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Evidence—Character of deceased as a drinking man—On the trial of one indicted for murder, evidence that the deceased was a drinking man was incompetent.

2. Clothing of deceased—It was competent to introduce the clothing of the deceased, worn at the time he was shot, to show the location of the wounds on his body.

3. Conduct of brother of accused in keeping witnesses away from the trial—It was competent to ask the brother of the accused, who was a witness for him, whether he had contributed to the absence of two witnesses, who had testified for the Commonwealth on the examining trial, in order to show his interest and affect his credibility.

4. Statement of accused on examining trial—It was proper for the Commonwealth to ask accused if he had not voluntarily testified at his examining trial that he had shot and killed deceased.

5. Proof of other public offenses—It was not competent to ask the accused if he had not been indicted in Taylor county for a public offense, but it was competent for accused to state that he had left Taylor county to avoid indicting others.

T. J. Coyle for appellant.

N. B. Hays and Loraine Mix for appellee.

Appeal from Jackson Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

The appellant, Jacob Seaborn, and Hiram Dees were jointly indicted by the grand jury of Jackson county for the murder of Henry Peters. A separate trial was awarded to the appellant, Seaborn, who being put upon his trial before a jury was convicted of voluntary manslaughter and sentenced to confinement in the penitentiary for twenty-one years. A reversal is asked on the ground that the trial court erred to his prejudice during the progress of the trial in a number of instances in the admission of testimony over the objection of the appellant and in the exclusion of testimony offered by him.

The first error complained of was the refusal of the trial court to permit the appellant to prove that the deceased, Henry Peters, was a drinking man, after having allowed the Commonwealth to prove that the defendant was drinking on the day of the commission of the homicide. Whilst voluntary drunkenness constitutes no excuse for the commission of crime, it is always admissible in evidence as one fact bearing upon the existence or nonexistence of malice, in the mind of the accused. (Wilkerson v. Commonwealth, 88 Ky., 83; Buchanon v. Commonwealth, 86 Ky., 110; Shananhan v. Commonwealth, 8 Bush, 463.) The defendant was permitted to prove that the deceased Peters was also drinking on the day of his death. The fact that he was a drinking man was immaterial and incompetent.

It is also complained that the Commonwealth was allowed to introduce as evidence the clothing worn by the deceased on the day when he was shot. We think this was competent evidence to show the location of the wounds on the body of the deceased. It is also complained that the court erred in permitting the Commonwealth's attorney to ask the brother of the accused, who testified as a witness in his behalf, whether he had contributed in any way to the absence of two witnesses who had testified in behalf of the Commonwealth before the examining court, and also in refusing to allow the defendant to prove that their absence was attributable to other causes.

We think it was competent to interrogate the witness for the defendant along the line indicated, with the view of showing the extent of his interest in the case and to affect his credibility. The record discloses, however, that the defendant was permitted to prove that one of these witnesses did not leave the county until he was indicted himself for a criminal offense. The cross-examination, however, wholly failed to elicit any fact damaging to the defendant, and was, we think, immaterial. It is further complained that the Commonwealth was permitted to prove in chief over the objection of the accused that he had voluntarily testified at his examining trial that he had shot and killed the deceased. It is always competent for the Commonwealth to prove voluntary declarations and admissions of persons charged with crime with reference thereto against him. (3 Rice on Evidence, 72; Wharton's Criminal Evidence, section 628.)

The appellant also complains that the trial court refused to allow the appellant to introduce testimony for the purpose of showing his reputation was that of a peaceable citizen. Whilst it appears from the record that the trial court sustained exceptions to the form of a question seeking to elicit information on this point, it did not exclude any competent testimony as to the general reputation of the accused for peace and good order or the reverse. It is further complained that the Commonwealth was permitted to interrogate the accused upon cross-examination as to the motives which induced him to leave the county of Taylor, and if he did not leave that county because of charges against him. In response to which the accused answered: "They say that I am indicted down there. I left that county to keep from going before the court and indicting some other fellows." The trial judge immediately cautioned the jury that it was not competent for the Commonwealth to show that the accused had been indicted in Taylor county or charged with a public offense, but that so much of his answer as admitted that he had left the county to avoid indicting other persons, was competent.

It is never competent to impeach a witness by proof of particular acts which have no connection with the offense for which he was on trial. This question was fully considered in Howard v. Commonwealth, 22 Ky. Law Rep., 1551, where the Kentucky cases on this subject are collated. But where the answer which the accused may give will not directly and certainly show infamy or the commission of a public offense, he may be compelled to testify. (Greenleaf on Evidence, section 456.) We, therefore, think that the trial court's ruling on this point was not prejudicial error.

Appellant also complains that the verdict is not supported by the testimony. While there is evidence in the record conducing to show that defendant was acting in his necessary self-defense at the time he shot and killed the deceased, there was also testimony, circumstantial in character in the main, from which the jury might reasonably have concluded that this was not true, and to support their verdict finding the appellant guilty of voluntary manslaughter. Under this state of fact this court is prohibited by the Code of Practice from reversing the case for insufficient evidence to uphold the verdict; although we say frankly that we would have been better satisfied if the testimony on this point had been more conclusive.

But for reasons indicated the judgment is affirmed.

CRAVENS v. DESPAIN.

(Filed April 22, 1904—Not to be reported.)

C. S. Hill and G. C. Avritt for appellant.

L. S. Pence and Robert L. Greens for appellee.

Appeal from Marion Circuit Court.

Judge Nunn delivered the following response to petition for rehearing:

As stated in the opinion, the appeal was on a partial transcript and with only a partial transcript it must be presumed that the lower court acted properly. The appellant, in his petition for rehearing, refers to his schedule filed in the record and claims that it calls for a complete record except the proof taken. The record shows that appellant filed his schedule and the appellee did not file one and there is nothing in the record showing that the appellee had any notice of the filing of appellant's schedule as required by section 787 of the Civil Code of Practice.

The petition for rehearing is overruled.

CARR, &c. v. FIELD, &c.

(Filed April 27, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Lands—Conveyances—In a conveyance from the husband to the wife of an estate for life, with remainder to him, but in the event he died first then she was to hold the lot with power to will or convey it, it is apparent that he intended in the event she should survive him, to vest in her the fee-simple title to the property conveyed.

F. M. Hutchinson for appellants.

E. L. McDonald for appellees.

Appeal from Henderson Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burrum.

On the 4th day of December, 1898, George Brown duly executed the following conveyance to his wife, Mary E. Brown: "This deed between George Brown, grantor, and Mary E. Brown, grantee, witnesseth: That grantor in consideration of the love and affection he bears his wife, the grantee herein, and $1 cash, in hand paid, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, does hereby sell, transfer and convey to the grantee for and during her natural life, with remainder to this grantor, the following property, to wit (here follows description of land,) to have and to hold the same with all the appurtenances thereon to the grantee for and during her natural life, with remainder to the grantor with covenant of general warranty. If the grantor should die before the grantee, then the grantee is to have and hold said lot as and for her separate estate, with full power to will and convey same. But should she die before grantor, then the title to said property is to vest in grantor as above."

The parties to this conveyance were childless, and grantor, George Brown, died before his wife. After his death the grantee, Mary E. Brown, sold and conveyed the property by general warranty deed to one Sarah Hester, who subsequently on the 23d of August, 1898, reconveyed the property by general warranty deed to Mary E. Brown, who thereafter died intestate and childless. This suit involves a controversy between the heirs at law of the husband, George Brown, and the heirs at law of the wife, Mary E. Brown, as to the ownership of the lot in controversy. The trial court held that the title to the property descended to the heirs at law of the wife, and the heirs at law of the husband have appealed, and contend in this court that there is a clear repugnance between the nature of the estate granted and that limited in the habendum clause of the deed, and invoke the rule that where such irreconcilable conflict exists, the granting words of the deed must control, and to support this contention refer to the case of Ratcliffe, &c. v. Mars, &c., 87 Ky., 36. The deed considered in that case is as follows: "The said Wm. Ratcliffe hath bargained and doth hereby convey unto Wm. Ratcliffe, Jr., two certain tracts of land (here follows description of land,) to have and hold said tracts of land with their emblements to said William aforesaid during his natural life, after that to his heirs, forever free from the claim of said William, Sr., or any person claiming under, by or through him with no other title or interest."

The court decided in that case that "if an estate be granted to A. in fee simple and in the habendum to him for life, and thereafter to his heirs generally, the restrictive clause was inoperative unless it could be gathered from the whole instrument that the grantor intended that the restrictive clause in the habendum should control the granting clause, and there being nothing in the deed indicating that the grantor intended that the habendum should limit the estate granted to a life estate, the grantee took the fee simple."

We deem it unnecessary to discuss the soundness of the conclusion reached in that case, as it is perfectly clear from the whole instrument that the grantor in this case intended to invest the fee simple title to the property conveyed in the wife, if he should die before her. And when the intention of a grantor in a deed can be clearly ascertained from the entire paper, it must always govern. The intent of the grantor must control. In Jackson v. Meyers, 8 Johns, 383, Judge Kent states the rule in these words: "The intent when apparent and not repugnant to any rule of law will control technical terms, for the intent and not the words is the essence of every agreement. In the exposition of deeds, the restriction must be upon and from a comparison of the whole instrument; and that with an endeavor to give every part of it its meaning and effect."

Mr. Blackstone says: "The construction must be made upon the entire deed, and not merely upon disjointed parts of it."

Applying this rule of construction to the deed in question we are of the opinion that Mary E. Brown having survived her husband became vested with the fee simple title to the property thereafter.

MISE v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed April 27, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Criminal law—It was not an abuse of discretion to refuse to allow the jury to view the place where the homicide occurred, where the term was near its close, the place fifteen miles distant, and besides a surveyor selected by the defendant had made a map showing the local situation and the distances between points referred to in the evidence.

James Sparks for appellant.

N. B. Hays and Loralne Mix for appellee.

Appeal from Laurel Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

This appeal is prosecuted from a judgment of conviction for the murder of Elisha Whitaker. It is urged that the court erred; first, in overruling the motion for a continuance; second, in refusing to take the jury to view the place where the homicide occurred.

The court overruled the motion for a continuance, but the affidavit therefor to be read as the evidence of the absent witness. There was nothing shown which made it peculiarly necessary that the absent witness should have been present and testified, that would not exist in any other prosecution for felony. If the courts did not proceed to the trial of criminal cases and allow defendants to read affidavits for continuances as the evidence of absent witnesses, such prosecutions would almost come to a stand still and the administration of justice would be seriously interrupted. There were some reasons in the case why it would have been well to have sent the jury to view the place where the homicide was committed. Whether this should have been done was in the sound discretion of the court. The term was near its close, the place was fifteen miles distant from the court house and to reach which it was necessary to travel over mountain roads. Besides a surveyor selected by the defendant had measured the distance between points referred to in the evidence and made a map showing the local situation. We do not think the court abused its discretion.

The judgment is affirmed.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

SELBY v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed April 26, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Criminal law—Evidence—In a trial for murder where it was impossible for the witnesses to determine who fired the shot, or caused it to be fired, where one was a party to the occurrence, an exclamation made by him instantly was a part of the res gestæ and should have been admitted by the lower court.

James Sparks and D. K. Rawlings for appellant.

N. B. Hays and Loraine Mix for appellee.

Appeal from Laurel Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

Daniel Selby, who was indicted in the Laurel Circuit Court for the murder of Thomas Black, was tried and convicted of manslaughter and sentenced to seven years and eight months in the penitentiary.

The indictment charged that Selby killed Black by shooting him with a loaded pistol. The circumstances, as shown by the record, were about these: On the day the killing occurred about twelve or fifteen persons had been drinking beer from kegs which had been hauled out from a brewery situated in the town of Pittsburg, Ky., to a place in the woods. These parties had been at this place drinking from some time in the morning to about 4 o'clock in the afternoon. Most of them were considerably under the influence of liquor, the appellant probably being the drunkest; but all appeared to be in a good humor, no friction or ill feeling of any kind having arisen between them. Appellant had a pistol and on one or two occasions he had it exposed and spoke of its being a good one, he also boasted of his manhood and his ability as a wrestler. About this time he took his seat on the ground near where Thomas Black was drawing beer and handing it out to the crowd. Most of the witnesses say that he then had the pistol in his hand. The deceased, Black, remarked to him, "Dan, don't handle that pistol in that way, you might shoot me in the back." Just at this instant Andrew Patterson, who was about six or eight feet distant from appellant, sprang to him and grabbed the pistol and instantly the pistol fired and killed Black, and at that moment Andrew arose with the pistol in his hand and remarked, "Boys, you see that it was an accident," and started after Dr. Givens. Not one of the witnesses present could tell who fired the shot, whether Patterson or the appellant. The trend of the testimony shows that it was the intention of Patterson to disarm the appellant so that he, in his drunken condition, might not injure any one, accidentally or otherwise.

The appellant also offered to prove by Dr. Givens that when Patterson arrived he told him that he had accidentally shot Black and he wanted him to go to see him. Patterson was not introduced as a witness in the case, it appearing that, at the time of the trial, he was in the State of Indiana. The court refused to allow this statement of Patterson, as related by Dr. Givens, and also the statement made immediately after the shot was fired, to go to the jury as evidence, and of this action of the court appellant complains. The court did not err in refusing to allow Dr. Givens to testify that Patterson stated to him that he shot deceased accidentally. This would be hearsay and could be proven only by Patterson himself.

In our opinion the court erred in refusing to allow the statement made by Patterson instantly after the shot was fired, "Boys, you see this was an accident." This was a part of the res gestæ. In the case of Stroud v. Commonwealth, 14 Ky. Law Rep., 179, the court said: "Whatever is said by a party to the occurrence or a co-adjutor in cases of homicide, it is competent to show the character or quality of the act; but the statement of a bystander, who is in no way acting in concert with the parties to the transaction, does not constitute a part of the res gestæ." In the case of Bradshaw v. Commonwealth, 10 Bush, 577, the court said: "The cries or exclamations allowed to be proved did not proceed from either one of the parties engaged in the transaction, nor from any one acting in concert with either of them. They do not constitute a part of the res gestæ. Contemporaneous expressions on exclamations of the assailant or of his coadjutors, or of the deceased in cases of homicide, may be proved for the purpose of illustrating the character or quality of the act. * * * We are aware of no case in which it was held that the cries or exclamations of persons in no way connected with the main fact were admissible as part of the res gestæ." In the case before us, Andrew Patterson was connected with the main facts. It was impossible for the witnesses to tell who fired the shot or caused the pistol to be fired. Patterson was a party to the occurrence, but apparently innocent of any wrongful purpose in his acts. Yet he was a party to it, and an exclamation instantly made by him should have been admitted as a part of the res gestæ.

The appellant complains that the court erred in failing to give an instruction on involuntary manslaughter. This offense is defined by Greenleaf, volume 3, section 123, where one doing an unlawful act, not felonious nor tending to great bodily harm, or doing a lawful act, without proper caution or requisite skill undesignedly kills another. We are of the opinion that under no phase of the proof was appellant guilty of involuntary manslaughter. He was handling a pistol, a deadly weapon, carelessly and recklessly which tended to great bodily harm and even if his act had been lawful, it was without proper caution. The instructions of the court, as given, covered the whole law of the case.

For the refusal of the court to allow the statement of Patterson, which constituted a part of the res gestæ to be introduced as evidence, the case is reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings consistent herewith.

KENTUCKY FREESTONE CO. v. MCGEE.

(Filed May 24, 1904.)

1. Master and servant—Negligence of master—Instructions—In an action by a servant for an injury caused by the alleged negligence of the master in failing to keep a pathway clear of loose stones over one of which appellant stumbled and fell while he was accompanying a car conveying stone from a rock quarry to a nearby railroad, an instruction to the jury that if defendant permitted the pathway to be obstructed by rocks, and that by reason thereof it was dangerous to its employes and that because thereof plaintiff was injured while in the discharge of his duty, that it was liable to the plaintiff for his injury, provided the plaintiff did not know of the obstruction, and that defendant did know it or could have known it by ordinary care, was erroneous for the reason that it imposes on the master the duty to furnish the servant a safe place in which to work.

2. Inherent danger—Duty of master—The inherent nature of certain kinds of employment is such that to engage in it at all is more or less dangerous, and the rule is that the master must furnish his servant a reasonably safe place in which to do his work viewed from the nature of the employment. The master is required to use ordinary care to acquaint himself with the condition of the premises on which he sets his servant to work.

3. Duty of servant—The servant's duty is to merely avoid those dangerous conditions of which he knows, or which are so patent and visible that he, in the course of his work and as a natural incident of it, can not fail to know it except by his own neglect.

4. Application of rule—Applying these principles the court should have submitted to the jury in addition to the question of appellee's knowledge of the usual obstruction, if it was an unusual one, the inquiry, whether it was such an obvious danger as that appellant in the discharge of his service with ordinary care must have seen it and known of it.

C. C. & R. G. Williams and C. D. Robertson for appellant.

W. A. Morrow and B. J. Berthurum for appellee.

Appeal from Rockcastle Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

Appellee, a laborer employed in taking out cars loaded with stone from appellant's quarry to a nearby railway siding, was injured by stumbling or slipping upon a stone in his pathway alongside of the track over which the car was being taken. The dimensions of the stone are not certainly proved, but it may be said to have been between the size of a man's fist and of his hat. It was one of a number of stones scattered along the pathway. Appellee's duty was to accompany the car, which was pulled out by a wire rope drawn by a stationary engine, and was moved at the rate of about fifty feet a minute. Appellee and the other workmen going along to chock the wheels in case the rope should break, so as to prevent the car running back into the quarry. When appellee stumbled over the stone, or fell, he was thrown under the car, and before he could remove his foot from the rails it was crushed by one of the car wheels. He sues to recover for this injury because of the alleged negligence of his master in failing to provide him a safe place in which to do his work, it being alleged that the presence of the stones in his pathway was actionable negligence on the master's behalf.

The instructions submitting the issue of negligence to the jury told them in substance that if the defendant, appellant, permitted the pathway, where appellee's duty required him to be, to become obstructed by rocks, and that by reason thereof it was dangerous to its employees, and that because thereof plaintiff was injured while in the discharge of his duty, that it was liable to the plaintiff for his injury, provided the plaintiff himself did not know of the obstruction, and provided that defendant did know of such dangerous condition, or might have known of it by the exercise of ordinary care. The court also told the jury in the second instruction: "If you believe the track or premises of the defendant, where plaintiff's duty required him to be, were obstructed by rocks, and the plaintiff knew of such obstruction, if any there was, then you will find for the defendant."

The court is of opinion that these instructions fail to properly present the duty of the master in the premises, as well as to state the whole law of the servant's duty to himself.

In the first place, the instruction imposed upon the master the duty to furnish the servant a safe place in which to do his work. Such is not the law. The inherent nature of certain kinds of employment is such that to engage in it at all is more or less dangerous. This danger is one against which the master does not contract, and the possible consequences of which his servant impliedly assumes. It is altogether probable that loose stones of varying size would be scattered about a rock quarry. It is equally certain that their presence creates more or less danger to those walking among them. To the extent that their presence may be reasonably expected and can scarcely be guarded against, is one thing that must have been in contemplation in the contract of employment; but where their presence in unusual quantities or in unusual places increases the ordinary and inherent hazard and danger to laborers in and about the quarry, it is not a risk assumed by the employe. The rule, then, is, that the master must furnish his servant a reasonably safe place in which to do his work, viewed from the nature of the employment. As to the servant's duty to himself, he cannot purposely injure himself and charge the consequences to the master. Therefore, it is written, that if the servant knows of a danger not within the scope of his assumption, and notwithstanding risks its consequences, he alone must suffer. But just here there is a difference between the master's and the servant's duty, for the master must know that the place in which the servant must do his work is a reasonably safe one for that purpose, unless its unsafe condition has happened so recently, that he could not, by the exercise of ordinary care, have learned of it in time to have prevented the injury; while the servant's duty is to merely avoid those dangerous conditions of which he known, or which are so patent and visible, that he, in the course of his work, and as a natural incident of it, can not fail to know

It except by his own neglect. As stated in Mellott v. L. & N. R. R. Co., 101 Ky., 214: "The servant is bound to see for himself such risks and hazards as are patent to observation, and is bound to exercise his own skill and judgment in a measure, and can not blindly rely upon the skill and care of his master."

But this does not involve the question of "equal means of knowledge" invoked by appellant. This doctrine, though having had a place in the decisions of this State for a while, has been frequently ignored, and expressly denied, and in the late case of Pfisterer v. Peter & Co., 25 Ky. Law Rep., 1605, is repudiated, while Bogenschutz v. Smith, 84 Ky., 380, upon which it seems to have been rested, is to that extent overruled in effect, if not in terms. The master is required to do all that ordinary prudence and care requires to acquaint himself with the condition of the premises on which he sets his employe to labor. The servant may rely upon the master's implied assurance of the premises being reasonably safe for the purposes for which they are used without inquiry or examination, unless the defect is one obvious and certain, and which must come to his notice in the regular discharge of his work without having to stop to suspect it or hunt for it.

Applying these principles, the court properly overruled the motion for a peremptory instruction, but it should have submitted to the jury in addition to the question of appellee's knowledge of the unusual obstruction, if it was an unusual one, the inquiry whether it was such an obvious danger as that appellant in the discharge of his service with ordinary care must have seen it and known of it.

For the reasons indicated the judgment is reversed and cause remanded for a new trial under proceedings consistent herewith.

HOWARD v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed April 22, 1904.)

1. Homicide—Selecting jury—Jury wheel—Summoning jury from county—The fact that the court did not require the jurors who tried the case to be drawn from the jury wheel, instead of being summoned from the county at large by the sheriff, if error, is one which this court has no power to revise, as section 281, Criminal Code, provides that "the decisions of the court upon challenges to the panel and for cause, upon motions to set aside an indictment, and upon motions for a new trial shall not be subject to exception."

2. Qualification of juror—Discretion of court—Private examination—Consent of defendant—Discharge of juror—The fact that upon information given to the court by the attorney for the Commonwealth based upon an affidavit filed that one of the eleven persons who had then been accepted by both the Commonwealth and the defendant, but had not been sworn, had formed and expressed an opinion in the case, and that the court with the consent of the attorneys for the Commonwealth and defendant, and without objection by defendant, privately examined said juror, not in the presence of defendant, as to whether he had formed or expressed an opinion, and upon said examination discharged him from the panel, was not an abuse of discretion in the court, although the defendant, at the time, excepted to his discharge.

8. Same—We are unwilling to say that one charged with a felony, as was appellant, with counsel at hand ready and competent to advise him of his rights, may not, in advance of the swearing of the jury, and before he is placed in jeopardy, consent to a private examination by the court of a juror against whom complaint has been made, for the purpose of ascertaining whether he was qualified to retain his place as one of the jury to try the case. Nor do we think it is affirmatively shown by the record, that any injury resulted to the substantial rights of the appellant by the dismissal of this juror, and we are expressly forbidden by section 281 of the Criminal Code, supra, to reverse for this error in the formation of the jury if it was an error.

4. Same—The fact that after the Commonwealth had accepted in open court the full panel of twelve jurors, and after they had been passed to the defendant for acceptance or peremptory challenge, and defendant and his counsel had retired from the court room to pass upon the panel, the court, over appellant's objection, permitted the Commonwealth to excuse one of the panel without cause, is not an error under section 281, Criminal Code, supra, for which this court is authorized to reverse as has been frequently and recently decided by this court in other cases.

5. Notes of evidence before grand jury—Refusal of Commonwealth's attorney to furnish notes—The Commonwealth's attorney having been furnished notes by the foreman of the grand jury of the statements of H. E. Youtsey before the grand jury, it was not error in the court in overruling defendant's motion to require him to furnish such notes to the inspection of the defendant.

6. Accomplice—Witness—Not required to criminate himself—It was not error in the court to refuse to require one who was jointly indicted with appellant for this offense, and had not been tried, to testify as a witness for defendant against his objection where he claimed he could not testify without giving evidence against himself.

7. Recalling witness—It was not error in the court in refusing to allow H. E. Youtsey to be recalled by the defendant after he had him on the witness stand and cross examined for two days, and again recalled and examined by defendant at great length and dismissed, especially as the matter about which he was to be interrogated was for the purpose of laying the foundation to contradict him by his wife, which, in the opinion of the court, if permitted, would have been incompetent.

8. Confidential communications between husband and wife—The court properly refused to allow Mrs. Youtsey to testify as to the contents of a confidential note or letter written to her by her husband in relation to the prosecution, said testimony being incompetent under section 606, Civil Code, which provides that "neither husband nor his wife shall testify, even after the cessation of their marriage, concerning any communication between them during marriage."

9. Evidence—Accomplices—Corroboration—Range—It was not error in the court to allow the testimony of Youtsey, Cecil Jones and Day to go to the jury, relating to acts and declarations of appellant conducing to show his guilt in a conspiracy to take the life of William Goebel in which appellant was an alleged participant and principal, as the principal witness and the only ones who had personal knowledge of appellants' guilt, were his accomplices, whose testimony it was necessary to corroborate and in the nature of the case much of the corroborating testimony was circumstantial and should be allowed to take a wide range.

10. Instructions—The instructions given in the case confirm absolutely to the rule laid down by this court in the second appeal, and are free from error.

† W. M. Smith, J. A. Violet, J. A. Scott and Carlo Little for appellant.

B. G. Williams, R. B. Franklin, L. W. Arnett, W. O. Davis and Robt. L. Stout for appellee.

Appeal from Franklin Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle.

The appellant, James B. Howard, was tried and convicted the third time in the Franklin Circuit Court under an indictment returned in that court against him and others, charging them with the murder of William Goebel, and his punishment fixed by the verdict of the jury and sentence of the court at imprisonment in the penitentiary for life.

His motion for a new trial was overruled by the lower court, and by this appeal he seeks a reversal of the judgment of conviction. There have been two former appeals herein. (Howard v. Commonwealth, 22 Ky. Law Rep., 1845; Howard v. Commonwealth, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 1225.)

As the principal facts connected with the crime for which appellant was convicted were stated and commented on in the opinions of this court on the former appeals, we deem it unnecessary to enter upon a recital of them in this opinion. Suffice it to say that the evidence shows that Hon. William Goebel, on January 30, 1900, in Frankfort, and on the Capitol square, while approaching the main entrance of the State House, was shot and wounded by some one in concealment, of which wound he, in a short time thereafter, died. It has been, and is, the theory of counsel for the Commonwealth that the bullet which deprived him of his life was fired by the appellant, though others are charged and jointly indicted with him as aiders and abettors in the crime.

There were twenty-one grounds for a new trial filed by appellant in the lower court, several of which were relied on by him on the former appeals, and were then held by this court insufficient to authorize a reversal. It will, therefore, be unnecessary for us to again consider such of them as were then determined. Indeed, we feel called upon to discuss and pass upon only such of the grounds for reversal as were urged by counsel for appellant in argument before us, and will consider them in the order in which they were presented.

1st. It is contended that the court erred in the formation of the jury, in that by its order for the summoning of 150 jurors from the county of Woodford, it was not required that they be drawn from the jury wheel or drum of that county, but only that they be summoned from the county at large by the sheriff of Franklin county. In Curtis v. Commonwealth, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 287, it was held that the manner of selecting the jury in that case was error, but as section 231 of the Criminal Code of Practice provides that "the decisions of the court upon challenges to the panel and for cause, upon motions to set aside an indictment, and upon motions for a new trial, shall not be subject to exception," this court is without power to revise such an error. In several cases subsequently decided, the most recent being that of Turner v. Commonwealth, ante, 2161, the rule announced in Curtis v. Commonwealth, supra, was adhered to and approved. We find it unnecessary, therefore, to decide whether or not there was error in the manner of summoning the jury, or in its formation; as a reversal by this court upon that ground, even if such error had been committed, would be unauthorized.

Another alleged error complained of by appellant was the discharge by the trial court of the juror, J. C. Alexander. It appears that he and ten others had been accepted by the parties as jurors, and that but one other was to be selected in order to complete the panel of twelve. The Commonwealth had then exhausted three of its peremptory challenges, and the appellant twelve of his, though neither party had been required to, or had, exercised the right of peremptory challenge, except as there were twelve men in the jury box, who had upon the voir dire been found qualified. At this point it was suggested to the court by the Commonwealth's attorney, out of the hearing of the jury, that had thus been partly made up, that he had just received information to the effect that J. C. Alexander had theretofore formed and expressed an opinion as to the merits of this case, and with respect to the crime charged in the indictment, and had after he was accepted on the jury improperly conversed with a person, not a member of the jury, on a subject connected with the case, notwithstanding the previous admonition of the court not to do so. This communication of the Commonwealth's attorney was immediately followed by a motion from him to discharge Alexander from the jury, in support of which was filed the affidavit of Ben Hackett, who had himself been excused as a juror in the case.

It was stated in the affidavit, in substance, that the affiant and Alexander, after the death of William Goebel, had many conversations and arguments about the killing, in which affiant contended that there had been a conspiracy to murder Goebel among those who were charged with his murder, and Alexander expressed and urged the opinion that there had not been such a conspiracy; that in these conversations both affiant and Alexander manifested much earnest interest and feeling. And further, that after Alexander and some other members of the jury had been accepted, put in charge of the sheriff and admonished by the court, he said to the affiant, after adjournment on the day before the filing of the affidavit, and as the jury were passing out through the courthouse yard, "Hello, Ben, I am glad they cut you off of this jury, as I did not want to serve on this jury with you."

Before passing upon the motion of the Commonwealth's attorney, the court privately examined Alexander, while the latter was in the custody of the sheriff, touching the truth of the charges contained in the affidavit of Hackett, and as the result of such examination discharged him from the jury.

It was stated by counsel for the Commonwealth in the oral argument and by brief in this court, and not denied in the oral argument or brief of counsel for appellant, that the examination of Alexander was conducted privately by the court at the request of counsel for appellant, made in the latter's presence and with his consent. Be that as it may, in ascertaining what transpired in the lower court in this case, we must look to and be governed by the record made therein, and it appears from the record that the privy examination of Alexander was made by consent of the parties, though it further appears that appellant at the time of the discharge of Alexander excepted to such discharge and moved the court to also discharge the ten persons remaining of the jury, which the court refused to do, but proceeded to complete the jury, subject to the right of challenge by either party to the extent of the challenges remaining to them, by selecting from the persons summoned from Woodford county for that purpose the two necessary to complete the panel of twelve.

As to what occurred in the privy examination of Alexander, does not appear in the bill of exceptions, we are unable to know whether he admitted or denied the statements made in the affidavit of Hackett, except that it does appear in the bill of exceptions that he made the admission, presumably before the privy examination, that he said to Hackett after the latter had been excused from the jury, and he had been accepted as a member thereof, "Hello, Ben, I am glad that they cut you off of this jury, as I did not want to serve on this jury with you," but claimed that it was made in a jocular way. It is insisted for the Commonwealth that Alexander's admission as to the above statement warrants the conclusion that what was said in the affidavit of Hackett, as to arguments between Alexander and himself involving the merits of this case, is true, otherwise what reason did Alexander have for not wishing to serve with Hackett on the jury? In this view of the matter it is argued that the action of the lower court, in discharging Alexander from the jury, was not an abuse of discretion.

Upon the other hand, it is insisted for appellant, that it was error for the court to examine Alexander in his absence, and that he could not legally waive his right to be present at such examination. In support of this contention, section 188, Criminal Code, is relied on, which provides: "If the indictment be for a felony, the defendant must be present, and shall remain in actual custody during the trial." * * *

While this court in construing the section, supra, has repeatedly held that one charged with the commission of a felony can not be tried during his absence from the court room, we find that cases have arisen in which it has been deemed necessary to relax that rule. Thus in Hite v. Commonwealth, 14 Ky. Law Rep., 308, it was held that the occasional absence from the court room of the accused, on account of temporary illness for a few minutes at a time, the trial continuing in his absence, did not prejudice the substantial rights of the accused. In Meece v. Commonwealth, 78 Ky., 586, it appeared that after the submission of the case to the jury and their retirement to the jury room, they returned into court and asked for further instructions.

The court declined to give any, but in the presence of counsel for the prisoner inserted by interlineation certain words in one of the instructions. The accused was absent at the time, and it was urged in his behalf that for this reason the judgment should have been reversed. This court, however, held otherwise, in doing which it said: "While we recognize the fact that the accused when on trial for a criminal offense should be present during the entire trial, and that no evidence should be heard or instructions given or amended without his presence either before or after the submission of the cause to the jury, still this court is only authorized to reverse in cases where the substantial rights of the accused have been prejudiced in the court below, and in order to ascertain whether errors have been committed to the prejudice of the accused, the facts as well as the law of the case should be considered. While one charged with a criminal offense has the constitutional right to be tried by a jury, the right of appeal from the verdict and judgment against him does not exist, except by the legislation of the State on the subject, and when permitting an appeal the law-making power has the right to determine for what cause a reversal may be had." * * *

It has also been held by this court that a trial for felony begins when the jury is sworn. (Willis v. Commonwealth, 86 Ky., 68.) At the time the examination of Alexander took place and when he was discharged, the jury had not only not been sworn, but it had not been completed. There are many rights, some of them guaranteed by the Constitution, which one charged with crime may not waive, and should not be permitted by the courts to waive. Such as the right of trial by jury, the right to be heard by himself and counsel, to demand the nature and cause of the accusation against him, and yet others, the assertion of which may unexpectedly become necessary for his protection during the progress of the trial. But we are unwilling to say that one charged with felony, and being in court as was the appellant, with counsel at hand ready and competent to advise him of his rights, may not, in advance of the swearing of the jury, and before he is placed in jeopardy, consent to a private examination by the court of a juror against whom complaint had been made, for the purpose of ascertaining whether he was qualified to retain his place as one of the jury to try the case. Nor do we think it is affirmatively shown by the record in this case that any injury resulted to the substantial rights of the appellant by Alexander's dismissal from the jury.

It is, however, beyond our province to reverse this case for error, if there were any, in excluding Alexander from the jury. Our right to do so is expressly forbidden by section 281 of the Criminal Code, and we have already referred to Curtis v. Commonwealth, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 267, and Turner v. Commonwealth (ante, 2:61), to indicate this court's construction of that section. In addition to those cases, a further recent authoritative utterance of this court to the same effect will be found in Alderson v. Commonwealth, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 32, in which one of the grounds for reversal, as set forth in the record, was that the appellant over his objection at the time, was forced by the trial court to accept as jurymen persons alleged to have formed an opinion as to his guilt or innocence.

Another alleged error was that after the Commonwealth had accepted in open court the full panel of twelve jurymen, and after they had been passed to the appellant for acceptance or peremptory challenge, and he and his counsel had retired from the courthouse to pass upon the panel, the court over appellant's objection, permitted the Commonwealth to object to and excuse one of the jurymen without cause, though the whole twelve had been accepted by it. Whereupon appellant, as was done in the case at bar, moved the court to dismiss the entire jury, which motion was overruled.

In passing on the questions thus presented, this court, after quoting section 281 of the Criminal Code, supra, said: "In construing this section we have uniformly held that errors in the manner in which the jury were selected, or that a juror lacked the statutory qualifications, shall not be considered on appeal."

Whatever may be the rule in other States, this question has been settled in Kentucky as herein indicated, and the authorities cited are the latest that have emanated from this court. Another complaint of the appellant is the refusal of the lower court to require the Commonwealth's attorney to permit him to examine an alleged original statement called the confession of H. E.

Youtsey, and the notes of the evidence given by him before the grand jury. The motion of appellant for those papers was based upon his affidavit. A response to the motion was filed by the Commonwealth's attorney in which it was denied that he had, or knew anything of the alleged confession, but that he did have notes of Youtsey's testimony before the grand jury, which he refused to surrender.

The court ruled correctly in refusing to require the surrender by the Commonwealth's attorney of the notes of Youtsey's testimony given before the grand jury, as was decided by this court in Franklin v. Commonwealth, 20 Ky. Law Rep., 1137, in the opinion of which it is said: "It appears from the record that the grand jury reduced to writing the testimony of the witnesses before it and furnished to the Commonwealth's attorney the evidence so taken. * * * It was the duty of the foreman of the grand jury, also under the statute, to communicate to the attorney for the Commonwealth when requested, the substance of the testimony before them. But we do not think the court below should, in the exercise of sound discretion, have required the Commonwealth's attorney to communicate to the defendant the evidence so reported to him by the foreman of the grand jury."

Appellant also complains that the court refused to compel Green Golden to give certain testimony demanded of him. It appears from the record that Golden was jointly indicted with appellant and others for the murder of William Goebel, and that the prosecution therefor is still pending against them. Golden was introduced by appellant, and after certain preliminary questions, without objection from the Commonwealth, or suggestion from the court, he announced that he had been indicted in this case, but had not been tried, and claimed his privilege, and he was not required to testify, upon the ground that he could not do so without giving evidence against himself.

In Roberson's Criminal Law, volume 2, section 980, it is said: "It is a rule that no person is bound to answer any question, if the answer thereto would in the opinion of the trial judge, have a tendency to subject the witness, or the wife or husband of the witness, to any punishment, penalty or forfeiture. And the witness may claim the protection at any stage of the inquiry, whether he has already answered the question in part or not at all. If the fact to which he is interrogated forms but one link in the chain of evidence which is to connect him, he is still protected. The privilege is one personal to the witness and to be exercised by him alone, and counsel will not be allowed to make the objection. Nor can the witness be made to explain how he might be criminated by the answer, as this would strip him of the privilege which the laws allows him. But it is not enough for the witness to say that the answer will criminate him. He is not the sole judge of the fact. It is for the court to determine from all the circumstances whether there is really reasonable ground to apprehend danger to him from his being compelled to answer." (Burdett v. Commonwealth, 98 Ky., 79; 1 Greenleaf, section 451.)

Chief Justice Marshall, in the trial of Aaron Burr, said: "If the question be of such description that an answer to it may not incriminate a witness, according to the purport of the answer, it must rest with himself, who alone can tell what it would be to answer the question or not." (Burr's Trial, 224.)

From these authorities, the statements of Golden, and his reasons for not testifying, it is manifest that he was entitled to avail himself of the privilege allowed by law, and the court properly excused him from testifying.

It is insisted for appellant, that it was error for the trial court to refuse him permission to recall and further cross-examine H. E. Youtsey. It will be found that the direct examination of Youtsey comprises ten pages of volume 8 of the bill of evidence, and the first cross-examination 180 pages of that volume. On the first cross-examination he appears to have been on the stand about two days, at the end of which, viz., April 17, the cross examination was suspended, and appellant given until April 20 to prepare for his further cross examination. On April 21 he was again cross-examined at great length and finally dismissed. On April 28 appellant asked to be allowed to recall and still further cross examine Youtsey, for the purpose of laying the foundation to contradict him by his wife.

As will be presently shown, the expected contradiction would, if permitted, have been incompetent, but aside from this consideration after such a long and exhaustive cross-examination as was given the witness, covering, as it would seem, every possible aspect of the case and the witness' relation thereto, we are unwilling to say that it was an abuse of discretion for the court, under the circumstances, to refuse to permit him to be recalled the third time for still further cross-examination.

We are of opinion that the court properly excluded the testimony of Mrs. Youtsey, wife of H. E. Youtsey. Section 606, Civil Code of Practice, provides: "Neither a husband nor his wife shall testify, even after the cessation of their marriage, concerning any communication between them during marriage. Nor shall either of them testify against the other. Nor shall either of them testify for the other, except in an action for lost baggage, etc." * * *

In Commonwealth v. Sapp, 90 Ky., 585, it was said by this court: "If the proposed testimony violates married confidence in the slightest degree, or tends however slight to impair the rule for its protection, the highest considerations forbid its introduction."

It will be found that the authorities are uniform in holding that this rule applies, whether such proposed testimony is sought to be introduced in a case where the husband or wife is party, or only others are concerned.

In Scott v. Commonwealth, 94 Ky., 511, in an able discussion of this doctrine by Judge Lewis, it was held that a letter to the wife from the husband in relation to a crime with which he was charged, could not be used in evidence by the Commonwealth, and the case was reversed because of its introduction as evidence therein. Applying that rule in this case, the note or letter proposed to be identified by Mrs. Youtsey, as well as any other testimony that she might have given in regard thereto, was clearly incompetent, because the same came to her from the husband by reason of the privacy and confidence of the marital relation, and the use of it to contradict him would have been as fully within the reason, and as much against the policy of the law, as would any other confidential disclosure that he may have made to her. And the same rule that forbade her testifying in this case, would have excluded as incompetent, any statement from him made to her on the same subject.

Objection is made that the trial court refused to exclude certain testimony of H. E. Youtsey and Frank Cecil, and also the testimony of Jones and Day. We find that such of the testimony of Youtsey as appears to be incompetent was rejected and stricken out by the court. We think all the testimony of the four witnesses named, as it is shown by the bill of evidence to have been admitted by the court, was competent. It related to acts and declarations of the appellant, conducing to establish his guilt, as well as a conspiracy to take the life of William Goebel, in which he was an alleged participant and the principal. The testimony in question is of the nature, and similar in character, to much of the evidence held by this court on the former appeals in this case, and in the several appeals of Caleb Powers, to be competent.

It is to be borne in mind that the principal witnesses against appellant, and the only ones who claimed to have personal knowledge of his guilt, were his accomplices, whose testimony it was necessary to corroborate as required by section 241, Criminal Code. In the very nature of the case much of the corroborating testimony was necessarily circumstantial, and where, as in a case like this, such testimony must be relied upon, the evidence should be allowed to take as wide a range as would consist with justice, and the well recognized rules obtaining with reference to the admission of such evidence. We are of opinion, therefore, that while some of the evidence complained of, notably that of Jones and Day, is somewhat remote and even fragmentary, yet inasmuch as practically the same statements, which they claim to have overheard as coming from appellant, were testified to by the witness, Stubblefield, as having been made to him by appellant in a conversation about the same time in regard to the death of William Goebel, in which conversation, as stated by Stubblefield, appellant admitted that he had fired the shot which killed Goebel, we think the lower court did not err in permitting the testimony of Jones and Day to go to the jury.

Appellant also complains of the instructions. But we find that the instructions conform absolutely to the rule laid down by this court on the second appeal, and are, besides, free from error.

A careful examination of the record having failed to disclose any error prejudicial to the substantial rights of the appellant, the judgment is affirmed.

Whole court sitting.

Chief Justice Burnam and Judge O'Rear dissent.

Judge O'Rear delivered the following dissenting opinion:

I am unable to agree with the four members of the court who hold that the presence of the accused in a felony trial can be dispensed with, even by his consent, during the empanelling of the jury, or at any other stage of the trial. (Bill of Rights, Constitution, section 11; Criminal Code, section 188; Meece v. Commonwealth, 78 Ky., 5-6; Rutherford v. Commonwealth, 78 Ky., 642; Temple v. Commonwealth, 14 Bush, 789; Allen v. Commonwealth, 88 Ky., 642; Hopt v. People of Utah, 10 U. S., 574.)

Nor can I agree that the evidence by Jones and Day of fragmentary conversation alleged to have occurred in Laurel county, between appellant and some other person, when it is conceded that the portions detailed are incomplete and disconnected from what went before or followed, is relevant as admissions by the accused. (Berry v. Commonwealth, 10 Bush, 16; Terrell v. Commonwealth, 18 Bush, 246.)

I concur with the majority of the court that the rejection of the communication between Youtsey and his wife was proper.

PAYNTER v. MILLER.

(Filed April 26, 1904.)

Ferry right—Death of owner—Sale by administrator—Non-resident purchaser—Delay in transfer to resident—Upon the death of the owner of a ferry right for a term of years in this State, his administrator with the consent of the county court, sold the residue of his term to a resident of the State of Ohio, who subsequently transferred said right with the approval of said court, to a resident corporation of this State. Held—That the fact that said transfer was not made by the nonresident purchaser within a year from the date of his purchase, as required by section 1808, subsection 3, Kentucky Statutes, did not, per se, avoid the lease. And it is too late after the lease to the Kentucky corporation was made, with the approval of the county court, to raise this question.

H. D. Paynter for appellant.

B. F. Bennett and Harry Miller for appellee.

Appeal from Greenup Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

The appellants, George B. Paynter and James Fullerton, petitioned the Greenup County Court at its August term, 1903, to establish a ferry from Fullerton, Ky., across the Ohio River to Portsmouth, and to grant them the privilege of operating the ferry in accordance with the provisions of chapter 49 of the Kentucky Statutes. They allege in their petition in substance that they had complied with all the preliminary provisions required by the statute, that a steam ferry was being operated between these two points by one Isaac Miller, a nonresident of Kentucky, who had purchased the privilege of doing so from the administratrix of George Winn, to whom the privilege of operating a ferry between Fullerton, Ky., and Portsmouth, O., had been granted on the 5th of December, 1892, at a regular term of the Greenup county court; that on the 6th day of December, 1897, George D. Winn had renewed his covenant with the Commonwealth of Kentucky for the ferry privilege as required by law; that some time prior to March, 1903, George D. Winn died, and that his wife, as his administratrix, had sold the ferry privilege previously granted to her husband to Isaac Miller, of Portsmouth, O., who had also acquired the ferry landing on both the Kentucky and Ohio shores by purchase; that at a special term of the Greenup county court, held on the 15th of March, 1902, an order was entered by the court ratifying the previous sale and transfer of the ferry boat and ferry right, and at the same time a re-grant was made to Miller of the ferry privilege for a term of twenty years from that date; and that he executed a bond therefor, as required by law, and an order was entered fixing the tolls; that prior to the 21st day of July, 1903, Miller sold and transferred the privilege which had been granted to him to the Fullerton and Portsmouth Ferry Co., a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Kentucky, with the consent of the administratrix of the estate of Geo. Winn and B. F. Bennett, who held purchase money liens on the ferry property; and that on that day the Greenup County Court ratified the sale of the ferry privilege and renewed the grant to the ferry company for a term of twenty years; and that the company had executed bond, as required by law, for the faithful performance of their duties thereunder. Petitioners allege that both the grants to Miller and the ferry company were void because made at a special term of the county court and without the notice required by section 1804 of the Kentucky Statutes. They also allege that Miller had forfeited all right to operate the ferry before his sale and transfer to the ferry company, for the reason that more than one year had elapsed after his purchase from the administratrix of Winn before his transfer to the ferry company, as required by subsection 3 of section 1801 of the Kentucky Statutes. The appellee, Isaac Miller, filed a demurrer to appellants application, which was sustained, and their application dismissed. They thereupon appealed to the Greenup Circuit Court, and appellee again demurred to their petition, which was sustained, and the petition dismissed. Plaintiffs in the application now appeal to this court.

Chapter 49 of the Kentucky Statutes provides that "the several county courts shall have jurisdiction to establish ferries and grant ferry privileges upon any river or stream in or adjoining their respective counties for not exceeding twenty years; that the ferry shall be established at the instance and for the benefit of the owner of the land on which it is located, or some one who has bought from the owner the privilege of using the same for that purpose; that no application to establish a ferry shall be heard unless notice of the application shall have been posted at the courthouse door of the county on the first day of the term of the court next preceding that at which the application is made."

Subsection 8 of section 1808 provides that: "When sale is made of a ferry right, or lease thereof, it must be with leave of the court, and the purchaser or lessee must execute covenant, with sufficient surety, in lieu of former covenant. * * * If the estate be for a term of years, the personal representative must, within one year after administration, sell the right with the assent of the court, and the purchaser give such new covenant. A nonresident owner of a ferry right shall sell the same to a resident citizen of this State, within a year after his removal or the accrual of his right, with leave of court, and the purchaser give such new covenant. Upon failure to comply with any requisition of this subsection, the court shall revoke the grant, the party having been first summoned, or, if a nonresident, warned by an order posted at the courthouse door, on a court day of a previous term, and by publication in some newspaper printed in the county, if any such there be."

Under these provisions of the statute, the administratrix of George D. Winn had the right with the consent of the Greenup County Court to sell the residue of his term as ferryman; and whilst it was incumbent upon her nonresident purchaser to transfer the right acquired by him to a resident of this State within a year after his acquisition thereof, the failure to do so did not, per se, avoid the lease, as it was voidable only at the instance of the lessor, or the State or county authorities in a direct proceeding instituted for that purpose. And it was too late after the lease to a Kentucky corporation with the consent and approval of the county to raise this question (Owens v. Roberts, 69 Ky., 608.) Section 1058 of the Kentucky Statutes provides that: "Special terms of the county court may be held at any time for the transaction of any business except the probating of a will or granting a tavern, liquor or druggists license."

It is unnecessary in the determination of the rights of appellant in this case that we should decide whether the notice required by section 1804, as a condition precedent to the establishment of a ferry, also applies to an application for the renewal of a grant to operate a ferry, which has already been established. The court properly sustained a demurrer to appellant's original and amended petitions.

Judgment affirmed.

GRAHAM'S HEIRS, &c. v. KITCHEN, &c.

(Filed April 26, 1904.)

1. Lands—Special legislation—Jurisdiction—Judicial sales—On February 20, 1885, a special act of the Kentucky Legislature was passed conferring jurisdiction upon the Greenup Circuit Court, upon the filing of a bill in chancery therein by the heirs of John and George Graham, adult and infant, for the appointment of a commissioner to examine into the condition of the lands and the titles and their value, owned by said John and George Graham (consisting of many thousand acres in this State), and upon the report of said commissioner to decree a sale thereof, either public or private, and on such terms and credits as the court deemed best for the interest of the parties, and to authorize the commissioner to convey the title to the purchaser for and on behalf of such heirs. Held—That under said act jurisdiction was conferred on the Greenup Circuit Court to sell all the lands owned by John and George Graham in this State, and to convey to the purchaser such title as the heirs had.

2. Pending action—Amended petition—New parties—Adverse title—A suit was brought by said heirs in said Greenup Circuit Court in 1885, under the provisions of said act and kept on the docket continuously up to June 30, 1899, when an amended petition was filed, making appellees herein parties defendants, and alleging that since filing their original petition, appellees have entered upon certain portions of said lands wrongfully and without title, and had inclosed and were claiming same adversely to plaintiffs, which lands so in dispute were situated in Carter county, which was formed in 1835, and in which appellees reside and were summoned. Held—That the Greenup Circuit Court has no jurisdiction, by virtue of said special act, over lands lying in Carter county, or to try questions of title of persons holding and claiming lands adversely to plaintiffs.

3. Pendente lite—Strangers—The fact that appellees were charged with having entered upon these lands pendente lite, can have no application in this case, as such a plea applies where a stranger enters under some person who is a party to the suit, and not to one holding adversely to the plaintiffs.

4. Contempt of court—Nor can the jurisdiction of the Greenup Circuit Court be upheld on the ground that appellees are in contempt in interfering with the subject-matter of a suit pending in the court, said court not being in the possession of the land by its receiver or otherwise. If appellees owned or had bought the land from one claiming to be the owner, and not a party or privy to that suit, they had the right to enter upon it, although it was in litigation between others, so long as there was not a breach of the court's possession.

Bennett & Bybee for appellants.

R. B. Davis for appellees.

Appeal from Greenup Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

Richard Graham was the patentee under the Commonwealth of Virginia of several large tracts of land located now in Carter, Greenup and other counties in this State. Richard Graham died prior to 1835. His heirs are alleged to have been John and George Graham, who also were dead prior to February 20, 1885, on which date there was approved by the governor of this Commonwealth a special act of the general assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, for the benefit of the heirs of John and George Graham, procured to be passed at the instance of certain petitioners claiming to be such heirs. As the act mentioned is the basis of this suit, it is copied in full herein, and is as follows:

"An Act for the Benefit of George and John Graham.

"Section 1. Be it enacted by the general assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, that it shall be lawful for the adult heirs of George and John Graham, in person, or by attorney, and for the infant heirs of the said George and John Graham, by their guardian or their next friend, to file a petition in the court of a bill of chancery in the Greenup Circuit Court setting out what lands they hold from their ancestors in the State of Kentucky, and the situation of the land, and the condition of the title, and it shall be the duty of the court to appoint a commissioner to examine into the condition of the lands, and the titles and their value, and it shall be lawful for the Greenup Circuit Court, if it shall appear to be to the interest of the said heirs, to have said land sold, to decree a sale and appoint a commissioner to make either a public or private sale, on such terms and credits as said court may think most to the interest of the parties, and said court shall distribute the proceeds among said heirs on equitable principles from time to time, and cause the shares of the infants to be placed at interest or paid to their guardian on satisfactory security being given, and the court shall, after confirming any sale or sales, made by the commissioner, cause the land so sold, to be conveyed on the payment of the purchase money, or a lien to be retained in the conveyance for the purchase money. Any conveyance made by the commissioner of the land under its order shall be effectual to pass the estate of said heirs."

The purpose and scope of the words of this act are now in dispute.

Without setting forth the respective contentions of the parties, we hold that the purpose of the act, as gathered from its context, was to confer a jurisdiction upon the circuit court of Greenup county that it did not then have, to wit, to enable that court to sell all the lands owned in this State by the heirs of John and George Graham, and to convey to the purchasers such title as the heirs had. This was to be done by means of a commissioner to be appointed by that court, who was by the terms of the act, "to.

examine into the condition of the lands and the titles and their value," and to make sale thereof either publicly or privately as that court might decree. It was not claimed that the lands could not have been divided without disadvantage to their value among the heirs. The contrary would appear to be true, each tract comprising several thousand, and in one instance, more than one hundred thousand acres. Courts of chancery then had not the inherent jurisdiction to sell infants' real estate merely because it may have been advantageous to the infant to do so (Vowles' Heirs v. Buckman, 6 Dana, 466; Henning v. Harrison, 13 Bush, 720; Walker v. Smyser, 80 Ky., 620; Meddis v. Bull, 13 Ky. Law Rep., 767; Elliott v. Fowler, Guardian, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 1676), nor of adults, for that matter. Their jurisdiction was statutory, and different in material particulars from that conferred by the act. It was to enable a speedy, inexpensive, transfer of these titles in bulk that the heirs desired, converting them into money for distribution among the parties in interest, and it was to effect that that the act was passed. It was nowhere intimated in the act that the question of title or right of possession as between the heirs of the Grahams and any adverse claimants were to be, or could be, adjudicated in the proceeding authorized by the act. Some of the lands were described as lying on Red river, then in Fayette county; others on the Big Sandy, then probably in Lawrence. The court judicially knows the great distance and the hardships and delays in travel between these respective counties at that time. We can not indulge the presumption that the legislature intended conferring jurisdiction upon the Greenup Court to try titles to land lying in other remote counties, when the claimants or possessors were entitled to trials by a jury of the county where the land lay, if the action was in the nature of ejectment or trespass. The state of the general law, and the conditions then existing and above referred to, repel such presumption. Nor does the language of the act admit of it.

But if we were in doubt on the last point, the matter is made perfectly plain by the interpretation put upon the act by its beneficiaries who had procured its passage. As early as the 7th day of April, 1835, they filed a petition in chancery in the Greenup Circuit Court, setting forth their names and relation to John and George Graham, deceased, and setting out in general terms that they jointly and in coparcenary owned the title to certain tracts of land in the counties mentioned above as heirs at law of said Grahams, and reciting that: "During the late session of the legislature of Kentucky they laid before that honorable body a petition praying for the passage of a special act empowering a commissioner to sell all the lands lying in the State of Kentucky to which they had a joint title; that body not deeming it consistent with their legislative duties to pass the act as desired by your petitioners, yet deeming their case worthy of further consideration, did pass an act for their benefit, authorizing certain proceedings in your honorable court to effect the desired sale. * * * In pursuance of the provisions of said act, your petitioners will proceed to set forth their title to a part of the lands they own in the State of Kentucky. Their limited information will not permit them at this time to set forth their title to all the lands to which they believe themselves entitled. They, therefore, hope that if further investigation shall discover to them other lands to which they may have a valid claim, that they may be permitted to amend this their petition, and that such lands, as well as those hereinafter named, may, under the orders of this honorable court, be subjected to sale."

The prayer of the petition was as follows: "Your petitioners, therefore, pray that their title to all of the lands above mentioned may be inquired into by a commissioner appointed in pursuance of the act of assembly aforesaid, and that their title thereto may be sold by a commissioner appointed by the further order of this court. They pray for such other and further relief as the nature of the case requires, and equity and the special act under which this proceeding is had will justify, and as in duty bound they will ever pray, etc."

The petitioners were nonresidents of this State, and some of them were infants who appeared by their guardians and next friends. The action was styled and has continued upon the docket as "John and George Graham's Heirs on Petition." There were no defendants or adverse parties. The Greenup Circuit Court then also took the same view of the powers conferred upon it by the act, and of the nature of the proceeding, as indicated above. The first decree entered in the action was on the 8th day of July, 1835. It was as follows: "The commissioner appointed herein at the last term of this court having reported and the court having considered thereof, is of opinion that the interest of the petitioners would be advanced by a decree empowering them to sell their lands, in the report aforesaid mentioned. It is now, therefore, by virtue of the special act of assembly in the petition referred to, decreed and ordered that William R. Beatty be appointed a commissioner, and he is hereby fully authorized and empowered to sell all the right, title and interest of the petitioners, the heirs of John and George Graham, deceased, of, in and to the 138,320 acres, the 80,406 $\frac{1}{4}$ acres and the 18,447 acres in the report aforesaid mentioned. Said commissioner is authorized to sell said lands at private sale in such lots or parcels as to him shall seem most advantageous to the petitioners, and upon such terms and credits as he shall deem prudent, making report of all such sales to this court; it being the true intents hereof that no sale shall be obligatory upon the petitioners till approved by this court and the petition is continued till next term."

The lands were not in the actual possession of the petitioners. The original petition on this point says: "Your petitioners would further represent that all the lands above described are very hilly and broken and of but little value; that it is only occasionally you meet with a small spot fit for cultivation; that they are now wholly unproductive; that they can never derive any profit from them except by selling them."

There is no order directing the court's commissioner to take possession of the lands. Nor does it appear that such an order would have been necessary or proper in such proceeding. In 1859 the court directed the commissioner to "ascertain and report the quantity of land unsold, its situation and probable value, and whether the same or any part thereof is adversely held by others."

The last commissioner's report filed in the case shows not only that none of the unsold land was in the possession of the commissioner, or any party to the suit, but expressly stated that part of it was in the actual adverse possession of appellees, and part of it was "wild, unenclosed land."

The case has been upon the docket of the Greenup Circuit Court almost continuously since 1885, except that for a period prior to November, 1895, it was not on the docket, but was then by order of court redocketed, not on motion of any of the parties to it, it is true, but upon the motion of the executor of a former commissioner in the case. Whether the case had been stricken from the docket by a judgment of the court does not appear, and if it had, whether its being redocketed in the manner stated could give the court jurisdiction of it again, we refrain from deciding, in view of our conclusion upon more material points. On June 30, 1899, an amended petition was filed setting out that appellees had, since the filing of the original petition in 1835, entered upon certain of the lands, and had enclosed and were claiming same adversely to the petitioners. It was sought thereby to have their right of possession tried in that action, and as a final relief to have a writ of possession award the petitioners against appellees. It was alleged that appellees had entered wrongfully and without title.

In 1888 Carter county was formed in part from the territory of Greenup, and embraced in its boundary the particular land now in dispute.

Appellants urge that the Greenup Circuit Court having obtained jurisdiction to sell and convey the land under the act of 1835, and by virtue of the filing of the petition thereunder, it continued to hold that jurisdiction for every purpose necessary to carry the case to final judgment, notwithstanding the act creating Carter county had cut off this land into the latter county. This we grant. But we do not agree with appellants as to the purpose of the original suit, nor as to the scope of the act of 1835.

It is not doubted that the legislature might have conferred upon the Greenup court the jurisdiction to try the title to lands situated anywhere in the Commonwealth. But it has not done it. A jurisdiction to sell property, and a jurisdiction to try and adjudge the title to the same property are distinct matters. Under the present laws, the circuit court of the county where a decedent's personal representative qualified, has the exclusive jurisdiction of a suit for the settlement and partition of his estate, and to that end may sell the property left by the decedent, whether real or personal, and wherever situated in this State. (Sections 428, et seq., Civil Code, and section 66, same.) But this court had expressly held that such jurisdiction does not include the right to try questions of title to such property as between the personal or real representatives of the deceased owner upon the one hand, and an adverse party upon the other (Citizens' National Bank v. Boswell's Adm'r, 93 Ky., 92.) particularly when the court would otherwise not have jurisdiction of the parties or subject-matter. In a suit to partition lands among heirs which must be brought in the county where the personal representative of the deceased ancestor qualified (section 66, Civil Code), or in an action under sections 489-491, Civil Code, to sell lands indivisible without materially impairing their value, or for the maintenance of an infant owner, or for re investment for owners under certain disabilities, such jurisdiction does not include the right to bring into those actions adverse claimants to the property and to try the title and right of possession. (McIntire v. McIntire, 83 Ky., 502; Bacon v. Boyd, 17 Ky. Law Rep., 1876.) Jurisdiction is vested exclusively in the circuit courts of the counties where the land or some part of it lies, of suits involving its title. (Section 62, Civil Code.) The Greenup Circuit Court's jurisdiction was limited by the terms of the act of 1835 to selling and conveying such title to the lands named as John and George Graham's heirs may have had. Jurisdiction to try disputes as to their title between Graham's heirs and other persons was not touched upon by the act, and consequently is not affected by it.

It is thought, though, that there is something in the doctrine that an entry by a stranger to the suit, pendente lite, affects him by the judgment as if he were a party to the record, as controlling the case before us. This doctrine can have no application here. It applies only when the stranger enters under some person who is a party to the suit. In that event he is bound by the record and decree by privity of his relation to him from whom he took title. He is bound in law to take notice of the records affecting his vendor's title, but he is not bound to take notice of, nor is he bound by, a suit over the property between strangers to his chain of title and right of entry. (Herman Res Adjudicata and Estoppel, 205, 211, 212; Morton v. Long, 3 A. K. Mar., 414; Henderson v. Pickett's Heirs, 4 T. B. Monroe, 58; Stone v. Connelly, 1 Met., 652; McIntire v. McIntire, supra.)

Nor can the jurisdiction of the Greenup Court be upheld on the ground that appellees are in contempt in interfering with the subject-matter of a suit pending in the court. The Greenup Court was not in the possession of this land, by its receiver, or otherwise. If appellees owned it, or had bought from one claiming to be the owner and not a party or privy to that suit, they had the right to enter upon it, although it was in litigation between others, so long as there was not a breach of the court's possession. (Metcalf v. Commonwealth Land and Lumber Co., Receiver, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 597.) There was no element of contempt shown by the record. Nor is that proceeding an appropriate one to try a disputed title. Jurisdiction can not be obtained under guise of the writ for that purpose. In such case it is confined solely to the trial of whether the court's receiver has been ousted of possession taken under order of court, in an action of which it had jurisdiction.

The judgment of the circuit court dismissing the amended petition because it had not jurisdiction of the suit against appellee, is affirmed.

COMMONWEALTH v. ROSENFELD BROS. & CO.

(Filed May 31, 1904.)

1. Taxation—Whisky in bond—Interest on taxes—Under Kentucky Statutes, sections 4109, 4110, 4111 and 4112, regulating the payment of taxes on distilled liquors in bonded warehouses, wherever in either of said sections the payment of taxes is mentioned, it is also provided therein that the payment of interest shall be made, and we do not know how the legislature could have made it plainer than by the language used in these sections, that State taxes on whisky in bond should bear interest.

2. "As other taxes"—Meaning thereof—What was meant by the words "as other taxes," originally used in section 4110 prior to the change made in said section in 1902, was, merely to fix the time at which the interest theretofore provided for, commenced to run and the rate thereof; that is, that interest on taxes on spirits in bond should commence to run on the 1st day of December in the year following the assessment, and should be at the rate of 6 per cent.

3. Rule of construction—Intention of legislature—The cardinal rule of statutory construction is, that the intention of the legislature shall be effectuated; and we find no difficulty in reaching the conclusion that the legislature manifestly intended that distilled spirits, in bond, should be assessed each year as other taxes, and although not required to be paid until the bonded period is at an end, yet for this privilege of retaining the State's money, the warehouseman should pay interest thereon. This conclusion is reached without reference to the language "as other taxes."

4. Estoppel—Laches—The fact that the auditor has received the principal sum of the taxes without the interest, and that the warehouseman, who was the custodian and not the owner of the whisky, permitted the owner to carry it away, and thus lost his lien through the wrongful act of the State's fiscal officer, does not estop the State from claiming and collecting interest on the taxes; and it is elementary that the State is not estopped by the laches of its officers.

5. Limitation—The rule has been established in this State that actions such as these, are barred by the expiration of five years after the cause of action accrued.

Appeal from Franklin Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

The appellees, Rosenfeld Bros. & Co., are the owners and proprietors of a distillery bonded warehouse in this State, wherein was stored, during the fiscal years from 1898 to 1903, inclusive, distilled spirits; and this is a proceeding on the part of the Commonwealth, by the auditor's agent, to collect interest alleged to be due on the taxes assessed for State and county purposes during the bonded period. Without entering into a detailed statement of the pleadings, we can materially abbreviate the opinion by a simple statement of the issues, which are adequately presented in the record.

No question is raised as to the regularity of the assessment of the distilled spirits, or of the payment by appellees of the principal of the taxes due thereon at the proper time; the questions presented are, first, whether or not the taxes due from appellees to the Commonwealth do, or do not bear interest under the statute regulating the taxation of distilled spirits; second, if so, is or not, the Commonwealth estopped from now collecting the interest by reason of the fact that the auditor received the principal sum of the taxes from appellees without interest; and, third, whether the five years' statute of limitation applies to the claim of the Commonwealth under this proceeding.

The law regulating the subject in hand is contained in article 5, chapter 108, Kentucky Statutes, section 4105 to 4114, inclusive. The following sections, relating to the payment of the taxes, are peculiarly applicable to the subject under discussion:

"Section 4103. Any person or corporation having the custody of such spirits of the 15th day of September in the year the assessment is made, shall be liable for all taxes due thereon, together with all interest and penalties which may accrue; and any warehouseman or custodian of such spirits, who shall pay the taxes, interest or penalties on such spirits, shall have a lien thereon for the amount so paid, with legal interest from day of payment.

"Section 4110. Taxes on distilled spirits which may be assessed while in a bonded warehouse, and on which the United States Government tax has not been paid, or will not become due before the 1st day of March after the assessment, shall be due on the 2d day of January, May and September next after the said government tax becomes due or be paid, or when the spirits are removed from the warehouse; and the taxes on each year's assessment shall bear legal interest until paid.

"Section 4111. Every owner or proprietor of a bonded warehouse in which distilled spirits may be stored, as contemplated in the preceding section, shall, on the 1st day of January, May and September next after said government tax shall have been paid, become due, or be removed from the warehouse, make and transmit the auditor of public accounts, and the clerk of the county court in which the spirits may have been at the time of the assessment, a statement, sworn to by the person whose duty it is to make the report, showing the quantity of spirits on which the government tax has been paid or has become due, and what spirits have been removed from the warehouse during the preceding four months; the years in which such spirits were assessed for taxation, and the county, city, town or taxing district in which the warehouse is situated in which the spirits were stored at the time of the assessment, and shall, at the same time, pay all taxes and interest on such spirits due the State, county, taxing district, city, or town to the officers entitled to receive the same.

"Section 4112. On the failure of any owner or proprietor of any such warehouse to pay the taxes and interest within five days after the same becomes due, he shall be deemed delinquent, and a penalty of 8 per cent. on each year's taxes due on the spirits shall attach, and the officer authorized to collect such taxes shall at once cause such proceeding to be instituted for the collection of such taxes, with such interest and penalties as may be provided by law for the collection of other delinquent taxes."

These sections are, substantially, the law as enacted in 1892, except that the following language with which section 4110 closes, "and the taxes on each year's assessment shall bear legal interest until paid," was originally as follows, "and the taxes on each year's assessment shall bear interest as other taxes;" the change having been made in 1902.

The first question for adjudication is, whether or not, under the law as existing from 1892 to 1902, the taxes in question bore interest. It will be observed, that, in each of the foregoing sections, wherever the payment of taxes is mentioned, it is also provided that the payment of interest shall be made; and if it be true, as contended by appellant, that the taxes under consideration do not bear interest during the bonded period, then it must be confessed that the legislature has taken great pains to insert into every section relating to the subject-matter, words which mean nothing. In section 4109, it is provided that the "person or corporation having the custody of such spirits on the 15th day of September in the year the assessment is made, shall be liable for all taxes due thereon, together with all interest and penalties which may accrue;" and "when payment shall be made by the warehouseman of the taxes, interest or penalties, he shall have a lien for the amount so paid, with interest from the date of payment." Section 4110 (prior to 1902): "And the taxes on each year's assessment shall bear interest as other taxes." Section 4111 provides how and when the State taxes shall be paid, and that the proprietor of the warehouse "shall, at the same time, pay all taxes and interest on such spirits due the State, county, taxing district, city, or town to the officer entitled to receive the same." Section 4112: "On the failure of any owner or proprietor of any such warehouse to pay the taxes and interest within five days after the same becomes due, he shall be deemed delinquent, etc."

We do not know how the legislature could have made it plainer, that State taxes on whisky in bond should bear interest, than by the language used in the sections aforesaid. It is contended, however, that inasmuch as the language of section 4110 is "and the taxes on each year's assessment shall bear interest as other taxes," that because other taxes do not bear interest, therefore, all of the language used by the legislature in providing for interest on the deferred payment of taxes assessed against whisky in bond, is nullified. To this, we can not agree. If there is anything plain in the statute in hand, it is that the taxes shall bear interest, and it can not be consonant with any known or sound principle of statutory construction, that the three words "as other taxes," because they are incorrectly used, shall nullify all of the other parts of the statute which make it perfectly clear that the legislature intended that the taxes should bear interest.

It may be conceded, as urged by counsel for appellees, that taxes do not bear interest without a special requirement therefor. We think that the sections quoted plainly show that the legislature intended to require that the deferred payments of taxes on whisky in bond should bear interest. Let us see, now, what the statutory requirement on the subject of interest on other taxes is. Section 4091 provides, in regard to taxation on the franchises of corporations, that, if they (the corporations) fail to pay the taxes due, after receiving thirty days' notice, they shall be deemed delinquent, and a penalty of 10 per cent. on the amount of the tax shall attach, and thereafter said tax shall bear interest at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum. Section 4103 contains a similar provision as to interest with reference to railroad taxes as that contained in section 4091, and section 4143 provides as follows: "Any person or persons failing to pay their taxes by the 1st day of December in the year following the assessment for such taxes, shall pay 6 per centum additional on the tax so due and unpaid." Now, while it may be admitted, that, technically, this is a penalty, and not interest, we think it clear that it is the provision specifically alluded to in section 4110; and what was meant by the use of the words "as other taxes" was merely to fix the time at which the interest theretofore provided for commenced to run, and the rate thereof; that is, the interest on taxes on spirits in bond should commence to run on the 1st day of December in the year following the assessment, and should be at the rate of 6 per cent. This conclusion is fortified by the fact that the penalty of 6 per centum, inflicted for the nonpayment of other taxes under section 4143, coincides in amount with legal interest, as defined in section 2218 of the statutes. So we find that "other taxes," after a specified time, either bear interest at a fixed rate, or a penalty coinciding in amount with the legal rate of interest, 6 per cent.

The cardinal rule of statutory construction is that the intention of the legislature shall be effectuated, even at the expense of the letter of the law; and, to accomplish this, the meaning of words may be modified, the structure of sentences changed, or some words rejected altogether, and others interpolated. Endlich, in his work on the Interpretation of Statutes, section 296, thus states the rule: "Where the language of a statute, in its ordinary meaning and grammatical construction, leads to a manifest contradiction of the apparent purpose of the enactment, or to some inconvenience or absurdity, hardship or injustice, presumably not intended, a construction may be put upon it which modifies the meaning of the words, and even the structure of the sentence. This is done, sometimes, by giving an unusual meaning to particular words; sometimes by altering their collocation; or by rejecting them altogether; or by interpolating other words; under the influence, no doubt, of an irresistible conviction, that the legislature could not possibly have intended what its words signify, and that the modifications thus made are mere corrections of careless language, and really give the true intention. The ascertainment of the latter is the cardinal rule, or rather, the end and object of all construction; and where the real design of the legislature in ordaining a statute, although it be not precisely expressed, is yet plainly perceivable, or ascertained with reasonable certainty, the language of the statute must be given such a construction as will carry that design into effect, even though, in so doing, the exact letter of the law be sacrificed, or though the construction be, indeed, contrary to the letter. And this rule holds good even in the construction of criminal statutes. Of course, if the meaning of the legislature is clear, every technical rule of construction must yield, and though the words used to express that meaning be not apt for the purpose, they will be so construed as to serve the same. And, a fortiori, if there is an express declaration of the intent and meaning of a statute by a provision in the same to carry out that intent, all other parts of the act are controlled in the construction of it. A clause, doubtful upon its grammatical construction, will be controlled by the general intent of the legislature, rather than by the literal meaning of the language."

This principle is upheld in the case of the Commonwealth v. Grinstead & Tinsley, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 1444. In the case of Sams v. Sams, 85 Ky., 400, it is said: "It is a well-settled rule of construction, that the letter of the statute will not be followed when it leads to an absurd conclusion; but on the contrary, the reason for the enactment must enter into its interpretation, so as to determine what was intended to be accomplished by it." In the case of Bailey v. Commonwealth, 11 Bush, 689, Judge Cofer, speaking for the court, said: "Words in a statute were always to be understood according to the approved use of language. But there are other rules of construction of equal dignity and importance, which must not be overlooked, and which, although not incorporated in our statute, are as binding upon the courts as if embodied in it. One of these rules is that 'every statute ought to be expounded, not according to the letter, but according to the meaning;' and another, that 'every interpretation that leads to an absurdity ought to be rejected;' and still another, that a law 'ought to be interpreted in such manner as that it may have effect, and not be found vain and illusive.'" To the same effect is Feemster v. Anderson, 6 Mon., 537.

We find no difficulty in reaching the conclusion that the legislature manifestly intended that distilled spirits in bond should be assessed each year as other taxes, and, although not required to be paid until the bonded period is at an end, or the United States Government taxes paid, yet, for this privilege of retaining the State's money, the warehouseman should pay interest thereon. This conclusion is reached without reference to the language "as other taxes." What, then, is lacking on the subject in hand before we reach a consideration of these three words? Not that the distiller should pay interest on the deferred taxes, for that is plainly provided for without reference to these words; all that is lacking in the language used by the legislature up to the time that we are forced to apply to the words "as other taxes" to make it intelligible, is the time when the interest shall commence to run, and the rate at which it shall run. It is manifest, therefore, that the use of these words was intended to supply the meaning, or purpose, which was unsupplied by the other language already used. Turning, then, to section 4143, to ascertain the meaning of the words "as other taxes," we find that other taxes bear, not interest, but a penalty of 6 per cent., if not paid on the 1st day of December in the year following the assessment; and we are thus provided with the two lacking constituents necessary to make the meaning of the legislature on the whole subject of interest on whisky in bond, intelligible. Applying the principle enunciated by Mr. Endlich in the section above quoted, and sustained by the utterances of our own court in the cases cited, we ignore the fact that the legislature, in using the words "as other taxes," with reference to interest was technically incorrect, and borrow from the expression all that is essential, the time when the interest commenced to run, and the rate at which it runs, thus making the statute both practicable and intelligible, and saving it from the criticism of being either "absurd" or "vain" or "illusive." And this conclusion we reach in construing the statute as an original proposition.

But, we are not left without authority on the subject; this very question arose in the case of the Commonwealth v. Taylor, 101 Ky., 327. The court had originally reached the conclusion that the act relating to the taxing of distilled spirits in bond was unconstitutional, as being special legislation and contrary to the requirements of uniformity in the matter of taxation, as is shown by the first opinion delivered by Judge White. (This opinion was withdrawn and that of Judge Burnam, 19 Ky. L. Rep., 552, rendered in lieu thereof.) Upon a petition for rehearing by the warehouseman, the original opinion was withdrawn, and that contained in volume 101 was delivered by Judge Burnam. In the second opinion of the court, a most elaborate exposition of the unique position which distilled spirits in bond occupies in our fiscal system, is given. It is there shown, that, owing to the fact that the United States Government takes actual possession and control of distilled spirits at the time of its manufacture, and holds it in bond for a period of eight years, it is impossible for the State to enforce its lien for taxes until after the lien of the general government is extinguished, although the property is assessed each year by the State. This results in a great benefit to the warehouseman, by enabling him to find purchasers for his goods before he is required to pay cash for taxes, and for this benefit, and in order to preserve uniformity in taxation, the statute requires of him to pay interest. On this subject, the court said: "The assessment and taxes upon the property within the territorial limits of the authority levying them are uniform, and are imposed as fairly, according to value by an assessment made in the mode prescribed by the act under discussion, as they could be by assessment made by a county assessor, and, having been so assessed, are collected under the same general laws regulating the revenues as the taxes imposed on other property, except as to the time of payment, and this delay is necessarily made to depend upon the payment of the taxes due to the United States government, upon the same property; but, to preserve uniformity, distillers are required to pay interest on the deferred taxes."

This language is not the dictum of the writer of the opinion; it was essential to the upholding of the constitutionality of the act as to uniformity of taxation, that the conclusion enunciated should have been reached. This opinion was delivered on May 27, 1897, and since that time, there has been no room for two opinions on the subject in hand. We freely admit the great force of the doctrine of contemporaneous construction, where the meaning of the statute is vague or uncertain; but when the court of last resort construes a statute, the further utility of the doctrine ceases.

But it is urgently insisted that the State is now estopped from collecting the interest involved herein, because the auditor received the principal sum of the taxes due without interest, and the warehouseman, who was only the custodian, and not the owner of the whisky, permitted it to be carried away by the owner, and thus lost his lien through the wrongful act of the State's fiscal officer; and that, if the distiller is now required to pay the interest, he will have no recourse against the owner for the amount of the interest adjudged against him. It may be true, that this will work a hardship upon the distiller, but it was his duty, under the law, to pay the taxes and the accrued interest, and we can not, in his behalf, waive the time honored and conclusive presumption, that he knew the law; and especially is this true since 1897, when the case of the Commonwealth v. Taylor was decided, thus establishing, beyond all question, that taxes on whisky in bond bore interest on the assessments made during the bonded period; waiving this, however, it is elementary, that the State is not estopped by the laches of its officers. Bigelow, in his work on Estoppel, page 341, says: "Clearly, the State can not be estopped by the unauthorized act of its officers." The same rule is laid down in the Am. & Eng. Encycl. of Law, 2d edition, page 397, in this language: "But such estoppels can not arise from the unauthorized act of the agent or officer of the State." (Commonwealth v. Carter, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 1509; Elmendorf v. Carmichael, & c., 3 Litt., 481; Pulaski v. State, 43 Ark., 118; Attorney General v. Marr, 55 Mich, 445, State v. Brewer, 64 Ala., 287.)

Since the case of Commonwealth v. Knute, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 2138, the rule has been established in this State, that actions such as these are barred by the expiration of five years after the cause of action arose.

Wherefore, the judgment is reversed for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

MOBILE & OHIO R. R. CO. v. REEVES.

(Filed April 26, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Railroads—Failure to stop train—Rudeness of conductor—Excessive verdict—In an action by appellee for damages for failure of the conductor to stop the train long enough for her to get aboard, and charging that the conductor jerked and abused her, the evidence of the appellee as to any rudeness of the conductor, being unsupported and being contradicted by a dozen witnesses who were present, a verdict allowing her $400 damages is excessive and flagrantly against the evidence.

2. Instructions—Measure of damages—There being some conflict in the evidence as to whether the train stopped long enough for appellee to get on with safety, the jury was authorized to give her such sum in damages as would fairly compensate her for any time she lost, expenses incurred, inconvenience or discomfort she suffered by reason of appellant's failure to transport her to her place of destination.

3. Punitive damages—Duty of court—Where it is sought to recover both punitive and compensatory damages, the court may refuse to give an instruction allowing punitive damages, if it be shown by the plaintiff's own evidence that only compensatory damages should be awarded; but plaintiff is entitled to an instruction for punitive damages, although there was no other evidence than her own, upon which to base it; but while this is true it is likewise the duty of the court to set the verdict aside if excessive in amount, or flagrantly against the evidence.

Landers & Leek and Corbett & White for appellant.

J. B. Wickliffe and J. H. Tharp for appellee.

Appeal from Ballard Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle.

This is an appeal from a verdict and judgment of $400 recovered against the appellant, Mobile & Ohio R. R. Co., by appellee, Ollie Reeves, in the Ballard Circuit Court.

It was averred in the petition that she and her husband having purchased of appellant tickets which entitled them to ride on its passenger train from Laketon to Wickliffe, Ky., a distance of nine miles, were standing on the depot platform at Laketon awaiting the coming of the train, and that when it arrived at the station, appellant's servants in charge thereof, instead of stopping it, as it was their duty to do in order that appellee, her husband and child might get thereon, only reduced its speed sufficiently to permit the conductor to jump off, which he did, and inquired of appellee if she wished to get on; and upon being answered by her in the affirmative, he maliciously and wrongfully cursed, abused and jerked her about, refused to let her get aboard the train, and caused it to leave without her; that she was at the time enceinte, and by reason of the abuse and maltreatment of the conductor, as well as his negligent failure and that of appellant's other servants in charge of the train to stop it long enough for her to get thereon, she was put to great inconvenience, and subjected to much physical and mental pain, whereby she was damaged in the sum of $2,000.

The answer of appellant specifically denied the averments of the petition, and in addition averred that the train did stop on the occasion referred to in the petition, and did not start again until a sufficient length of time had elapsed to enable all persons at the station or near at hand to get upon it, who were desirous of doing so; that the conductor and train porter were on the platform ready to assist appellee or others to get on the car, but she did not attempt to get on the train or signify a desire to do so; that the conductor did not curse, abuse, or use any improper language to appellee, or jerk or throw her about, or take hold of, or otherwise mistreat her.

Upon the trial appellee introduced but two witnesses besides herself. Her own testimony in the main sustained the averments of the petition; that is, she stated that the train did not stop when it reached Laketon, though it did check up enough for the conductor to get on the platform; that he came to her and asked if she were going, and she told him yes, if the train stopped; that he then said he was behind time, and took her by the arm and told her if she was going to get on to do so, to which she replied that she would not until the train stopped; that he then said to her she was a damned crank, and he could not fool with her any more, but would have to go on. She caught hold of the train, but did not get on it, as it was still moving. She further testified that when the conductor took hold of her he shoved her back and pushed her towards the train until she took hold of a post, whereupon he jumped upon the train and left, and that from the pain and excitement of her encounter with him, she was confined to her bed from the time she got to her sister's that day, until 9 o'clock the following morning.

The next witness introduced in her behalf was John Tolliver, who testified that he saw her standing at the place on the platform where passengers usually get on the train; that the train stopped, but not more than a minute, if that long, and appellee tried to get on it, but it pulled out and left her. He did not see her catch hold of the train, nor did he see the conductor take hold of her. On cross-examination the witness further testified that he was close to appellee while the train was there, and a part of the time only five or six steps from her, but did not testify that he saw the conductor mistreat or abuse appellee. The only other witness introduced by appellee was her sister, Mattie Bass, who was not at Laketon when appellee failed to get on the train, but who testified that appellee came to her house that day, and was sick for perhaps a week, that she thought she was threatened with a miscarriage, which did not occur.

Eleven witnesses were introduced by the appellant, all of whom testified that the train did stop on the occasion in question; several of them said it was a very brief stop, some of them that it stopped twice, but each stop was short. At the first stop a man got off the train, at the second stop, appellee's husband with their child succeeded in getting on, but ascertaining immediately after the train left the station that his wife was not aboard, at his request the train was stopped by the conductor two or three hundred yards from the station, and he and the child permitted to get off, after which they rejoined appellee at the station.

The conductor testified that the train was thirty or forty minutes late when it arrived at Laketon, but upon reaching the station that it stopped twice, the first time about a minute, and the second long enough to enable appellee's husband and child to get on; they were, however, let off the train a short distance from the station when the discovery was made by the husband that his wife was not on the train. The conductor also testified that at the time appellee's husband and child got on the train, he asked her if she wanted to get on, to which she made no reply. About that time the flagman, Collins, put out on the platform a stool used by ladies in getting on the train, but appellee made no attempt in his presence to get on the train, or expressed any desire to do so. The witness also stated that he did not take hold of, or use any profane or abusive language to appellee, and that he was not at any time within more than five or six feet of her.

These statements of the conductor were corroborated by the flagman, Collins, and by other witnesses who were present. One of these witnesses, Isaac Allen, a farmer living near Laketon, testified that the train stopped long enough for him to mail a letter on it. Appellee then came up and took hold of the train, which was moving slowly; he advised her to turn it loose, that she might fall under it, and get killed, but she held on, and the conductor came along and said "you had better get on if you are going to, I can't hold the train all day;" she said, "I can't get on unless it stops," to which he replied, "Its been stopped long enough for you to get on if you wanted to;" he then took hold of her arm as if to help her on, and she turned loose, and so did he, and got on the train. The train then went off a piece and stopped and put her husband off. The witness further testified that when the train stopped, the stool was put off; that he was then in ten feet of the conductor, but when the stool was put on the ground for appellee to get on the train, she, for some cause unknown to the witness, walked away from the conductor, instead of getting on; she seemed to be excited and acted as if she had never been on a train before. Her husband jumped on the train with the child and left her. The witness also testified that he thought he heard every word that passed between appellee and the conductor, that he could have touched either of them with his arm, and the conductor did not use any rough or profane language to her.

Another witness, Mack Ashworth, who had the same opportunity for seeing and hearing what occurred that was afforded Allen, testified to the same effect, and the same is true of several other witnesses, whose testimony need not be mentioned in detail.

An examination of the bill of evidence will show that of the fourteen witnesses introduced in the case, appellee is the only one who testified that the conductor treated her with violence, or with language of abuse. Her own witness, Tolliver, who was near her all the time the train was at Laketon, entirely failed to corroborate her as to the alleged misconduct of the conductor. Upon the other hand, all of the witnesses who saw and heard what passed between appellee and the conductor contradicted her as to what occurred between them. These witnesses constituted half of the entire number introduced by appellant, and several of them were not employes of appellant, and had no connection in any way with its business, and no interest whatever in the result of the trial.

It would seem, therefore, that appellee's version of what occurred between her and the conductor was not only not corroborated, but in direct conflict with all the rest of the evidence. It is equally manifest that appellee's contention that the train did not stop at Laketon, is also untenable. She alone testified that it did not stop at all. Twelve of the other thirteen witnesses say it did stop. The thirteenth witness, Mrs. Bass, was not at Laketon, at the time, and, therefore, did not testify on that point. But while there can be no doubt that the train stopped, it is by no means certain that it stopped long enough for appellee to get upon it. Upon this point the evidence was conflicting, but much of it conduced to show that the stop was not of sufficient length to enable appellee to get upon the train in safety. It was in proof that the train was thirty or forty minutes late, and that the conductor was in great haste to leave Laketon in order to make up the lost time. In fact, so brief was the stay of the train that appellee's husband, with great difficulty, succeeded in getting upon it with their infant child.

Obviously it was the duty of appellant's servants in charge of the train to have stopped it a reasonable time for appellee to get thereon with safety; and their failure, if any, to do so, entitled her to such damages as she sustained thereby, the measure of which is such a sum as will fairly compensate her for any time she lost, expense she incurred, or personal inconvenience or discomfort she suffered, by reason of appellant's failure to transport her on its train from Laketon to Wickliffe, as it contracted to do, in selling to her husband a ticket for her use between those places. (Southern Ry. Co. v. Marshall, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 813.)

It is insisted for appellant that the trial court erred in giving the instruction as to punitive damages, as appellee alone testified that the conductor was violent or abusive in his treatment of her, in which she was unsupported by her own witnesses, and contradicted by those of appellant. We are unable to concur in this conclusion of appellant's counsel. Where it is sought to recover both compensatory and punitive damages, the court may refuse to give an instruction allowing punitive damages, if it be shown by the plaintiff's own evidence that only compensatory damages should be awarded. But an instruction as to punitive damages was proper in this case, although there was no other testimony than that of appellee upon which to base it, as she was entitled to have the jury instructed upon her theory of the case, if there was any evidence, however slight, to support it. But while this was true, it was likewise the duty of the court to set aside the verdict of the jury, if excessive in amount, or flagrantly against the evidence.

We are of opinion that the verdict was and is excessive, and otherwise flagrantly against the evidence, which is to be attributed in large measure, we think, to the failure of the court to more specifically define the measure of damages. For the instructions, as given, directed the attention of the jury with great particularity to the allowance of punitive damages on account of the alleged misconduct of the conductor, of which there was only slight and unsatisfactory proof, and left them unadvised as to the measure of compensatory damages, when in fact there was some satisfactory evidence conducing to show that appellant's cars, on the occasion complained of, were not stopped long enough to afford appellee a reasonable time to get upon them, which authorized the jury to allow her some amount by way of compensatory damages.

For the reasons indicated the judgment is reversed and cause remanded, with directions to the lower court to grant appellant a new trial and for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

MANCHESTER ASSURANCE CO. v. DOWELL, &c.

(Filed April 26, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Insurance—Conduct of agent—In this action to recover upon a policy of fire insurance issued upon personal property, it appearing that it was desired because the applicant had borrowed money from a bank upon the agreement to secure his property by insurance, and the fact that the mortgage was referred to in the application, or rather the statement that it was mortgaged, was contained in the application, the agent by whom the policy was to be issued refusing to issue it because the property was mortgaged, the soliciting agent changed the application so it appeared there was no mortgage, this, it appearing, having been acquiesced in by the agent to whom the application was sent, and it further appearing that there was no fraud on the part of the applicant, but that he acted in accordance with the advice of the soliciting agent, a judgment against the company for the amount of the insurance will not be disturbed.

2. Same—By section 639, Kentucky Statutes, it is provided that all statements in an application for insurance, shall be deemed and held representations and not warranties, and that no representation, unless material or fraudulent, prevents a recovery on the policy, and in this action where the agent knew all the facts with reference to the condition of the property, it can not be said that the applicant was guilty of fraud in making the statements in the application.

C. H. Shield and Wright & McElroy for appellant.

John B. Rodes and Louis McQuown for appellee.

Appeal from Warren Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

This is an appeal taken from a judgment of the Warren Circuit Court in which the appellee, E. V. Dowell & Co., recovered judgment against the Manchester Assurance Co. on a policy of insurance issued in August, 1902, for $1,000, $100 of it being on fixtures, and $900 being on merchandise. The property insured was situate in the town of Woodburn, a few miles from Bowling Green. In September, 1902, the property was destroyed by fire. In January, 1903, suit was brought on this policy, the appellant having refused to pay. It bases its refusal to pay on the ground that appellee fraudulently concealed from it the existence of a mortgage on the property.

It appears that Dowell & Co. had bought a store from a man by the name of J. J. Herrington. Dowell & Co. were unable to pay the full contract price to Herrington, because it desired to purchase an additional stock from the wholesale houses to increase the entire stock to its desired proportions. Therefore, the parties agreed that appellee would give a mortgage to the Bank of Woodburn to secure the payment to that bank of $890, and also that Dowell & Co. would assign to the bank, as collateral for this sum, a note for $650, which was solvent and a lien on land in Allen county, Ky. The officers of the bank agreed to do this, provided appellee would obtain a policy of insurance on its stock, and that it should be assigned to the bank as additional security for its loan of this money. One Pollard, of Bowling Green, Ky., was the agent of appellant, with power to issue policies. One Williams, a resident of Woodburn, was a soliciting agent of appellant under Pollard, with power to solicit insurance, prepare and receive applications for polices, deliver the policies and receive the premiums from the insured. It appears that Mr. Williams was called in and made acquainted with the above facts, and he prepared an application on one of appellant's blanks, in which was the question as to whether or not there was any mortgage on the property sought to be insured; to which question in that application the answer was written "yes," and the policy was directed to be issued to the Woodburn Bank to the extent to which its interest might appear. This application was forwarded to Pollard at Bowling Green, and on the next day he answered that the appellant would not issue a policy upon such terms, or upon mortgaged property; that same evening appellee, Williams, and J. J. Herrington had a conversation with Pollard by telephone, Herrington doing the talking with Pollard, whereby it was agreed, as proven by Herrington and E. V. Dowell, that the policy was to be issued as a "straight policy," which was explained to mean that the policy was to be paid direct to appellee, the insured, without mentioning the name of the bank. The next morning Williams, in the presence of Dowell and Herrington, changed the former application, directing the policy to be made payable to appellee instead of the bank, and erased the word "yes" in answer to the question as to whether or not there was any mortgage, and wrote, instead, the word "no." Williams at the time explained that that was the proper way to answer that question; that as the mortgage was for only $890, and as the bank held the land note as collateral, that the mortgage lien was for only a little over $200, and as the stock was then worth over $3,000, the company would not regard this mortgage as an incumbrance, within the meaning of that question. Williams then forwarded this application to Pollard, and the policy was issued and returned and handed by Williams to the bank. Williams admitted, at the time of the writing of the first application, that there was to be a mortgage, but denied that he understood that there was to be a mortgage at the time of the writing of the second application. On the contrary, he stated that when the second application was prepared he was informed by the parties that there was not to be any mortgage, that they had agreed upon a different plan to secure the bank. Pollard testified that he did not know anything of the mortgage. The letter of Williams to Pollard and the letter from Pollard to Williams were introduced to corroborate them on this point. The testimony of Dowell, Herrington and Rogers, the banker, corroborate appellee upon the fact that these agents did have knowledge of the fact of the existence of the mortgage at the time of the second application, and Herrington positively corroborates Dowell as to the statement of Williams that the answer "no" was a proper answer to the question in the application as to whether or not there was any lien or incumbrance on the property, because the company would not regard this as an incumbrance within the meaning of the question.

The provision of appellant's policy upon which it relies to defeat the policy reads as follows: "This entire policy, unless otherwise provided by agreement, endorsed hereon or added to, shall be void if the subject of insurance be personal property, and be or become incumbered by a chattel mortgage."

The appellant says that this mortgage to the bank was concealed from it, that it had no knowledge or notice thereof, and that the appellee intentionally and fraudulently concealed the existence of this mortgage, with a view to deceive and defraud appellant, and by reason thereof the policy was void from its inception. The appellant claims that under no circumstances would it issue a policy on personal property incumbered by a mortgage, and that appellee knew that fact. Appellee says that it had no personal notice or information of that fact. If appellant's contention be actually true, we are inclined to the opinion that, under the terms of appellant's policy, appellee might be misled into supposing that it might take a risk on mortgaged property where the risk would not be materially affected thereby. In the provision quoted, this language is found: "Unless otherwise provided by agreement endorsed hereon or added to." This language clearly indicates that under certain circumstances the company will, by agreement, insure mortgaged chattels.

There is another provision in this policy which clearly indicates the same thing, viz.: "It, with the consent of this company, an interest under this policy shall exist in favor of the mortgagee * * * the conditions hereinbefore contained shall apply in the manner expressed in such provisions and conditions of insurance relating to such interests as shall be written upon, attached or appended hereto."

We have had a statute in this State since the year 1874 which is now section 639 of the Kentucky Statutes which reads as follows: "All statements or descriptions in any application for a policy of insurance shall be deemed and held representations and not warranties, nor shall any misrepresentation, unless material or fraudulent, prevent a recovery on the policy."

The only real questions in this case are, whether or not the representation that there was no mortgage on this property was material or fraudulent, and, if material, whether or not the appellant is estopped from making a defense on that account by reason of a knowledge of the facts with reference thereto by its agents who took the application, delivered the policy and received the premium. And also whether or not the mortgage, under the facts of this case, materially affected the risk of appellant.

In the case of Wright's Adm'r v. Northwestern Mutual Life Insurance Co., 91 Ky., 209, the court, in considering a question were the soliciting agent, after the applicant had made a true answer, wrote a different one, informing the applicant at the time that the answer he had written was the proper one, said in substance that where the applicant for insurance makes true answers to questions, and the soliciting agent writes in the application a different answer, which he assures the applicant will meet the requirements of the policy, the company will be liable, although it might have refused the insurance if the answer made by the applicant had been written in the application.

In the case of the Germania Insurance Co. v. Wingfield, 22 Ky. Law Rep., 457, in discussing the question as to the knowledge of the facts with reference to the property about to be insured, and the responsibility of the company in such case, the court said: "By the acceptance of the application addressed to the Lancashire Insurance Co. from Clark, and by the issue and delivery to him of the policy of insurance to be delivered to appellee, appellant ratified and adopted the acts of Clark in soliciting the insurance and receiving the application, and in effect constituted him in this transaction its agent, and the law is well settled in this State that knowledge on the part of the soliciting agent at the time he took the application for insurance, is the knowledge of the company which he represents, and will estop the company from relying upon a provision of the policy which ignores such information of its agent." (Phoenix Insurance Co. v. Phillips, 16 Ky. Law Rep., 162; German Insurance Co. v. Hart, Id., 344; Lancashire Insurance Co. v. Gertisen, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 471, Rogers v. Farmers Mutual Aid Association, 20 Ky. Law Rep., 1925.)

If it be true that appellee, in obtaining this policy, intentionally and fraudulently concealed the fact of the existence of this mortgage, with a view to deceive and defraud the appellant, then the policy would be void and not binding; but this question, as well as the other questions in the case, were submitted to the jury by the court in its instructions, which were very favorable to appellant, and the jury determined that appellee did not obtain this policy with any such purpose or intent. We have read the instructions given by the court with care, and considered them in the light of the criticism of appellant's counsel; without referring to them in detail, it is sufficient to say that while there were more of them than were necessary to present the issues for the determination of the jury, and to some extent possibly calculated to confuse, yet we are unable to see how it was possible for any confusion that might have existed, to have operated to the prejudice of appellant, as the instructions which were calculated to confuse were given at the instance of appellant, and were more favorable to it than the law and facts authorized.

Wherefore, the judgment of the lower court is affirmed, with damages.

LEXINGTON RAILWAY CO. v. FAIN.

(Filed April 26, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Street railway—Accident by—Damages—Where one was hurt in a collision with a street car, sustaining injuries requiring the services of physician and treatment in hospital, and was compelled to use crutches for some time, while the testimony is conflicting as to whether the injuries are of a permanent character, the court properly left that question to the determination of the jury.

2. Same—Instructions—Where one, while driving a wagon, which was struck by a street car resulting in injury to him, a peremptory instruction for the defendant in an action against the railway company by him for damages, was not authorized where there was evidence tending to establish negligence on the part of those in charge of the car, although there was conflict of testimony as to how the accident occurred.

3. Same—In an action against a street railway company for damages, where it was averred in the answer that the injury resulted from the mismanagement by the plaintiff of the horse he was driving, there should have been an instruction upon contributory negligence; and an instruction authorizing punitive damages was improper where the record fails to show any elements in the conduct of the servants in charge of the car which justify an infliction of punishment in the form of exemplary damages.

R. C. Stoll and Morton, Webb & Wilson for appellant.

Geo. Denny for appellee.

Appeal from Fayette Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle.

As the result of a collision between an electric car belonging to appellant and the spring wagon of appellee, the latter was thrown from the wagon and injured, for which he sued and recovered of appellant in the court below $2,000 in damages, it being averred in the petition that his injuries were caused by the negligence of appellant's servants in charge of the car.

The accident occurred on Limestone street in the city of Lexington, and the injuries received by appellee consisted, as alleged, of the fracture of a small bone of the ankle, a bone of the foot, and a hurt of some sort of the hip and back. For some reason not explained in the record, Dr. Bullock, the surgeon who first attended appellee and bandaged his leg and foot, was not introduced as a witness. Dr. Barrow, another Lexington physician, was called later to see appellee with Dr. Bullock, and testified that he did not look at the leg or foot, as it was not thought advisable to disturb the bandage, but examined the hip, which showed a bruise to the flesh, but neither fracture or dislocation. Dr. Mathews, whose deposition was taken in the case, testified that he attended appellee several weeks after he returned to his home in Jessamine county, but only treated him for fracture of one of the tarsal bones of the left foot. So it appears that appellee alone testified that the ankle bone was broken. It does, however, appear from the evidence that appellee remained in a Lexington hospital for ten days after he was injured, that he was confined to his bed and room at home for six weeks, and had to use crutches for two or three months. While his injuries were both serious and painful, there is considerable doubt under the evidence as to their being of a permanent character, but we think the trial court properly left that question to the decision of the jury.

The evidence as to the manner in which appellee received his injuries is conflicting. It appears that the car in approaching the place of the accident, had to do so upon a descending grade, in fact, down somewhat of a hill, notwithstanding which its rate of speed was not unusual or improper. Appellee's own testimony as to the manner of receiving his injuries is somewhat confusing, and that of his principal witness, Driscoll, hardly less so. Appellee testified that his mare, being frightened at the car, backed the spring wagon to which she was attached as the car approached, and that the hind wheels, or one of them, went upon the railway track in front of the car, which struck it, and thereby threw him out. Driscoll testified that appellee drove from the west to the east side of the track, and that the car struck the hind wheels of the wagon as appellee was crossing the track after the mare and the front wheels had reached the east side. But considered altogether, the evidence introduced by appellee was to the effect that shortly after he entered Limestone street, he saw the approaching car when it was 200 yards or more from him, and when it got in about 300 feet of him his mare became frightened and uncontrollable; that appellee retained his seat in the front of the wagon, the car came on, and he held up his hand and called to the motorman to stop; the mare continued to back until the hind wheels, or one of them, got upon the track just in front of the car, which, striking the wagon, threw it to one side several feet, thereby causing ap-pellee to be thrown out in front, and that the car was not stopped until after the collision.

Upon cross-examination, appellee stated that the car was "right on" when the mare commenced backing, and declined to state that there was slackening of the speed of the car as it approached him, but said if there was any he did not notice it, which was not unreasonable in view of the fact that his attention was in the main confined to the frightened mare. The appellant introduced five witnesses to the accident, including the conductor and motorman in charge of the car, all of whom testified in substance that when appellee's mare became frightened, the speed of the car was slackened to such a degree as to give the motorman complete control of it, and that it was in fact stopped, after which, and while it was stationary, appellee struck his mare with the lines and she, in her still frightened condition, either backed or ran the wagon against the foot board of the car, causing his fall and injuries.

All of these witnesses agreed as to the fact that appellee struck the mare with the lines, but some of them stated that when struck with the lines by him, the mare backed against the car; others that she plunged forward and ran the wagon against the car, but all but one of them testified that the car was not, at the time, in motion, and he was unwilling to state positively that it was in motion. It is apparent from the foregoing statement of the evidence that a peremptory instruction in behalf of the appellant would have been proper, for there was evidence from appellee's witnesses that tended to establish negligence upon the part of appellant's agents in charge of the car. Upon the other hand, the evidence of appellant's conductors showed that there was not only no negligence upon the part of its agents, but that appellee's injuries were caused by his own negligence.

If the jury believed from the evidence that the appellant's servant in charge of its car saw, or by the exercise of ordinary diligence could have seen, that there was danger of the car striking appellee's horse or wagon unless it should be stopped, and that after they saw, or could so have seen such danger, they could have stopped the car in time to have prevented a collision, but failed to do so, it was their duty to find for the appellant. Upon the other hand, it was their duty to find for appellant, unless it was believed from the evidence that its servants in charge of the car after the collision saw, or by the use of ordinary care could have seen, that there was danger of a collision unless the car should be stopped, failed to stop it in time to prevent the collision. We may also say that the verdict should have been for appellant, if the jury believed from the evidence that the car was stopped and that after it became stationary the wagon of appellant was, by the action of his horse, brought in contact with the appellant's car, and that appellee's injuries were caused by such contact of the wagon and car.

The foregoing views were embodied in the instructions in this case, and we think the lower court should have given an instruction upon contrary negligence, as it is averred in the answer, and there was some evidence tending to show that the collision between the car and appellee's wagon was caused by the latter's mismanagement of the horse while the car was stationary. And it appears from the record that counsel for appellant offered an instruction covering this point, which the court refused to give. We further of opinion that the court should have given the usual instructions defining negligence and ordinary care, and that it was error to instruct the jury that they might allow punitive damages. Even if it be conceded that appellee's injuries were caused by the negligence of appellant's servants in charge of the car, the evidence found in the record fails to show, in their conduct, the presence of those elements that justify the infliction upon appellant of punishment in the form of exemplary damages. It seems to be well settled that the question of whether there is any evidence in a given case to justify the assessment by the jury of exemplary damages, is for the determination of the court. (Sedgwick on Damages; section 387; McHenry Coal Co. v. Snedden, 98 Ky., 686.)

Under the facts of this case the recovery should have been confined by the court to compensatory damages.

For the reasons indicated the judgment is reversed, with directions to the lower court to grant appellant a new trial, and for further proceedings consistent with the opinion herein.

TARVIN, &c. v. WALKER'S CREEK COAL AND COKE CO.

(Filed April 27, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Land—Ancient deeds—Power of attorney—Presumption—Estoppel—In a land controversy between parties claiming under the same vendor, conveyances made by one claiming to be the attorney in fact for the patentee, neither of the litigants is in a position to assail the title of the other, and after the lapse of over sixty years, during all of which time the validity of the title has been recognized by the persons living on and claiming the land, the authority of agent making the conveyance should be presumed.

2. Certain lines established—Finding of chancellor—Conclusion—In the great number of conveyances and divisions of these lands, certain lines, including certain marked corners, have always been recognized as the west line of the G. and E. survey, and in view of the old marks found on this line and the want of adequate marks on the line claimed by the appellant, we conclude that the circuit court properly established the line claimed by the appellee, as the true line between the parties, and we decline to disturb the chancellor's finding.

H. L. Wheeler for appellants.

A. F. Byrd and Gourley & Roberts for appellee.

Appeal from Lee Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

On November 17, 1835, pursuant to a sale made on September 27, 1828 Thomas Duckham, as attorney in fact for Samuel Drake, conveyed to Grigsby & Elkins, in consideration of $250, 10,000 acres of land, being part of Samuel Young's 30,000-acre survey, and bounded as follows: "Beginning on a spruce pine standing on a cliff of Devil's creek near the Hotel cave; thence N. 10 degrees W. passing the said cave 220 poles to a stake; thence N. 65 W. 770 poles to a stake in the lower line of Samuel Young's; thence with line S. 9 degrees E. 638 poles to a stake; thence S. 20 degrees E. 1,000 poles to survey of Crow and Adams; thence with their line to a large tree standing on the bank of Devil's creek; N. 16 degrees W. 780 poles to the beginning," lying on the north side of the north fork of the Kentucky river.

The deed contains the following words of exception: "With the exception of mines, mineral and saltpeter caves, together with wood or timber to work said caves, etc., as also all the bottom land on the said river fit for cultivation, as also rail timber to enclose said land and keep up the fences."

On June 9, 1837, Thomas Duckham, as guardian for Samuel Duckham, conveyed to Grigsby & Elkins pursuant to the sale made on September 27, 1828, for the same consideration, 10,000 acres bounded as follows: "Beginning at a spruce pine standing on a cliff near the Hotel cave; thence N. 16 degrees W. crossing the Hotel cave in all 220 poles to a stake; thence N. 65 W. 770 poles to a stake in the lower line; thence with that line S. 9 E. 638 poles to a stake; thence S. 30 E. 1,000 poles to a survey of Crow and Adams; thence with their line to a large beech tree standing on the bank of Devil's creek; thence N. 16 W. 700 poles to the beginning." This deed contains only the following restriction: "But the said parties are not to interfere with any land on the Kentucky river that is fit for cultivation."

On June 9, 1843, Thomas Duckham conveyed to Samuel Plummer and Edward Kinkead, among other things the Young 30,000-acre survey "with a deduction (as stated in the deed) of what the said Duckham hath sold and made deeds to prior to this date." On October 4, 1846, Plummer conveyed to Kinkead his one-half interest in the land thus conveyed to them.

Appellants claim under Edward Kinkead. Appellees claim under Grigsby and Elkins. The question in dispute is the location of the west line of the Grigsby and Elkins tract.

The point is made for appellants that no power of attorney is shown, authorizing Duckham to convey the land for Drake, and that as guardian he had no power to convey his ward's land. No title is shown in Duckham from the patentee Young; but both parties claim under Duckham, and neither is in a position to assail his title. After the lapse of so many years, when Drake has not repudiated the act of his assumed agent, and after so many of the public records in this section have been destroyed, as between parties all claiming under Duckham, his authority should at least be presumed; for, for something like sixty years, persons have lived on the land holding it under this title without question. The beginning corner of the Grigsby and Elkins tract is at A. on the following rough plat, on which the west line of the tract, as claimed by appellant, is indicated approximately by the lines B, 2, 3, and as claimed by appellees by the lines F, 10, 11, the land in controversy being indicated by the figure 7, 8, 9, D:

gives way to established objects found on the ground. If we stop at B and run the next line B, 2, according to the calls of the deed, the next line 2, 8, must be greatly extended to reach the Crow and Adams survey and neither of these lines seem to be adequately marked or to have been recognized by any of the parties. If we run on to F the next line must be extended beyond the call of the deed to reach 10 and then the line 10, 11, closes pretty well with the deed. About the year 1859 John D. Spencer settled west of the line 2, 7, claiming under Grigsby and Elkins down to the line F, 10. He sold land to a number of parties around where the town of Zachariah now stands. Edward Kinkad was then living and knew of a survey made by Spencer, but there appears to have been no dispute at any time between him and Spencer. Spencer claimed to a poplar and persimmon corner which was well marked and stood about the point 10. This seems to have been then the recognized corner and the line 10 to 11 was then and is now plainly marked. Previous to 1859, and apparently soon after Grigsby and Elkins bought, Llewellen Bush, claiming under them, settled west of the line B, 2, claiming down to the line of the Young patent. He died there in 1859 and his land was divided among his children, there having been about the year 1848 a division made between him and Elkins. In all these divisions the line F, 10, 11, including the poplar and persimmon corner at 10 was recognized as the west line of the Grigsby and Elkins survey. In view of the old marks found on this line, its long recognition by the parties, and the want of adequate old marks on the line claimed by appellants, we conclude that the circuit court properly established the line as claimed by appellees as the true line between the parties.

It is contended for appellants that if the corner is located where the poplar and persimmon stood, and the line is run from there according to the calls of the deed, it will not include all the land in controversy as shown on the plat, but will run through it. There is evidence to this effect, but it is not from persons who have run the line or seen it run. On the other hand, there is evidence for appellees which locates this corner so as to include all the land in controversy. On this question of fact, which is of minor importance, we decline to disturb the chancellor's finding. The exception in the Duckham deed, of wood or timber to work the mines and caves, and of rail timber to enclose the bottom land on the river, fit for cultivation and keep up the fences, is not material here because it is not shown that any of the timber in controversy is near the river or will ever be needed for the purposes mentioned, and it constitutes no reason why appellants should not be enjoined from destroying the timber on the land to which they have no right.

If we do not apply the rule that where both parties claim under the same title neither can assail the title of their common vendor, the result is the same; for appellees have a deed to the land from the heirs at law of the patentee, Young, while appellants do not connect themselves with the patent at all. It is insisted for them that the deed made by the heirs of Young to appellees is void for champerty; but we do not find in the record sufficient evidence to show that appellants or those they claim under were in actual occupancy of the land at the time these deeds were made, so as to make the deed champertous. (Krauth v. Hahn, 28 Ky. Law Rep., 1861.) On the whole case the judgment of the chancellor seems to be in accord with the rights of the parties, and to meet the ends of substantial justice.

Judgment affirmed.

ILLINOIS CENTRAL R. R. CO. v. MENCER.

(Filed May 19, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Railroads—Instructions—Damages—Where appellee, a section hand in the employ of appellant, with a white lantern which appears to be a signal to a railroad engineer that he may proceed without danger, lay on the track and goes to sleep and is injured by a passing train, a peremptory instruction should be given to find for the appellant in an action against it by appellee to recover damages for his injury, as such conduct of appellee under the circumstances was the grossest negligence.

Johnson & Jennings, Wm. H. Yost and L. A. Teague for appellee.

J. M. Dickinson, Pirtle, Trabue, Doolan & Cox and Gordon and Gordon for appellant.

Appeal from Hopkins Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

This action was brought by the appellee, John Mencer against the appellant, the Illinois Central R. R. Co., to recover damages for personal injuries. He testified that on the 1st day of February, 1902, he was in the employ of the defendant as a section hand and track watchman; that a heavy sleet had fallen which covered the defendant's telegraph poles, wires and trees near the track, and rendered them liable to break and fall across the track; that for several days and nights prior to the 1st of February, he had been specially employed to patrol and watch a portion of the track, and especially a large elm tree overhanging the track about one and a half miles south of St. Charles; that by direction of the section boss he had built a large coal fire near this elm tree about six feet from the ends of the cross ties; that having become tired and cold from walking, he sat down on the ends of the cross ties near this fire and cleaned his lanterns, one of which was a white lantern, which was used as a signal of safety, and the other, a red lantern, which indicated danger; that he placed his white lantern, on the side of the railroad between the rails; that he was sitting between the lantern and fire; that after sitting in that position for some time he laid down on the ends of the cross ties and fell asleep; that between 2 and 3 o'clock in the morning, and while asleep, he was struck by a freight train on the side of the head and seriously injured; that the white lantern and fire were plainly visible for one-half mile up the track and that his presence on the end of the cross ties could have been discovered if the engineer in charge of the freight train had been on the lookout and the train stopped in time to have avoided striking him.

The defendant asked the court to give the jury a peremptory instruction at the conclusion of the plaintiff's testimony, which was overruled. Defendant's engineer and fireman testified in substance, that they discovered the lantern sitting on the track while some distance off; and that they whistled to the plaintiff to take it off the track, but that they did not discover the appellant until they had arrived at within fifty or sixty feet of where he was asleep and too late to avoid striking him. They also testified that the white light stationed on or near the track was a signal to proceed—that the road was free from obstructions.

In lying upon appellant's track and going to sleep, under the circumstances, appellee was guilty of the grossest negligence, and there is no testimony conducing to show any negligence on the part of appellant's servants in charge of the train, or that they discovered appellant's peril in time to have stopped the train. They could not have reasonably anticipated that appellee would assume a position of such danger, and after a careful perusal of this record we have reached the conclusion that the trial court should have given the jury a peremptory instruction at the conclusion of plaintiff's testimony. We are supported in these conclusions by the cases of Coleman's Adm'r v. P. C. & C. R. Co., 28 Ky. Law Rep., 401; Lyons v. I. C. R. R. Co., 22 Ky. Law Rep., 1032.

For reasons indicated the judgment is reversed and cause remanded for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

PROVIDENT SAVINGS LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY OF N. Y. v.
BAILEY, BY, &c.

(Filed April 27, 1904.)

1. Life insurance—Life tables—Right to change table—Appellant issued to John T. Bailey a policy on his life for $1,000, on March 16, 1891, in consideration of $15 paid and to be paid annually thereafter, which provided that after five full years premiums have been paid, a certain per cent. of the premiums should be applied to extend the insurance. Bailey paid the premiums regularly for ten years, but failed to pay the premium falling due March 16, 1901, and died September 24, following. At the time the policy was taken out, appellant was using the American Experience Mortality Table at 4 per cent., but at the time of the death of insured it had, by an act of the New York Legislature, changed to the Actuaries Table. By the former table the insurance was extended until September 26, 1901, and by the latter it expired September 16, 1901. Held—That the appellant had no right to change from the one table to the other so as to affect contracts made prior to the change, and the rights of the insured must be determined by the written contract, unaffected by any subsequent legislation of the State of New York.

Appeal from Graves Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

Appellant issued to John T. Bailey a policy, of date March 16, 1891, by which, in consideration of $15, it insured his life in the sum of $1,000 until March 16, 1892. The policy contained these stipulations: "And the said society further agrees to renew and extend this insurance upon like conditions, without medical re-examination, during each successive year of the life of the insured from date hereof, upon the payment on or before the 16th day of March in each such year, of the renewal premiums in accordance with the schedule rates, less the dividends awarded hereon.

"After deducting the expense charge, which is limited to $4 per annum on each $1,000 insured, the society agrees to divide the residue of each renewal premium received by it upon this policy, as follows: Such amount as shall be required for this policy's share of death losses will be appropriated as a death fund, to be used solely in settlement of death claims. The remainder thereof will be retained as a guaranty fund. The amounts so retained on account of this policy, will be used towards offsetting any increase in the premium on this policy from year to year; or, provided this policy, after five full years' premiums have been paid, be terminated solely by nonpayment of any stipulated premium when due, 80 per cent. of any amounts so retained, but not so used, will be applied to extend this insurance; or if application be made therefor while this policy is in full force and effect, to purchase paid-up insurance."

Bailey paid the premiums on the policy regularly for ten years, but failed to pay the premium falling due on March 16, 1901, and died on September 24, following. The only question to be determined is whether the policy was in force at his death by reason of the clause quoted providing for extended insurance after five annual premiums were paid. The defendant pleaded that after deducting the policy's share of death losses on the 16th of March, 1901, the sum applicable to extended insurance on the policy was $5.03, which extended it for the period of 184 days from March 16, or until September 16, 1901. The plaintiff replied that the surplus due on the policy was the sum of $6.27, 80 per cent. of which is $5.02; that this, calculated according to the American experience tables at 4 per cent., would extend the policy 194 days, and would make it expire on September 26, or two days after the insured died. She also averred that the defendant was using the American experience tables when the policy was issued, and continued to use this as the basis of valuation until November, 1893, when it adopted the actuarial experience tables, according to which the extended insurance on the policy would be 184 days, as alleged in the answer. A copy of the report of the defendant to the insurance commissioner of this State for the year ending December 31, 1891, was filed with the reply, in which, among other things, this question and answer appear:

"Q. Upon what table of mortality and rate of interest were the net premiums of the company computed?"

"A. American Experience at 4 per cent."

The defendant filed a rejoinder in which it denied the conclusions of the reply, but did not controvert the allegation that at the time the policy sued on was issued, it had adopted and was using the American experience tables of mortality. At the conclusion of the evidence on both sides, the court peremptorily instructed the jury to find for the plaintiff. The defendant complains of this, and also complains that the copy of the report made by it to the insurance bureau was allowed to be read in evidence.

We do not see that the defendant is in position to complain of the action of the court in admitting the copy of its report to be read, for it was only admitted to show what tables the defendant was using at the time the policy was issued, and there was no issue in the pleadings on this subject. But the copy was duly authenticated, and the original being a record of the auditor's office, the copy was admissible for all purposes for which the original would have been competent. (Kentucky Statutes, section 1827.) And as the report was required by law to be made by the defendant, and upon the faith of it, it had been treated by the department as complying with the law, without any repudiation by it of the report, after so many years the presumption of regularity should prevail. It is not presumed that the defendant failed to make a report, or violated the law. The writing purported to have been made by the defendant, was filed with the reply, and was not denied by the rejoinder, or as provided by section 537 of the Civil Code: "A writing purporting to have been made by a party, if referred to in and filed with a pleading of his adversary, may be read as genuine against him, unless he deny its genuineness by affidavit before the trial is begun."

It is conceded that if the extended insurance is computed by the American tables, the policy did not expire until September 26; but that if it is computed by the actuaries tables it expired on September 16. So the only question in the case, is by which tables shall the rights of the parties be determined? It is shown by parol evidence that the company changed from the American to the actuaries tables in November, 1893. It is also shown that by a statute of New York in the laws of 1893, policies were required to be valued by the insurance commissioner according to the actuaries tables; and that by another statute enacted in April, 1901, they were required to be valued according to the American tables. After the death of Bailey, the company wrote appellee's attorney that the policy was entitled to extended insurance for 194 days; but this letter was based on the New York Statute of 1901, the clerk who wrote it not observing that the policy was issued long before that act was passed. The New York Statutes have no extra-territorial effect, nor are they retrospective; therefore, neither the act of 1892 nor the act of 1901 has any effect on the rights of the parties under the policy which was issued in March, 1891. A State can make no law impairing the obligation of a contract. The rights of the parties must be determined by the written contract which they deliberately made, unaffected by any subsequent legislation in the State of New York.

The policy being silent as to the method or tables by which the extended insurance is to be calculated, parol evidence is competent to show what tables were then in use by the company; for it must be presumed that the parties contracted with reference to the tables which had been adopted by the company and were then in use by it. After the policy was issued and the rights of the parties were fixed by it, the company was not at liberty, without the consent of the assured or the beneficiary in the policy, to adopt another table less favorable to the assured and more favorable to the company; for if it could do this, instead of cutting the time down ten days, it might thus cut it down one-half or more; and so deprive the insured of a very substantial part of his contract. It has been held that when a person applies to an insurance company for a policy, he is presumed to apply for the form of policy in use by the company. The same rule must govern the insurance company when it issues a policy calling for extended insurance, and not defining by what tables the extended insurance is to be calculated. The parties must be presumed to contract with reference to the tables then in use; for else the policy would have no definite meaning; and after the policy is delivered, the company can not change its legal effect by any action of its, without the consent of the other parties to the contract. There being no issue as to what tables the defendant was using when the contract was made, only a question of law was raised, and the court properly instructed the jury peremptorily at the conclusion of the evidence. Besides, we do not find in the evidence any substantial conflict from any one who professes to know the facts. The conflict seems to be only as to matters of opinion on questions of law. The report to the insurance commissioner is nowhere denied or assailed and the report was sworn to by the president and secretary of the company.

Judgment affirmed.

CITIZENS NATIONAL BANK OF LEBANON v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed April 27, 1904.)

1. Taxation—National Banks—Fourth class cities—Auditor's agent—County court—Under Kentucky Statutes, sections 3531-3549, inclusive, part of charter of fourth class cities, providing a system for the assessment and collection of municipal taxes on all property liable thereto in fourth class cities, a demurrer was properly sustained to a proceeding in the Marion County Court by the auditor's agent to require the appellant, Citizens National Bank of Lebanon, to list its stockholders shares of stock for the years 1893 to 1902, inclusive, for taxes due the city of Lebanon, a city of the fourth class.

2. County and State taxes—Limitation—In a proceeding in the Marion County Court by the auditor's agent against the Citizens National Bank of Lebanon to require it to list the shares of its stockholders for State and county taxes for the years 1893 to 1902, inclusive, under the provisions of section 4241, Kentucky Statutes, and the act of the Kentucky Legislature of March 21, 1900, entitled "An act relating to the taxation of the shares of stock of national banks," the plea of limitation should have been sustained to all taxes not listed prior to five years next before the filing of said action.

3. Compromise—The appellant bank having paid its county taxes for the years 1898 and 1899, under an illegal compromise with the Marion fiscal court, it should be credited with the sum so paid in whatever is adjudged to be due the county under the principles herein enunciated.

4. Board of equalization—Action conclusive—The Marion County Board of Equalization, after being fully advised as to the number of shares of the stockholders of said bank and the actual value thereof for the years 1900-1901 and 1902, and having listed same at 60 per cent. of its real cash value, the fact that the board fixed its value too low for said years, can not now be remedied in a judicial proceeding, and both the State and county are bound by the action of their fiscal officers.

5. Franchise—Unauthorized procedure—In 1899 the appellant bank having listed the franchise of the bank with the auditor in the same manner as State banks were required to do, and paid to the auditor $312.75 as a franchise tax, which was an unauthorized procedure, the appellant should be required to list its property for that year and receive credit for the amount paid to the auditor on whatever is found to be due.

6. Discrimination—Federal Statute—The act of March 21, 1900, supra, is not in conflict with the Federal Statute, and does not discriminate against stock in national banks as compared with other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens.

Appeal from Marion Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

An auditor's agent instituted this proceeding in the Marion County Court, to require the appellant to list the shares of its stockholders for State, county and municipal taxation for the years 1898-1902, inclusive, under the provisions of section 4241, Kentucky Statutes, and an act approved March 21, 1900, entitled "An act relating to the taxation of the shares of stock of national banks."

A demurrer to so much of the proceeding as sought to list in the county court the property involved herein, for municipal purposes, was sustained by the court, as we think, correctly, Lebanon being a city of the fourth class; and it appearing from an inspection of subdivision 5 of the act for the government of cities of the fourth class (Kentucky Statutes, sections 3531-3549, inclusive), that they are provided with an elaborate system for the purpose of assessment and collection of municipal taxes on all property liable thereto. The bank then pleaded in bar to the proceeding against it the following defenses:

1st. The statute of limitation.

2d. As to the county taxes, two compromises with the fiscal court, by which it paid certain sums in 1898 and 1899 in full settlement of the county's claim for taxes against it.

3d. As to the claim for State taxes, it was admitted that the bank had fully paid all claims against it up to the year 1900, except for the year 1899. As to that year, it appears that the bank paid a franchise tax to the auditor, amounting to $813.75; this was pleaded in bar to any further taxation for the given year.

4th. For the years 1900, 1901 and 1902, the bank alleges that its property was duly and legally assessed by the county board of equalization, and that it fully paid its taxes for those years.

5th. The invalidity of the act of 1900.

There is no dispute in this case as to the facts; the questions arising are purely of law, and will be considered in the order above named. The county court listed the stock of appellant's shareholders for State and county taxation for all the years, as claimed in the petition of the Commonwealth, overruling all the defenses of appellant. Upon appeal to the circuit court, this judgment was substantially affirmed, of which appellant is now complaining. The plea of the statute of limitation should have been sustained, (Commonwealth v. Knute, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 2138; Chicago, St. Louis & N. O. R'y v. Commonwealth, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 2124, Commonwealth v. Citizens National Bank, ante 2100.) This eliminates all further consideration of any of the years involved in this litigation prior to five years next before the institution of this proceeding (1902).

As to the compromises with the fiscal court of Marion county, it appears that, at the time they were made, great confusion and uncertainty existed as to the legal status of national bank stock for the purpose of taxation, it being unknown whether or not, under the law as it then existed, it was taxable at all; or, at least, this was the opinion of the parties in interest here. Whereupon the bank and the fiscal court agreed that the former should pay certain sums in lieu of all claims of the latter for taxes against the shares of its stockholders. These compromises, under the provisions of section 52 of the Constitution, as expounded in the case of the city of Louisville v. Louisville Ry. Co., 23 Ky. Law Rep., 390, were ultra vires, and, therefore, void, as the court below correctly decided. The sums paid thereunder are to be credited upon whatever is found due to the county under the principles herein enunciated, upon the return of the case to the lower court.

In 1899, the franchise of the bank appears to have been listed with the auditor in the same manner as State banks are required to do, and $813.75 paid to that officer as a franchise tax. This was an unauthorized procedure, (Owensboro National Bank v. Owensboro, 173 U. S., 664), and, therefore, appellant should be required to list its property for that year, receiving credit for the amount paid the auditor on whatever is found due. For the years 1900, 1901 and 1902, the bank, by its proper officers, went before the county board of equalization, and stated all the facts concerning the shares of its stockholders that was necessary to enable those officials to lawfully assess it for taxation; the number of shares was given, their par value, and the highest price at which any of it had been sold, together with all other data by which an intelligent opinion could be acquired as to its actual cash value; whereupon the board, having all the facts before them, assessed the stock as so much cash, at 60 per cent. of its real value. This was held by the court as a mere assessment pro tanto, and the difference between the assessment and the actual value of the whole stock was considered as omitted property, and listed for taxation for the years named. In this, we think, the court erred. It was the duty of the board of equalization to assess the property for the years involved, at its fair cash value; but the fact that they assessed it too low can not be remedied in a judicial procedure; both the State and the county in this regard are bound by the action of their fiscal officers.

It is urgently insisted by appellant that the act of March 21, 1900, regulating the taxation of national bank stock, is void, because it permits an illegal discrimination against stock in national banks as compared with other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens, contrary to the provisions of the Federal statute authorizing its taxation. This question was fully settled in the case of the Commonwealth v. Citizens National Bank, cited above. In that case, the court, speaking through Judge Hobson, elaborately discussed the phase of the question now under consideration, and upheld the act by showing that the very purpose of the Legislature was to insure equality of taxation between State and National banks, and holding that, in the assessment of the shares of the stockholders in the latter institutions, no discrimination was to be made as between it and the property of the former; that whatever deductions were authorized and given to the State banks when their property was assessed, was also to be given when the shares of the stockholders in National banks were assessed, under the provisions of the act.

Appellee prayed a cross appeal from so much of the judgment as credited appellant with over payments under the provisions of the Hewitt bill; this cross appeal was prosecuted because the auditor had already certified to the sheriff of Marion county the amount due from the Commonwealth, and directed that officers to credit it on whatever execution came to his hands against the bank in this proceeding, and, therefore, as the judgment also credits appellant with the same sum, it thereby secures a double credit. The court very properly allowed the credit in the judgment; the officer will, of course, not credit it a second time when the execution comes to his hands.

For the reasons indicated the judgment is affirmed on the cross appeal and reversed on the direct appeal for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

EBELHARR, &c. v. TENNELLY.

(Filed April 27, 1904.)

1. Execution sale—Equity of redemption—A lot sold and conveyed by H. to T. and L. for a recited cash consideration, and at the same time H. taking from the vendees an agreement in writing to reconvey the property to him upon the repayment of the recited consideration within two years, H. has an interest in the lot that may be levied and sold under an execution against him.

2. Levy—Misnaming interest—The sheriff in his return in the writ, after describing the property, denominated it as H.'s equity of redemption therein, and even conceding that he erred in calling it an equity of redemption, the law, which regards the substance rather than the name of things, will hold that he levied on that which he described rather than on that which he misnamed.

George V. Triplett and Miller & Todd for appellants.

Wilfred Carrico for appellee.

Appeal from Daviess Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

R. G. Hill was the owner of a lot and improvements thereon, situated in Owensboro, Ky., which he conveyed by deed, absolute, upon its face, for the recited consideration of $3,000 cash in hand paid, to J. R. Tennelly and J. R. Lancaster, at the same time taking from the vendees their agreement in writing to reconvey the property to him upon the repayment to them of the recited consideration within two years thereafter.

While the title to the property was in this condition, on the 27th day of August, 1902, an execution issued from the office of the Daviess Circuit Court, from C. G. Thixton against Hill, for the purpose of satisfying a judgment for the sum of $302, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum from the 9th day of April, 1896, until paid, and $10.70 costs; and on the 17th day of September, 1902, another execution issued from the same office, in favor of W. G. Burnett against Hill, for the purpose of enforcing the collection of the sum of $43.55, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum from the 6th day of September, 1896, until paid, and $10.80 costs. These two writs came duly to the hands of the sheriff of Daviess county, and were by him levied upon the equity of redemption of Hill in the property mentioned, and on the 6th day of October, 1902, in pursuance of the tenor of the writs, the property was sold by the officer at public sale, and purchased by J. R. Tennelly for the sum of $500, for which he executed bond, as by law and the terms of the sale required. Subsequently Lancaster and Tennelly reconveyed the property mortgaged to them according to the tenor of the contemporaneous writing held by Hill.

On the 1st day of November, 1902, Hill and wife conveyed the property to the appellant, Frank Ebelharr, and on the 14th day of May, 1903, appellee Tennelly instituted this action in equity in the Daviess Circuit Court against Hill and Ebelharr for the enforcement of his lien for the amount of the purchase money paid by him, with interest as by law authorized. Upon trial of the case the chancellor awarded appellee a judgment as prayed for in his petition, to reverse which this appeal is prosecuted.

The question arising upon the face of the record is one purely of law. The levy of the officer, so far as this case is concerned, is as follows: "Levied this execution, No. 1678, book 20, * * * upon equity of redemption in a certain house and lot on the south side of Main street, between Frederica and St. Elizabeth streets, and fronting 40 feet thereon and running back southwardly 42 feet, and bounded on the east by the Deposit Bank; on the south by the property of the Kirk heirs; on the west by an alley, and on the north by Main street. Levied on as the property of R. G. Hill. * * * Above named property, the store or saloon building on Main street, was conveyed to J. R. Lancaster and J. R. Tennelly on the 14th day of February, 1902, at $3,000, and Hill reserved the right to redeem same within two years. It is this right of redemption that is now levied on. This 27th day of August, 1902."

No question is made as to the regularity of the proceedings leading up to the execution sale except as to the levy, it being contended by appellant that the levy of the officer was void, because he describes the interest of the execution debtor as an equity of redemption, and that an equity of redemption is not subject to execution; that, therefore, the levy was void, and all subsequent proceedings thereunder of no avail. This is the sole objection urged by appellant. This contention is in the very teeth of the statutes.

Section 1684, Kentucky Statutes, provides that if property sold at execution sale does not realize two-thirds of its appraised value, the execution debtor and his representatives shall have one year in which to redeem it, upon the terms therein set forth, and section 1686 is as follows: "The right of redemption herein provided for shall be liable to sale under execution."

"Section 1691. If it appears in the proceedings aforesaid (motion for possession) that the title of the defendant in the execution to the land sold was only equitable, or the land encumbered by mortgage lien, the court shall, if the purchaser require it, subject the land to the payment of the debt of the execution creditor in the same manner it would do if there was a return of 'no property found;' and may cause such pleadings to be filed and the parties brought before the court as may be necessary to a final equitable judgment in respect to the rights of all parties interested.

"Section 1709. When the defendant in an execution owns the legal title to the land encumbered by lien for the purchase money, or who shall own the legal title in any real or personal estate, and shall have created a bona fide encumbrance thereon by mortgage, deed of trust, or otherwise, before an execution has created a lien on the same, the interest of the defendant in such property may be levied on and sold subject to such encumbrance."

It thus appears that equities of redemption, whether they arise under sections 1684 or 1709, may be levied on by execution by express provision of the statute. Evidently the officer in the case at bar was proceeding under section 1709; but appellant urges that, if so, he did not bring himself within the terms of the section, for the reason that he denominated in his levy the interest subjected, an equity of redemption, whereas, it is said that the interest of the debtor which can be subjected under the section in hand is a legal title, and not an equitable one. We think this position is technically unsound. The interest described in section 1709 as subject to execution is the original equity of redemption somewhat modified by our modern procedure. Bouvier in his law dictionary defines equity of redemption to be "a right which the mortgagor of an estate has of redeeming it, after it has been forfeited by law by nonpayment at the time appointed of the money secured by the mortgage to be paid, by paying the amount of the debt, interest and costs." (2 Blackstone, 159.)

We have now two kinds of equities of redemption, one statutory and the other the original right of redemption, which relieved the debtor of the harsh forfeiture of his estate for nonpayment of the mortgage debt within the time stipulated, modified as before stated. In the Am. and Eng. Ency. of Law, 2d edition, volume 11, page 213, it is said: "The statutory right to redeem differs essentially from the equity of redemption proper. It is not an estate in the mortgaged property, but is a mere personal privilege of redeeming the property within a certain time after the mortgage has been foreclosed. But it exists only in such cases and in favor of such persons as are designated in the statute by which it is created."

On page 209 it is said: "An equity of redemption is an estate in the mortgaged property, and is subject to all the incidents of ownership."

Page 211: "At common law an equity of redemption was not subject to levy and sale under execution; but the common-law doctrine as to the equitable nature of the mortgagor's estate has been modified, and the remedy by execution has been extended in many jurisdictions so as to permit an equity of redemption to be sold in execution against the owner. As a general rule, however, the right to sell an equity of redemption under execution does not include the right to sell under an execution on a judgment for the mortgage debt, though in some jurisdictions the rule is otherwise." * * *

In the case of Crow v. Tinsley, &c., 6 Dana, 402, Chief Justice Robertson said: "The statute of this State, subjecting equities of redemption to sale under executions, could furnish no greater right than that which was sold; and it is evident that, in this case, no other interest than the general equity to which Daniel McIlvoy was entitled at the time of the sale was sold or bought under the executions." (Brace and Wife v. Shaw, 16 B. Mon., 75; Bronston v. Robinson, 4 B. Mon., 142; Waller v. Tate, &c., 4 B. Mon., 529; although in the last two cases it was held that an equity of redemption could not be sold under an execution issued to enforce payment of a mortgage debt.) These cases are cited for the purpose, and clearly show, that the sheriff properly named the interest levied on an equity of redemption. But, waiving all this, the officer, evidently being in fear of the over-refined casuistry involved in appellant's criticism, did not trust the validity of his levy alone to his accuracy of legal terminology, but described, by apt paraphrase, the identical interest upon which he levied; so that, even conceding that he erred in denominating Hill's interest in the mortgaged land as an equity of redemption, the law, which regards the substance rather than the names of things, will hold that he levied upon that which he described, rather than that which he misnamed.

For the reasons indicated the judgment is affirmed.

PARKERSON, ADM'X v. LOUISVILLE & NASHVILLE R. R. CO.

(Filed April 27, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Railroads—Damages—Evidence—In an action against a railroad company for the death of appellant's intestate, the evidence being conclusive that the horse of deceased became unmanageable and was struck by the side of a passing car after the engine had passed over the crossing where the accident occurred, the judgment in favor of the appellee will be upheld.

2. Same—Instructions—Where the bill of exceptions shows no objection by a plaintiff to instructions offered by a defendant and no exceptions to the action of the court in giving them, there is no ground of complaint against the action of the court in giving them, especially where plaintiff's action was not prejudiced by the instructions.

S. M. Payton for appellant.

Poston & Moorman and Benjamin D. Warfield for appellee.

Appeal from Larue Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

Appellant's intestate while passing over a railroad crossing between Lyon's Station and New Haven was struck by a freight train and killed. She filed suit to recover for his death, and at the conclusion of all the evidence the court submitted the case to the jury, who found for the defendant. Lyon's Station is south of New Haven. The freight train was going north. The accident occurred about dusk in November. The deceased was last seen, riding on horseback down the road towards the crossing.

He was then about three hundred yards from the crossing. The person, who saw him went across the field to the railroad and soon after he reached the track the train passed him. There was a pond on the side of the road, near the railroad. Fresh tracks were seen going from the road to the pond, and from the pond up towards the railroad crossing, which was only a few feet away. These tracks were found the next morning and were followed to close to the railroad track and there tracks were seen as if twisting about. The horse was found north of the crossing on the cattle guard and fifteen feet from the center of the road. He seemed to have been struck on the hip. The body of the deceased was found sixty feet north of the crossing. On the iron arm of the rear flat car of the train, which was next to the caboose some horse hair was found. The train consisted of about thirty cars and was running, according to the testimony of the railroad men, twenty five miles an hour, or, according to the testimony for the plaintiff, forty miles an hour. The conductor and fireman, who testified to being on the outlook, saw nothing of the horse or rider. The conductor, who was in the cupola of the caboose, felt a jar as he passed the crossing. A brakeman, who was on the front end of the caboose, saw the form of a man come against it, but did not see the horse. The deceased was struck on his hip. The claim of the railroad company is that, after the engine passed the crossing, the horse became unmanageable in his effort to get away, being held by the deceased, backed in his struggles against the car next to the caboose. The claim of the plaintiff is that the caboose and rear car had been separated from the front part of the train and that after the train passed the deceased went upon the crossing and was struck by the loose cars which were following on after the train, when he supposed the train had passed. On this question the weight of the evidence is clearly with the defendant. It is a down grade, and if these cars had run down the grade loose there would have been great danger of a collision when the train stopped at New Haven, which was not far off. There was no collision there and nothing unusual occurred. The testimony of persons there, who were about when the train came in, tends to confirm to the testimony of the railroad men that there was no separation of the train. The man who saw the deceased and who went to the railroad track, reaching it only a short distance south of the crossing, testifies to no separation of the train, although introduced as a witness for the plaintiff. Besides, two witnesses, who were introduced also for the plaintiff, who were sitting in a buggy a short distance south of the crossing and saw the train pass, testify to no separation of the cars. Besides all this is the fact that the hair of the horse was found on the side of the car, and that the horse when found was on the same side of the track and next to the pond.

There was some evidence on behalf of the plaintiff that the proper signal were not given to the approach of the train, but on this subject, too, the weight of the evidence is with the appellee. The court gave the jury four instructions, asked by the plaintiff, to which the defendant excepted. He refused two instructions asked by the plaintiff, to which she excepted. It is insisted that these instructions should have been given. The first of these instructions was substantially given in an instruction asked by the defendant. The other was properly refused. By it the court was requested to instruct the jury to find for the plaintiff if the train was running at a negligent and dangerous rate of speed, and by reason of this the deceased was struck and killed. The crossing was out in the country, away from any station or town, and at such places the railroad company is at liberty to run its trains, so far as strangers are concerned, at any rate of speed it sees fit. Were the rule otherwise it would be impracticable for railroad trains to make time as required by the demands of the public service. (Louisville & Nashville R. R. Co. v. Cummins' Adm'r, 28 Ky. Law Rep., 681.)

The defendant moved the court to give the jury ten instructions. Of these the court gave seven and refused to give the remainder, to which it excepted; but the bill of exceptions shows no objection by the plaintiff to the instructions offered by the defendant and no exception by her to the action of the court in giving the seven instructions asked by the defendant. She is not in a position, therefore, to complain of the action of the court in giving the instructions asked by the defendant. And on the whole case we are unable to see that she was prejudiced in any way by these instructions, for on the merits the preponderance of the evidence was with the defendant, and the jury could not well have reached any other conclusion than that the horse became unmanageable and was struck by the side of the passing car after the engine had passed over the crossing before the horse and rider approached it.

Judgment affirmed.

ARMITAGE v. MT. STERLING OIL AND GAS CO.

(Filed April 27, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Oil leases—Contracts—It was proper to sustain a demurrer to a petition in an action seeking the cancellation of a lease to bore for oil and gas where the time expressed in the contract for boring a well had not expired, although operations had not begun in the county as provided in the contract, there being no averment in the petition that that part of the contract relating to the well could not have been performed within the time stipulated.

Osborn, Caudel & Day for appellant.

Robert H. Winn for appellee.

Appeal from Menifee Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

On the 26th of May, 1900, the appellee, the Mt. Sterling Oil and Gas Co., obtained from the appellant, H. B. Armitage, a written lease giving them the exclusive right to drill and operate for petroleum, oil and gas, coal and minerals upon a tract of 470 acres of land owned by him, situated in Menifee county, Kentucky, for a term of ten years, and as much longer as oil, gas, coal and minerals were found thereon. The consideration therefor recited in the lease is that the oil and gas company should give to the appellant one-tenth of the petroleum, oil, gas and minerals obtained on the premises, and deliver the same in pipe lines to his credit. It was further agreed that if gas was found in sufficient quantities to market and be piped from the premises to such market, the lessor was to receive $100 per annum for each well so long as the gas from this well was marketed. The lessee further agreed to sink a test well on the land within three years, and to commence operations in the county inside of six months. It was expressly stipulated that the lease was to become void if the well was not completed within three years, unless the lessees should pay rentals for the premises at the rate of ten cents per acre during the time the drilling was delayed. On the 18th of February, 1903, the appellant instituted this suit for a cancellation of the lease on the ground that appellee had failed to commence operation in the county of Menifee within six months from the date of the lease, and had also failed to sink a test well on the leased land in accordance with the terms of the contract. The defendant filed a general demurrer to the petition, which was sustained by the trial court and plaintiff's petition dismissed, and he has appealed.

Whilst under the terms of their contract the oil company were to commence operations in the county of Menifee within six months, the only express provision for the forfeiture of the lease recited in the contract is the provision that it was to become void if the well was not completed within three years from the date thereof, and the petition discloses that the suit for the cancellation of the lease was instituted several months before the expiration of the three years given appellee in which to complete the well, and there is no averment that they could not have performed this condition of their contract within the stipulated time. And the general rule appears to be that if the causes for a forfeiture of a lease are distinctly specified and recited therein, that courts will not decree such forfeitures for breaches of other provisions of the contract of lease for which the parties themselves have not prescribed this penalty. ("The Law Relating to Oil and Gas," by Thornton, section 91; Core v. New York Petroleum Co., 48 S. E. Rep., 128; Harris v. Ohio Oil Co., 57 Ohio St., 118; Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence, section 459.) But such contracts are construed most strongly against the lessee and favorable to the lessor. If the oil company does not, within three years, sink a paying well on the premises, its rights under the contract will not be extended by a mere offer on their part to pay rent for the premises at the rate of ten cents per acre if appellant should decide to treat the lease as at an end. (Munroe v. Armstrong, 96 Pa., 307; Heintz v. Short, 149 Pa., 286; Steelsmith v. Gartland, 44 L. R. A., 107; Woodland Oil Co. v. Craford, 34 L. R. A., 62; Parish Fork Oil Co. v. Bridgewater Gas Co., 59 L. R. A., 567.)

It was decided by this court in Shamberg, &c. v. Farmer's Adm'r, 18 Ky. Law Rep., 514, that leases of this character are not void for want of mutuality.

For reasons indicated the judgment is affirmed.

MAYFIELD WOOLEN MILLS v. FRAZIER, BY, &c.

(Filed April 27, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Damages—Master and servant—The evidence showing that appellee, while in the employ of appellant as bobbin girl, was compelled, against her will, by the weaver to go to a bobbin box which was in an insecure place, and upon going, as she was ordered, was painfully injured. She was not a fellow servant of the weavers, and it was proper for the jury to determine whether she should be regarded as assuming the risk, and they having returned a verdict for her it will not be disturbed.

W. M. Smith for appellant.

Wm. McKee Duncan for appellees.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Common Pleas Branch, Second Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

Appellee recovered judgment against appellant for $200 for personal injuries received by her while in its service. The fact of the case, as stated by her, are as follows: She was fourteen years old, and was bobbin girl; that it was her duty to collect the bobbins from the weavers; each weaver ran two looms and threw the empty bobbins into a box. It was appellee's duty to take the bobbins out of the box. There was a box at the end of the aisle between the looms in which the bobbins were placed, but appellee stated that there was another box behind one of the looms which could not be reached from the aisle referred to, and that she was directed by the weaver to take the bobbins out of this box. In order to get to this box it was necessary to pass along a narrow aisle and then in behind the looms in the narrow space between some revolving cog wheels, which were unprotected, and the wall. Appellee said she declined to go, thinking it was dangerous, but being peremptorily ordered by the weaver to go, finally went, and while she was stooping down to get the bobbins her hair was caught in the cog wheels mentioned, and much of it was pulled out, inflicting upon her a painful injury. The proof for appellant tended to show that there was no box back of the loom, and it is also insisted for appellant that appellee worked under the floor boss and was only a fellow servant of the weaver.

If there was no box back of the loom for appellee to get the bobbins out of, she had no business there, and should not recover. But appellee testifies positively the box was there; her testimony is straightforward and carries with it an air of sincerity. The witnesses for the defendant do not positively testify the box was not there, and in view of the character of their answers, taken as a whole, we conclude that the jury were warranted in finding for appellee on this question. It is shown by the evidence that it was the duty of the girl to wait on the weavers. The purpose of her position was to keep the empty bobbins out of the way of the weavers, and to do this it was incumbent on her to empty the boxes when called on by them. The floor boss did not direct her in this matter; he only had general charge of the room. She was not, therefore, a fellow servant with the weavers as it was her duty to wait on the weavers in order that their weaving might not be interrupted, and she was not directed in her duties by anybody else.

The instructions of the court aptly and clearly submitted the issue to the jury, and the amount of the verdict is not excessive for the injuries appellee received. The question of contributory negligence was properly left to the jury, as the child was only fourteen years old. The place where she was hurt was an unfit place to assign a child of fourteen years to work in; and if she was specially directed to work at this place, in view of her age, it was a question for the jury whether she should be regarded as assuming the risk. Kelly v. Barber Asphalt Co., 93 Ky., 863; Baird v. Deering, 13 Ky. Law Rep., 271; Cincinnati, &c., R. R. Co. v. Finnell, 22 Ky. Law Rep., 86, do not apply.

Judgment affirmed.

BROWN v. BROWN'S ADM'R, &c.

(Filed April 28, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Marriage—Antenuptial contracts—Appellant, whose age was twenty-four years, and who was fairly well educated, having entered an antenuptial contract agreeing, in lieu of dower or homestead, to accept at the death of appellee's intestate, a life estate in fifty acres of land and $500 in personalty, and having as the proof shows advised with her uncle about this contract who was a lawyer, and it appearing further took time to consider the matter of entering into the contract, it was properly adjudged by the chancellor that the contract should be upheld.

Bennett, Robbins & Thomas and Robbins & Thomas for appellant.

J. H. Shelton for Lillian Brown.

Bullock & Smith for appellee.

Appeal from Hickman Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

This is an appeal by appellant, Hattie Brown, to test the validity of an antenuptial contract entered into by her with appellee's intestate, W. M. Brown. By her petition she alleged that the contract was procured by fraud and imposition. The contract is in words and figures as follows: "This marriage contract, made and entered into this the 14th day of April, 1900, by and between W. M. Brown, party of the first part, and Hattie Champion, party of the second part, witnesseth: That the party of the second part does hereby agree that she will, if the party of the first part dies before the party of the second part, accept in lieu of dower or homestead, as her interest in the estate of the party of the first part as his widow, a lifetime interest in fifty acres of land in Hickman county, Kentucky, and $500 worth of personal property and one year's provisions.

"The above amount the party of the second part agrees to accept at the death of the party of the first part as his widow, in lieu of any or all interest she might have, by law or otherwise, in the estate of the above named party of the first part, and party of the first part hereby agrees to give the party of the second part the above-named amount at his death. Witness our hands the day and date above written."

It appears from this writing that this contract was prepared on the 14th of April, 1900, yet it was not signed by the parties until the 2d day of May thereafter. The lower court heard the evidence and adjudged against the appellant, and adjudged that she be allotted fifty acres of land surrounding the home and $500 in cash and one year's provisions. We have examined the evidence with care and deem it useless to relate it in detail and we are of opinion that it preponderates in favor of the fact that Brown, in the obtaining of this contract, treated appellant fairly and was guilty of no misrepresentations or concealments in the character or effect of the contract or the amount of his estate or otherwise. It shows that the first proposition from Brown to make a marriage contract was by letter written to appellant about a month before the execution of this contract. This letter contained, in substance, the contract as it was made. This letter was presented to her uncle, who was a lawyer, and she advised with him and others with reference thereto; she had time and opportunity to investigate as to the amount and character of his property; she was twenty-four years of age, had a reasonably fair education and a good mind, while he was fifty-two years of age and a reasonably prosperous farmer, had seven children by a former wife, most all of them under age and some of them small, and had an estate at the time of the marriage of about $12,000 or $14,000, most of it being in land. The proof shows that she entered into this contract with a proper understanding of the situation and surroundings, and that she was not unduly influenced by her husband or overreached by reason of her confidence in or her love for him, for it is shown that she stated that she had no love for Mr. Brown, that it was entirely a business affair with her in entering into the marriage and contract.

It was also shown by many witnesses that during the marital relations and after her husband's death, which occurred in the latter part of 1902, and after she was fully apprised of the full extent of his estate she frequently expressed herself as satisfied with this contract and desired to settle by it and did not want or ask anything more. Under these circumstances the contract will be upheld. (Forwood v. Forwood, 86 Ky., 115; Simpson v. Simpson, 24 Ky., 586; Brooks v. Brooks, 22 Ky. Law Rep., 555.)

It is not apparent from the judgment of the lower court whether or not the property, allowed by section 1403 of the statutes to widows and infant children, was set apart to them. It is true that, under this contract, the widow is not entitled to same, but the infant children are—her child by him as well as his infant children by his first wife. If this has not been done, and if the personal property has been disposed of, then the court should adjudge to them money in lieu of property allowed them by the statute.

Wherefore, the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

KING v. HUNI, &c.

(Filed June 7, 1904.)

1. Liens on land—Nonresident—Notice—Failure to give bond—Sale of land—Innocent purchaser—Re-opening judgment—Resale—The appellant, King, conveyed a tract of land to John Gallus for $2,000, $1,000 of which was paid in hand and three notes given for the deferred payments, with lien retained on the land. Subsequently appellee, Marie Huni, took a mortgage on the land for $1,000, money loaned by her to Gallus, to pay the first $1,000 on said land, which mortgage was subject to the $1,000 purchase money owing to King. At the maturity of King's notes he brought suit to enforce his lien, in which suit appellee was made a party as a nonresident defendant, but had no actual notice of the suit (she then residing in California), and no bond was given by the plaintiff to protect her as such nonresident. Judgment was rendered enforcing plaintiff's lien and for a sale of the land, and adjudging that appellee had no interest in the land. At the sale of the land appellant King bought it and sold and conveyed it to Bertha Gallus, wife of John Gallus, and took her notes for the price, $1,615.42, secured by lien thereon. After the purchase by King and his sale to Mrs. Gallus, and within the five years allowed by the Code, section 414, appellee filed her suit setting up her mortgage lien, and asking a resale of the land, and the enforcement of her lien thereon subject to the prior lien of King for purchase money due him on the original sale to John Gallus. Held—That all the parties, King, John Gallus and Bertha Gallus, having actual knowledge of appellee's mortgage, the lower court properly re-opened the case, set aside the sale to King, and the sale by King to Mrs. Gallus, and rendered a judgment enforcing appellee's lien for her debt and a resale of the land therefor, subject to the prior lien of appellant King for his original purchase-money notes.

Brown & Vance and R. D. Vance for appellant.

Drury & Drury and R. L. Greene for appellee Huni.

Montgomery Merritt for appellee Gallus.

Appeal from Henderson Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle

July 24, 1893, the appellant, C. L. King, conveyed to John Gallus seventy-six acres of land in Henderson county for $2,000. Of this amount Gallus paid $1,000 in cash, and for the remainder gave his three notes, one of $400, payable in one year, and two others of $300 each, payable in two and three years after date, respectively.

In October, 1893, Gallus and wife executed to the appellee, Marie Huni, a mortgage upon the land purchased of King to secure the payment of a note for $1,000, which they gave her in July previously, the $1,000 being borrowed money which they got of her and used to make the cash payment to King upon the land at the time of its conveyance to John Gallus. The note and mortgage to the appellee, Huni, only bore interest at the rate of 4½ per cent. In 1897 the appellant, King, brought suit in the lower court to recover of John Gallus the amount of the three notes given him in part payment for the land, and to enforce the lien retained in the deed to secure their payment. By an amended petition and warning order the appellee, Marie Huni, who was and is a resident of California, was made a party.

She did not appear or set up her mortgage lien, and without requiring of the appellant, King, a bond for her protection as a nonresident, the court rendered judgment declaring that appellee had no interest in the land, ordered its sale to pay the notes of the appellant, King. The sale followed, and the appellant became the purchaser at the sum due upon his notes, and the costs of the action. The sale was confirmed and he received a deed from the commissioner conveying him the land.

Not long after his purchase of the land, the appellant, King, conveyed it to Bertha Gallus, wife of John Gallus, for $1,615.42, and for this sum she gave notes secured by lien on the land. After the sale of the land by the commissioner and its purchase by King, and within the five years allowed by section 414, Civil Code, the appellee, Marie Huni, filed her petition in the lower court, seeking to set aside the judgment under which the land was sold by the commissioner, and setting up her mortgage lien on the land, asked its enforcement, subject to the prior vendor's lien in favor of appellee, King, for the amount of the three notes which had been executed to him by John Gallus. At the time of filing her petition appellee gave the necessary bond required of a nonresident by the section of the Code, supra.

The former action of King v. Gallus was redocketed and consolidated with the action brought by appellee, after appellee filed answer, making defense and setting up her mortgage debt and lien. Following the consolidation certain amendments to her petition were made by appellee, and answers were filed thereto by King, Gallus and wife, to which appellee filed replies. Proof was taken by the parties upon the issues presented by the pleadings, and upon a submission of the case the court rendered judgment setting aside the former judgment and ordering a resale of the land, first to satisfy the balance due appellant, King, upon the original three notes executed to him by John Gallus, and then to satisfy the mortgage debt and lien of the appellee, and giving Bertha Gallus judgment over against the appellant, King, for the sums paid by her on her purchase of the land from him. The appellants, King, and Bertha Gallus, complain of that judgment, and by this appeal seek its reversal.

It is insisted for appellants that Mrs. Gallus, in receiving the conveyance from King, was an innocent purchaser, for which reason her title should not have been disturbed. Section 417, Civil Code, provides that "the title of purchasers in good faith to any property sold under attachment or judgment shall not be affected by the new trial permitted by section 414, except the title of property obtained by the plaintiff and not bought of him in good faith by others."

In Kellar v. Stanley, 86 Ky., 246, this court, in defining the meaning of that section of the Code, said: "By 'good faith' as judicially interpreted, is meant a purchase made, not merely for a consideration, but also without notice to the purchaser, of an adverse claim to the property by others. For the taking of an estate after notice of a prior right makes one a mala fide purchaser."

Mrs. Gallus united with her husband in the mortgage to appellee, and though it be conceded that she was not presumed to have knowledge of the fact that her husband had not paid the mortgage debt, notwithstanding no release of the mortgage appears to have been made of record, we find that it was directly averred in the amended petition filed by appellee after the consolidation of the two causes, that "C. L. King and Bertha Gallus, defendants herein, had notice of the validity of plaintiff's mortgage and of her debt, and that it was an adverse claim upon the premises when they acquired or attempted to acquire interests therein."

We have been unable to find that this averment was ever denied, either by King or Mrs. Gallus, in the answers or other pleadings filed by them.

Consequently it must be taken as confessed. This seems to dispose of the first contention of appellants. It is, however, further contended by appellant, Bertha Gallus, that she is entitled to be substituted to the lien of King for the amounts which she claims to have paid him. The payments alleged by her to have been paid King on her purchase of the land from him, are denied by appellee. The only witness introduced by appellants to prove the alleged payments, as well as the good faith of the transaction between Mrs. Gallus and King, was the husband of the former, and as he was successfully impeached, and proved to be unworthy of belief upon oath by a number of his neighbors, and no effort was made to sustain his reputation or otherwise support his testimony, it necessarily follows that it is entitled to little, if any, weight.

It is, furthermore, significant that neither King or Mrs. Gallus testified in the case, though the latter might have done so instead of her husband. It does no violence to the rights of the parties to infer that neither King or Mrs. Gallus could have denied, or were willing to deny that the latter at the time of her purchase of the land had full knowledge of the existence of appellee's mortgage, and that the debt which it was given to secure had not been paid. This being true, it would seem to require no great stretch of faith to reach the conclusion contended for by appellee, that the husband of Mrs. Gallus was the real purchaser of the land from King, and that the deed was made to the wife for the purpose of defeating the mortgage lien of appellee. Under the facts of this case, we do not think the doctrine of subrogation contended for should be made to apply. The cases relied on by counsel for appellants to support this contention can not, we apprehend, be appealed to by any one who, like Mrs. Gallus, is not a purchaser without notice, or in good faith. At most she could have legally asked no more than a judgment against King for the amount she paid him on the land. This relief was given her by the lower court, and as it is not claimed that King is insolvent, such relief is as effectual as if she had been substituted to the lien given him by the judgment appealed from.

We regard the contention of appellants, that the note produced by appellee is not the one secured by the mortgage, as being without support from the evidence. It is admitted that the $1,000 mentioned in the mortgage was loaned John Gallus by appellee. The mortgage recites that a note was given by Gallus for this amount. There is no averment in the answers that there was any fraud or mistake in the mortgage in that respect.

John Gallus, who is utterly discredited, as already stated, was the only witness introduced to contradict appellee as to the identity of the note. It may be, indeed, there is some evidence tending to show that a renewal note was given for the mortgage dated in 1896, to be used by appellee, together with the mortgage, as collateral security for a loan which she received of a friend, and which loan she afterwards repaid, and by reason thereof received a return of the note and mortgage. The renewal was probably lost, but if so, the special bond of indemnity given by appellee will protect appellants and John Gallus from any future loss upon or by reason of the renewal note. At any rate, we do not think there is any doubt from the evidence that the note filed by appellee is the one for which the mortgage was given, and there is no claim that the amount thereof has ever been paid. It is clear that the obligation secured by the mortgage was not in parol, and, therefore, limitation can not defeat appellee's right to a judgment for her debt and the enforcement of her mortgage lien. So upon the whole case it is apparent that if appellee had set up, on the original trial of this action, the claim finally presented by her, she would have been entitled to judgment for her debt and the enforcement of her mortgage lien subject to the vendor's lien held by the appellant, King. It follows, therefore, that the lower court did not err in re-opening the case or in rendering the judgment appealed from.

Wherefore, the judgment is affirmed.

CENTRAL COAL AND IRON CO. v. PIERCE.

(Filed April 28, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Master and servant—Damages—Appellee, a motorman in charge of a train of coal cars, came in contact, while operating his train, with a car that had been dropped, and was injured. It appeared that the lights on the car were insufficient, and while they were known to be by appellee, he claims his superior in charge of them had promised to repair them only a few days before the accident occurred. This question and one as to whether he was negligent in occupying the front seat with his back to the car at the time of the accident, were questions for the jury and their finding will not be disturbed, the evidence supporting the verdict.

2. Same—It is not negligence per se to operate a dangerous machine in the only way provided to operate it. An act may be dangerous, yet not be at all negligent.

H. P. Taylor for appellant.

Glenn & Ringo for appellee.

Appeal from Ohio Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

The questions tried in this case were whether appellee, a motorman operating a motor and train or coal cars in appellant's mine, was injured because of the employer's negligence in failing to provide suitable and reasonably sufficient lights upon the motor car, and along the track, so that those in charge of the machine could discover obstacles on the track in due season to stop the car and avoid a collision, that is, whether the master furnished the servant a reasonably safe place and reasonably safe appliances in which, and with which, to do his work, and, whether appellee's contributory negligence was such that but for it the injury would not have occurred.

The contention of appellant is that the lights having been in the same condition for some weeks, the danger from their insufficiency was necessarily an obvious one, apparent alike to the servant and master, and that, therefore, the former assumed the danger as an incident to his employment. It is true that the absence of lights in a coal mine is a thing that the operator knows as well as the employer does; that the lights on the motor car were insufficient, and that its operation in the mine in its then condition was dangerous is admitted by appellee in his testimony. But he claims that his superior, the electrician in charge of the mine, promised only a few days before the accident to replace the weak light by repairing and putting on the machine the stronger one that had been formerly used. Under this promise appellee continued to use the machine. Whether the time that had passed since the promise and before the injury was such an unreasonable one that the servant should have known therefrom that the employer did not intend to fulfill it, was submitted to the jury.

The motor car was so constructed that a seat was provided at each end, so that the motorman could be facing the way the train was moving. The car was not turned, but was operated by a trolley, reversible as the familiar street car trolleys are. A helper also accompanied the motorman, and he also was supposed to ride upon the motor car. On the occasion when appellee was hurt by his train colliding with a stranded car which had been lost from a preceding train, he was riding on the front seat with his back in the direction his train was going, instead of being in the rear seat. But he contends that the seats were only about twenty inches or less wide, and would not accommodate both the operator and helper, and that one of them was compelled to use the front seat. As to the width of the seats the evidence was conflicting, but the weight of it seems to be with appellee's version. Whether his riding upon the front seat was such contributory negligence as that but for it he would not have been injured, was one of the questions submitted to the jury; that it was a more dangerous place than the rear seat is manifest. But if both could not occupy the rear seat, and if one of them had to sit in front (and such was the custom in operating that machine), it can scarcely be said that the act was negligent, in the legal significance of the term, because it is not negligence per se to operate a dangerous machine in the only way provided to operate it. An act may be dangerous, yet not be at all negligent. Negligent operation is the failure to use the proper means at hand, in a proper and careful way, as persons of ordinary prudence do under like conditions for their own safety. If, however, there was room on the rear seat for both the motorman and helper, and the motorman voluntarily chose the front seat, where it was more difficult for him to keep the track in view, and exposing himself needlessly to increased dangers, then he would have been negligent. But the question of contributory negligence was submitted to the jury. They found the fact in favor of the motorman.

A question is made that the proximate cause of the injury was not proven to be the negligence of the company in failing to provide suitable lights. It is contended that appellee's injury was due to one of several causes, viz.: his own negligence in voluntarily assuming the more dangerous of the two available positions; or, the negligence of his fellow servants in charge of the first train in losing their cars and permitting them to obstruct the track; or, the failure of the master to provide suitable lights upon the motor car and along the track.

It is contended that the rule applies that where the evidence shows that the injury may have resulted from one of several causes, for one of which the master is not liable, there is a failure of evidence. It was upon this idea that the peremptory instruction was moved by appellant. But this case does not belong to that class. In no view of the case can it be said that there is a doubt left by the proof as to the cause of the injury, as where there was not an eye witness, and from the circumstances various theories of equal probability might be rationally deduced. The real difficulty is rather in determining the proximate cause of the accident. When two or more causes culminate in an event, one may be nearer and more immediately connected with the result than the other. It is only when something occurs subsequent to the defendant's act, which makes it result in what would not otherwise have happened, that the latter or intervening cause is said to be the efficient one, and for the result of which the original actor is not responsible in law. So far as the cause of the collision is concerned as affecting appellant's liability, it is not material how the obstruction came upon the track (admitting it was not chargeable to appellants' negligence,) for had appellant done its duty in providing proper lights, the injury could have been prevented by the means at hand. This duty was a continuing one, as positive the instant before the collision as at the first moment it was omitted. The absence of the light made it impossible for the motorman to protect himself in the operation of the train at that point. In the sequence of the occurrences appellant's act came closest to the result, in every way, and the collision was, therefore, the proximate if not the natural result of appellant's negligence. A fair test of the efficient cause, would be to reverse the order of procedure, and say that this was an attempt by appellee to charge the operators of the first train, who had lost the car. Their answer would have been, we are not liable, notwithstanding our negligence, because but for the intervention of another independent cause, viz., appellant's negligence in failing to provide lights for the second train, our negligence would have been harmless. Appellant's negligence then would have been an intervening agency in the chain of events, between the negligence of those in charge of the first train, and the collision between appellees' motor and the stranded car. But even if this were not true, and the two causes were concurrent, appellant would be liable just the same. We have considered this phase of the case as if the crews of the two so called trains were fellow servants, a fact not necessary to be determined. Whether appellee's own negligence was a controlling feature in the matter has already been disposed of. The instructions were altogether as favorable to appellant as it was entitled to.

Perceiving no error prejudicial to appellant's substantial rights the judgment is affirmed, with damages.

UTTER, ADAMS & ALLEN v. SMITH, & CO.

(Filed April 28, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Service of process—Proof—In an action by defendants in a judgment to enjoin its collection on the idea that no service of process was had upon them, it was error in the trial court to sustain the prayer of the petition where the officer, whose return showed the process had been served, was dead and one of the parties testified that if the summons had been served upon him he had no recollection of it, the other testifying that it had not been served upon him, it may be supposed that he is as likely to be mistaken as was the officer in making the return.

2. Same—When a judgment has been rendered upon process duly returned executed, by one authorized to serve summons, the court should not set it aside unless the evidence is clear, positive and convincing that it was obtained by fraud of plaintiffs or mistake of the officer in executing the summons.

W. F. Hall and R. L. Greene for appellants.

J. G. Forrester for appellees.

Appeal from Harlan Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

On the 1st day of August, 1892, the appellants, Utter, Adams & Allen, filed a petition against appellees, M. D. Smith & Co., composed of M. D. Smith and W. Z. Gilbert, to recover of them $291.21, balance due on a store account. On the same day process was issued from the clerk's office to be served upon appellees, the defendants therein. On the 5th day of August, 1892, this process was returned with the following endorsement:

"Executed by handing the both of the defendants a true copy of this summons, this the 5th day of August, 1892.

"A. L. COLDIRON, S. H. C.,

"By WM. H. HALL, D. S."

This action was continued to the February term, 1893, and at that term this order was made: "Rule against plaintiff to file itemized account and continued to the August term." At that term a judgment was rendered against the defendants, appellees here, by default.

It appears that in that year appellants made an assignment for the benefit of their creditors, and nothing was done in the way of collecting this judgment until the year 1898, when execution was issued thereon, and soon after the issue of the execution, and within that year, the appellees filed this action to enjoin the collection thereof, alleging that they did not owe the appellants anything, and that they had never been served with process in that action, and afterwards, by an amendment, alleged that the judgment referred to was procured by the fraud of appellants, Utter, Adams & Allen; that they unlawfully and fraudulently procured Wm. H. Hall, the deputy sheriff, to enter the return endorsed on the summons, copied above. And also that the deputy sheriff, if he intended to mean by his endorsement on that summons, that he had executed it on the appellees, it was a mistake on his part, as the summons was never served upon them, or either of them, in that action. Appellants controverted these allegations, and on the trial the lower court sustained the prayer of the appellees, and vacated the judgment referred to, and appellants have appealed.

By section 3760 of the Kentucky Statutes it is provided: "Unless in a direct proceeding against himself or his sureties, no fact officially stated by an officer in respect of a matter about which he is by law required to make a statement in writing, either in the form of a certificate, return, or otherwise, shall be called in question, except upon the allegation of fraud in the party benefited thereby, or mistake on the part of the officer."

It is alleged in the petition that the endorsement on this summons by the officer was procured by the fraud of appellants, but the record does not show a scintilla of evidence to support this allegation. The proof shows that Hall, the deputy sheriff, is dead, and there is no proof that he made a mistake in making that return. The appellee, Smith, says that no summons was served upon him, and Gilbert says that if it was served upon him, he has no recollection of it. It is just as likely that Smith was mistaken in his recollection about this matter as the deputy sheriff was in endorsing his return. Appellees introduced some little proof to show that the deputy sheriff drank to excess at times. The statements offered in evidence by the attorney for appellees, with reference to a conversation he had with the deputy sheriff in his lifetime concerning his return on this summons, and also his recollection of the testimony of the deputy sheriff in another case, with reference to a return on a summons in that case, were clearly incompetent. But even if competent, they would have no weight upon the question at issue.

When a judgment has been obtained upon process duly returned executed by one who is conceded to be a person authorized to execute it, the court should not set aside such a judgment unless the evidence is clear, positive and convincing that it was obtained by the fraud of the plaintiffs or by the mistake of the officer in executing the summons. Otherwise judgments settling the rights of the parties and giving remedies for the enforcement of these rights could never be regarded as permanent, but would be liable to be set aside and the rights settled thereby be re-opened, when the facts, not only appeartaining to the service of the summons, but the merits of the controversy, had been forgotten, or rendered unavailing by reason of the death of the parties or their witnesses. We are of the opinion that there is a failure of proof on the part of appellees.

Wherefore, the judgment of the lower court is reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings consistent herewith.

MOORE v. MAUNEY.

(Filed April 28, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Land—Patents—Conflict in boundary—Where there is a conflict of boundary between two adjoining tracts of land, the owner of each tract claiming title from the Commonwealth, the one having the elder patent is entitled to the conflicting boundary, in the absence of a showing by the one holding the junior patent, of having acquired title to the lap by an adverse possession of fifteen years.

R. S. Crawford for appellant.

Sharp & Siler for appellee.

Appeal from Whitley Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

The appellant, Rhoda A. Moore, brought this action, alleging that she was the owner and in possession of a tract of 110 acres of land, which she described by meets and bounds, lying in the county of Whitley; and that the appellee, Bird Mauney, under a fictitious claim of ownership had trespassed thereon and had illegally and without right cut and removed therefrom certain valuable timber, and asked that he be enjoined from further depredations on her property; and that her title thereto might be quieted by a judgment. The defendant, in his answer, denied the alleged trespass, and averred that the land from which the trees were cut was covered by his title papers and he was the owner and in possession thereof, reciting the boundary of his holdings. Plaintiff replied that the boundary claimed by the defendant, covered a part of her tract of land and alleged that her vendor, G. D. Moore, and plaintiff's grantor, G. G. Mauney, were the owners of the adjacent tracts of land; and that more than fifteen years before the institution of this action, they had agreed upon the division line claimed by her between the two tracts of land; and that she and those under whom she claims had been in the peaceable, adverse, continuous and uninterrupted possession thereof for more than fifteen years before the defendant's forcible and wrongful entry, and plead that the defendant be estopped from questioning her claim or title thereto. A rejoinder put in issue the affirmative allegations of the reply. It appears from the pleadings, exhibits and evidence in the record that a patent was granted to John Edwards, as assignee of William Offield, for a tract of one hundred and fifty acres of land in October, 1824, on Duncan's branch, a fork of Spring creek in Whitley county; and that on the 15th of April, 1845, a patent was granted to Samuel Witt, as assignee of Bailey Freeman, for fifty acres of land adjoining the tract patented to Edwards; and that these two tracts were subsequently conveyed to

G. G. Mauney, the father of the appellant, and were by him sold and conveyed to his son, the defendant, Bird Mauney. It also appears that on the 30th of May, 1887, G. D. Moore patented a tract of one hundred and ten acres of land, which, after his death, was sold under decree of the Whitley Circuit Court, and purchased by the appellant.

It appears from the map and survey made by the surveyor of Whitley county, under an order of the court in this case, that the patent granted to G. D. Moore covers about twenty-five acres of the land included in the older grants to Edwards and Bird now owned by the appellee; and that this is the land in controversy. A small part of this twenty-five acres had been enclosed and in the possession of the appellant and those under whom she claims for about eleven years, but the greater part of it was unfenced and wild land. As the land in controversy had been patented by appellee's vendors many years before the entry, survey or patent of appellant's vendor, it is plain that she acquired no title by virtue of the patent issued to G. D. Moore in 1887, in so far as it conflicts with the older grants. Appellant seeks to escape the force of this fact by alleging that G. G. Mauney, appellee's grantor, orally agreed with G. D. Moore, at the time he was having his land warrants surveyed, upon the division line between the two tracts of land claimed by appellant; and that pursuant to this agreement this line was marked between their respective places, and had ever since been recognized as the true division line between the parties. There is no claim that any writing or memoranda was made of the agreement, or that any consideration was paid to appellee's vendor for the twenty-five acres of land in dispute, which were clearly covered by his title papers. The chief witness to establish this alleged parol agreement entered into more than fifteen years before the institution of this suit, is a brother-in-law of the plaintiff, and his statements on this point are flatly contradicted by the testimony of the only witness who was present at the time and who is now alive. And it seems to us that the circumstances under which the alleged parol agreement is claimed to have been entered into, render such an agreement on the part of Mauney wholly improbable. He held the possession and legal title to the land in controversy. Whilst Moore at that time was simply taking the preliminary steps to acquire title to adjacent vacant land owned by the State. The record contains no suggestion why Mauney should, without consideration, have consented that Moore should patent land which had already been patented nearly sixty years before by his remote grantor.

We, therefore, conclude that appellant has failed to establish the alleged parol agreement by a preponderance of the evidence, and the judgment is affirmed.

McGUIRE, &c. v. WHITT.

(Filed April 23, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Lands—Contracts—Title bond—Where a title bond covenanted to convey title upon payment of $300 to be done "in work as a mechanic on a mill at reasonable rates for a millwright, said work to be performed at any time within five years," where the work of building the mill was abandoned by the vendors, though the vendee was willing and ready at all times within the time fixed in the title bond to perform the work, it was error not to direct the conveyance of the land upon the payment, within a reasonable time to be fixed by the order of court, of the amount of the consideration, less $150. the amount of labor and building material furnished, and which it was agreed might go as a credit on the title bond.

2. Title bond—Though a title bond can not take the place of a recorded deed, and is insufficient to pass the legal title, it gives the holder an equitable right superior to a claim of title upon the part of a purchaser or creditor with notice.

W. D. O'Neal, Jr. and H. G. Sullivan for appellants.

Thos. R. Brown for appellee.

Appeal from Lawrence Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle.

This action, when instituted, was one in ejectment brought by Mary J. Mathers and her husband, William Mathers, against John Whitt and W. G. Whitt to recover the possession of ten acres of land described in the petition, which the Whitts were charged with wrongfully withholding from her and claiming as their own, notwithstanding her sole ownership of the same.

The answer of the Whitts denied her title and averred that John Whitt, was the owner of the land by purchase from N. B. McGuire and Luke McGuire, the father and brother of Mary Mathers, made May 14, 1877, they being at that time the owners of the land, and having the possession thereof; that the McGuires then executed to John Whitt a title bond wherein they covenanted to convey to him by deed of general warranty the land in question upon the discharge by him of the consideration therefor, which was $800, and was to be paid, as stipulated in the bond, by the vendees "in work as a mechanic on a mill at reasonable rates for a millwright, said work to be performed at any time within five years from this date (May 14, 1877), at the pleasure of Luke McGuire." The title bond was filed with and made a part of the answer.

It was admitted by the answer that no part of the consideration mentioned in the title bond was ever paid by John Whitt in work upon the mill, for the reason that the building thereof was abandoned by his vendors, N. B. and Luke McGuire, though it was averred that he was at all times, within the five years, ready and willing, and that he offered to perform as a millwright, the work which he agreed to do in payment for the land. And further, that though no work was done by him in building a mill, John Whitt did furnish material and perform labor amounting altogether to $150, in erecting a dwelling house for Luke McGuire on his land, which both N. B. and Luke McGuire agreed might go as a payment and be credited upon the consideration for the land mentioned in the title bond.

It was also averred in the answer that N. B. McGuire and Luke McGuire had never made John Whitt a deed of conveyance as provided by the bond, though he was entitled to the same, and the time within which it was to be made had long since expired; that though no deed had passed from the McGuires to John Whitt, he and W. G. Whitt to whom he conveyed the land after his purchase of it, had continued in the actual possession thereof from the date of the title bond down to the time of the filing of the answer, adversely to all persons, which was alleged to have been known to Mary Mathers, and all other parties to this action, all the while. It was further averred in the answer that John Whitt, or his vendee, W. G. Whitt, was and is entitled to a deed to the land as stipulated in the bond, without further payment on the land than the $150 in labor and material furnished Luke McGuire.

The statutes of champerty and limitation were also pleaded and relied on in bar of the action, and the answer made a counterclaim against the Mathers, N. B. McGuire, his wife, Eliza McGuire, and Luke McGuire, to the end that the court might require a conveyance by proper deed of the land in controversy from N. B. and Luke McGuire to John Whitt or his vendee, and their title quieted; or if, in the opinion of the chancellor, that could not be done, that they might recover for certain lasting and valuable improvements which they had in good faith made upon the land, whereby its vendible value had been enhanced at least $1,500.

Mary and William Mathers, by reply, traversed the averments of the answer, counterclaim and cross petition, and an answer was filed to the cross action by Eliza McGuire, wife of N. B. McGuire, but both N. B. McGuire and Luke McGuire died some time after the filing of the answer of John and W. G. Whitt. It also appears that Mary Mathers, William Mathers, her husband, John Whitt and Eliza McGuire all died during the pendency of the action, but that the Mathers left no children surviving them, their only child having died in infancy. Orders of revivor seem to have been duly entered, and the heirs at law of the deceased persons made parties to the action. Some of the new parties filed necessary pleadings, and additional pleadings by way of rejoinder and amendment were later filed, after which the cause was transferred to the equity docket.

By the separate answer of Eliza McGuire she denied that her husband, N. B. McGuire, or her son, Luke McGuire, owned the land in controversy at the time of its attempted sale by them to John Whitt, or that they ever held the title to same, but averred that it was owned by her under title derived from her brother, John Rogers, Jr. The chancellor rendered judgment dismissing the petition, and also the counterclaim and cross petition, without prejudice, but allowed appellee their costs, and from that judgment all the parties have appealed.

Owing to the confused state of the pleadings and the insufficiency of the evidence we find it hard to pass upon and correctly decide the questions presented by the appeal. It appears, however, that N. B. McGuire and Eliza, his wife, in 1838, moved upon a sixteen hundred acre tract of land in Lawrence county, of which the ten acres in controversy was a part, and that they continued to live upon this land until their death, though much of it was sold in parcels from time to time. The title to the entire sixteen hundred acres, and several other contiguous tracts, seems to have been for years held by one John Rogers, Jr., a bachelor brother of Eliza McGuire. In 1858, Rogers, by proper instrument, which was duly recorded, appointed Henry McGuire, a son of Eliza and N. B. McGuire, his attorney in fact, to take charge of, sell and convey his lands. Much of it was sold by Henry McGuire. In 1858, he, as attorney in fact for Rogers, for a recited consideration of $8,000, sold and conveyed by deed to J. C. Waller, of Louisville, the sixteen hundred acre tract of land upon which his parents lived, and soon thereafter Waller, by deed, expressing the same consideration, conveyed the same land to Henry McGuire in his individual right. Henry McGuire died in 1861, unmarried and childless.

Under the Revised Statutes, section 1, chapter 30, then in force, the land to which Henry held title went to his father, N. B. McGuire, alone. By an act of the legislature, adopted February 9, 1874, the law was amended so as to provide that the real estate of a person dying intestate and leaving no children or their descendants, shall descend to his father and mother, if both are living, one moiety each. (Section 1, chapter 31, General Statutes, subsection 2, section 1398, chapter 39, Kentucky Statutes.)

It, therefore, appears from the record that at the time of his death in 1861, Henry McGuire held the legal title to the sixteen hundred acres of land upon which his parents resided, and that by his death his father, N. B. McGuire, became invested with the title to the exclusion of the mother and all others. It is admitted that the ten acres of land sold by him to John Whitt was included in the boundary of the sixteen hundred acre tract. It further appears that after the death of Henry McGuire no sale or conveyance was made of any part of the land left by him, and which went to his father, before the sale of the ten acres to John Whitt; it follows that at the time of the sale to him of the parcel in controversy, which was May 14, 1877, N. B. McGuire held the legal title thereto. It is disclosed by the record that in 1867, N. B. McGuire, by deed of that date, conveyed the sixteen hundred acre tract to Rogers Wright, and the latter on that day, by proper deed, conveyed the same land to Eliza McGuire, wife of N. B. McGuire. The consideration expressed in each of these deeds was $1.

In 1867, N. B. and Eliza McGuire, by deed, conveyed the same land to their daughter, Mary Mathers, the consideration being also $1. And in 1892, the latter and her husband instituted this action, as stated, to recover the land in controversy of John Whitt, who in the meantime had conveyed it to his son, the appellee, W. G. Whitt. It is manifest that appellants claim the land in controversy under both N. B. and Eliza McGuire, or through the title which the former received at the death of his son, Henry, and thereafter attempted to pass through Wright to Eliza McGuire, thence to their daughter, Mrs. Mathers, at whose death it descended to the appellants, her heirs at law, subject to appellee's equity. Having thus acquired title, appellants will not be heard to say that N. B. McGuire was not the holder of the legal title to the land in controversy when he sold it to John Whitt and executed to him the title bond.

Though a title bond can not take the place of a recorded deed, and is insufficient to pass the legal title, it gives the holder an equitable right, superior to a claim of title upon the part of a purchaser or creditor with notice. (Perry, &c. v. Trimble, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 796; Baldwin, &c. v. Crow, 86 Ky., 679; Low & Whitney v. Blincoe, 10 Bush, 331; Lane v. Martin, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 488.)

All the vendees, immediate or remote, of N. B. McGuire are in the attitude of purchasers from him, and are to be treated as having notice of the previous sale made by him to John Whitt, and of the existence of the title bond. Besides, they are charged with knowledge of Whitt's possession of the land, which has continued ever since May 14, 1877. Furthermore, it appears from the record that they are insisting upon a specific performance of the contract of sale, by asking judgment against the estate of John Whitt and a lien upon the land for the amount of the consideration expressed in the title bond. The only remaining question is as to the amount yet unpaid of the consideration. The fact that N. B. and Luke McGuire abandoned their purpose of erecting the mill, and thereby prevented John Whitt from paying for the land with his labor, could not relieve him of the payment of the consideration altogether. It has not been shown that he sustained any damage by loss of time or of work. We think, however, that it would be but just to allow as a credit upon the amount of the purchase money yet due upon the land the $150 earned by John Whitt in carpenter's work upon the building of Luke McGuire. It appears to have been understood between him and his vendors that it should be so applied, and equity requires that it be done. We are of opinion, therefore, that the chancellor erred in dismissing the petition.

The appellee, W. G. Whitt, will be entitled to a conveyance of the land according to the terms of the bond, upon the payment by him into court within a reasonable time, to be fixed by its order, of the consideration named in the bond, with interest from May 14, 1882, subject to a credit of $150 as of that date. If the appellants fail to execute a deed of proper conveyance upon the payment of the purchase money, the conveyance may be made by the commissioner. Upon the other hand, if appellee fails or refuses to pay the purchase money due upon the land, judgment may be entered therefor and a lien given upon the land to secure its payment, to be enforced by sale of the land for the amount due and costs. The conclusions herein expressed render a decision of the questions of champerty and limitation unnecessary. In our opinion, neither defense was available in this case.

Wherefore, the judgment is reversed on both the original and cross appeal and remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

O'NEAL v. F. A. NEIDER CO.

(Filed April 28, 1904.)

Corporations — Directors — Removal of treasurer — Liability—Appellant
O'Neal was elected treasurer of the appellee corporation at the first meeting of the board of directors, June 8, 1901. A by-law of the corporation provided that the treasurer "shall be elected at the annual meeting of the board of directors in September in each year, who shall hold his office until the next annual meeting or until his successor was elected." No election was held in September, 1901. He was removed from his office by the directors without cause, January 29, 1902. His salary was $1,200 per year, for which he sues. Held—That under the by-laws of the company and under section 542, Kentucky Statutes, regulating corporations, the board of directors had the right to remove him at any time without cause and are not liable for damages for so doing.

Geo. Doniphan, W. S. Pryor and J. R. Minor for appellant.

Byron & Hargett for appellee.

Appeal from Bracken Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle.

The appellant, C. E. O'Neal, sued the appellee, the F. A. Neider Co., a corporation engaged in the business of manufacturing carriage supplies and trimmings, to recover salary alleged to be due him as its treasurer from January 29, 1902, to September of that year, at the rate of $1,200 per annum.

It was averred in the petition that appellant was elected to the office in question June 8, 1901, by appellee's board of directors, and that his term of office should have continued until the time fixed by the articles of incorporation for the next annual election, which was required to be held in September of the succeeding year, and that he accepted the office at a salary of $1,200 per annum, notwithstanding which the board of directors, without cause, removed him from office on January 29, 1902; that he was willing and offered to continue in and do the work of the office until the annual election in September, 1902, but was not permitted to do so, and was thereby thrown out of employment and unable to get work, though he made a diligent effort to do so.

Appellee filed a demurrer to the petition, which was sustained by the lower court and the petition dismissed, and from that judgment this appeal was prosecuted. It appears that the first meeting of the stockholders after the organization of the appellee company was held June 8, 1901, at which time a board of directors was elected and by-laws adopted. At that meeting appellant was elected treasurer, and at once entered upon the discharge of his duties, continuing to serve until January 29, 1902, at which time he was, at a regular meeting and by formal action of the board of directors, removed from office, and another elected to the vacancy.

A by-law of the appellee company provides that: "The board of directors at its annual meeting in September in each year shall elect from their own members a president, vice-president, secretary and treasurer, which officers shall hold their respective offices until the next annual election, or until their successors have been elected and qualified." * * *

No election was held by the board of directors in September, 1901, as should have been done, nor does it appear that the minutes of the meeting of June 8, 1901 indicate that the officers then elected were to continue in office until September, 1902. It would seem therefore, that appellant was elected at that meeting for the time intervening between that date and the date for the succeeding September election, 1901, and as there was no election held in September of that year, and no contract is alleged employing him specially for a longer period, it would further seem that his continuance in office was without any fixed tenure after the time at which an election ought to have been held in September, 1901. If so, we are of opinion that appellant can not complain on account of being discharged at any time subsequent to September, 1901, unless he avers that he had a special contract with appellee to remain in its employment longer, which he has not done.

In Cook on Stock and Stockholders, section 711, it is said: "Sometimes, however, the charter or statutes authorize and empower the stockholders to remove directors at any time."

In Clark and Marshall on Private Corporations, volume 3, section 666, it is said: "In some jurisdictions there are statutes expressly giving the stockholders power to remove directors, or other officers, at any time, or to remove them for cause, and such power may be reserved by a by-law if it is not inconsistent with the charter or general law."

And we may add that such power of removal may be, and often is, conferred in the same way upon the directors, especially where the right to elect or appoint the other officers, such as president, treasurer, etc., is vested in them instead of being reserved to the stockholders.

In second edition, Am. and Eng. Ency. of Law, volume 2, page 816, the authors says: "The removal of the officers of private corporations is generally governed by local statutes or corporate by-laws."

The appellee seems to have adopted no by-law on this subject other than the one already quoted, which provides that the officers elected by the board of directors shall "hold their respective offices until the next annual election, or until their successors have been elected and qualified," and, as we have already indicated, there was no election of officers held by appellee's board of directors in September succeeding the organization of the corporation as provided by its charter. We find, however, that it is provided by section 543, Kentucky Statutes, that "when the articles are filed and recorded as provided, and the license tax imposed is paid to the State, the corporation shall be deemed to be organized for the purpose of transacting, promoting, or carrying on, the business or purpose for which it was created; and shall thereupon become a body corporate, and be known by its corporate name, and as such may adopt and use a corporate seal; and shall have power to * * * appoint, remove and elect officers," etc., etc.

We are of opinion that this statute gave appellee's board of directors the right to discharge appellant at any time without cause and without rendering itself liable in damages, unless in so doing it violated a contract, under which he had the right to continue longer, which we think was not the case here.

Wherefore, the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

MANN AND MORRIS v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed April 29, 1904.)

1. Criminal law—Plea in bar—Two offenses committed on same occasion—Where parties enter a dwelling house in the night time with intent to commit a felony, and the occupant is awakened while the burglars are taking money from his pants pockets, and they shoot and wound him, the fact that they have been indicted and convicted for the shooting and wounding in a separate indictment, does not constitute a bar to an indictment for the burglary committed on the same occasion.

2. Unnecessary averments in indictments—The burglary being completed when the parties entered the house with intent to commit a felony, the fact that the indictment contained allegations as to what they did after they entered the house being surplusage, although competent to show the intent of the parties, do not constitute any part of the offense for shooting and wounding, the two offenses, though committed on the same occasion, being separate and distinct from each other.

J. M. Collins for appellants.

N. B. Hays and Lorraine Mix for appellee.

Appeal from Mason Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

Appellants, Thomas Mann and Edward Morris, were indicted and convicted of burglary, their punishment being fixed at confinement in the penitentiary for ten years. The proof shows that they, in company with one Charles Sanders, went from Maysville in a buggy about ten miles to the house of John B Farrow, or near it, and there tied their horse and, after entering the house through the window in the night time, proceeded to rob Farrow by taking some money that was in his pants pocket. Some noise they made waked up Mrs. Farrow, who roused her husband, and thereupon the defendants, or one of them, shot Farrow in the arm, and also in the back. The same grand jury that found the indictment for burglary also found an indictment against them for shooting Farrow, and on this last indictment they were tried and convicted. Mann appealed to this court, and that judgment was affirmed. (Mann v. Commonwealth, ante, 1964.) When arraigned on the charge of burglary they pleaded the conviction under the indictment for the shooting of Farrow in bar of the proceeding.

While the indictment on the charge of burglary contains some unnecessary averments as to the larceny committed by them after they entered the house, it is a charge only of burglary, the allegations as to the stealing of the money by putting Farrow in fear and shooting him being apparently only added to illustrate the felonious intent with which the defendants entered the house, as charged in the indictment. The burglary was complete when the felonious entry was made, and the defendants might have been indicted and convicted therefor, although they had stolen nothing in the house or committed no other crime after they entered it. The allegations, therefore, of the indictment as to what they did after they entered the house are surplusage; although the facts so alleged might be properly given in evidence before the jury on the trial to show the intent with which the entry was made. These averments are simply statements of evidential matter, which should have been omitted from the indictment.

Burglary is defined as "the breaking and entering in the night of another's dwelling house with intent to commit a felony therein." (1 Bishop on Criminal Law, section 559.) "If a man in the night time breaks into a dwelling house, intending to commit therein some act which in law is felony, he is guilty of burglary whether he succeeds in doing what he meant or not." (1 Bishop on Criminal Law, section 437.)

It is insisted, however, for appellants that the defendants entered the house to steal the money, and that the entry of the house, the stealing of the money and the shooting of Farrow were all one transaction, done in pursuance of one intent, and that out of it the Commonwealth can not carve two offenses. In support of this view we are referred to a number of authorities. Thus in Fisher v. Commonwealth, 64 Ky., 211, where the defendant by the same act, and with the same intent, took a horse, wagon and harness, it was held that an acquittal of stealing the horse was a bar to an indictment for the stealing of the wagon and harness, and the rule was applied that, out of one transaction committed with the same intent, two offenses could not be carved. The same rule was applied in Triplett v. Commonwealth, 84 Ky., 193, where an acquittal of the offense of burglary was held a bar to a prosecution for a larceny, forming part of the same transaction. The court said: "At common law, in an indictment for burglary, a count might be added for the larceny when there had been an actual taking, and it, therefore, resulted that an acquittal of the burglary with intent to steal constituted no bar to a prosecution for the actual theft. Without the intention to commit a felony, the mere fact of breaking would not, at common law, constitute a burglary; and when the intent to steal is charged and the party acquitted, it would seem that a subsequent indictment for grand larceny, with the same facts developed on the trial, would be placing the accused in jeopardy the second time for the same offence. The weight of authority, we are aware, is adverse to such a view of the question, but the whole reason and philosophy of the law, as well as justice to the accused, require a different ruling."

In Hevera v. State, 84 S. W., 948, it was held by the Texas court that a conviction for assault with intent to kill was a bar to an indictment for robbery committed in the same transaction. But none of these cases are precisely in point here. It is misleading to say that the shooting of Farrow and the burglarious entry of the house were committed in the same transaction in the sense in which this term is used by the authorities. (Bishop on Criminal Law, volume 1, section 1060.) Thus in the Fisher case the one act of the defendant was the taking of the horse, wagon and harness; but here there were two acts of the defendant, the burglarious entry of the house and the shooting of Farrow in the house after this act had terminated. These are no more one transaction than if the defendants had successively shot two different persons in the same difficulty. The shooting of Farrow could not have been set out in a second part of the indictment for burglary, or joined with that charge. The robbery of the person by putting him in fear was not complete before the assault with intent to kill was committed; so therefore, neither the Triplett case nor the Hevera case apply.

In the case before us the entry into the house was for the purpose of theft. The shooting of Farrow came about because he waked up, and was nothing more than a new offense, which the commission of the offense intended, induced the defendants to commit. It is no more one transaction than it would be if the defendants had set fire to the house after robbing it, to conceal the evidence of their crime, or had shot Farrow's son as they escaped, to prevent his being a witness against them.

In Teat v. State, 24 Am. Rep., 708, two men were wounded mortally by two almost simultaneous shots fired by the defendant and another lying in ambush. It was held that a conviction for the killing of one of the men was not a bar to an indictment for the killing of the other. In State v. Nash, 41 Am. Rep., 72, the defendant fired twice in quick succession upon a crowd of persons, wounding one at the first shot and another at the second. It was held that a conviction for the wounding of the first was not a bar to an indictment for the wounding of the second. In Jones v. State, 14 Am. St. Rep., 570, the defendant wounded two men in the same difficulty. The conviction for one was held no bar for a prosecution for the other. (McCoy v. State, 46 Ark., 141; Augustine v. State, 52 S. W., 77; Winn v. State, 83 Wis., 571; Greenwood v. State, 64 Ind., 250; Ashton v. State, 31 Tex. Crim., 42; Samuels v. State, 25 Tex. C. C., 538.) Other cases are also collected in a note to State v. Nash, 41 Am. Rep., 475. Referring to this line of cases, Mr. Bishop, in the last edition of his work on Criminal Law, section 1061, says: "Obviously there is a difference between one volition and one transaction. And on a view of our combined authorities, there is little room for denial that in one transaction a man may commit distinct offenses of assault or homicide upon different persons, and be separately punished for each."

So in American and English Encyclopædia of Law, volume 17, page 608, it is said: "A putting in jeopardy for one act is no bar to a prosecution for a separate and distinct act, merely because they are so closely connected in point of time that it is impossible to separate the evidence relating to them on the trial for the one of them first had."

It has been held that if a man burns a dwelling house and thereby takes the life of one of the inmates, he can not, after being convicted of arson, be also convicted of murder; and so it has been held that if a man by the same blow wounds two men or kills two by the same discharge of a gun, a conviction for the wounding or killing of one will bar a prosecution for the wounding or killing of the other; but on this subject the authorities are divided. (Bishop's New Criminal Law, sections 1058-1061.) The ruling in the arson case is put on the ground that the force which the defendant started destroyed the house and killed the person without any further action or new impulse from him. The ruling in the cases where two persons are wounded or killed by the same act, is put in part on the ground that the wounding or killing of both might be charged in one indictment, and in part on the ground that there was no new impulse or act on the part of the defendant. But in the case before us the defendant could not be prosecuted under one indictment for the burglary and the shooting of Farrow. Here there was a new volition on the part of the defendant and a new force set in motion by him, after the burglary was complete. If he can not be prosecuted in separate indictments for the two offenses, it results that although he committed both, one beginning after the other was completed, and being the result of a separate volition as well as a new force, the constitutional provision forbidding his being twice punished for one offense will not operate to shield him from punishment for a separate and independent offense, simply because it was followed in close succession by another offense which he committed.

Judgment affirmed.

ZIMMERMAN v. BROOKS.

CARTER COUNTY v. BROOKS, &c.

(Filed April 29, 1904.)

1. New county—Mistake in boundary—The act of the general assembly approved February 9, 1904, creating the county of Beckham, is not void by reason of the fact that the boundary lines given in the act will not close. The act must be treated like a patent and will not be rejected as void because of a mistake in one of the calls, if from the whole act what was meant can be reasonably determined. The rule is that the court will inspect the whole act, and if the actual intention of the legislature can thus be ascertained, the false description will be rejected, or words substituted in the place of those used by mistake so as to give effect to the law.

2. Constitutional conditions—By the provisions of sections 68 and 64 of the Constitution the following conditions must be complied with before a new county can be formed: first, no county from which any part of the territory is taken, must be reduced to less area than 400 square miles; second, the new county must be of not less area than 400 square miles; third, the boundary line of the new county must not pass within less than ten miles of the county seat of any county from which a portion of its territory is taken; fourth, no county from which any part of its territory is taken shall be reduced to less than 12,000 inhabitants; fifth, the new county must contain not less than 12,000 inhabitants. If any of these conditions are wanting, the act is no violation of the Constitution.

3. Parties who may sue—Allegations—Demurrer—Any county whose rights are affected by an act creating a new county, or any taxpayer of such county, may complain and insist upon their constitutional protection against the increased burdens which the formation of the new county may entail, and it was error in the lower court to sustain a demurrer to the petition of Zimmerman, a resident of Carter county, and the petition of Carter county, alleging that by the creation of the new county of Beckham, the area of Carter county would be reduced to less than 400 square miles and its population to less than 12,000, and that the new county would contain less area than 400 square miles and less than 12,000 inhabitants.

4. Legislative determination—Constitutional restrictions—Invasion of private rights—Whilst the legislature has a large discretion in deciding upon all matters of legislation not prohibited by the Constitution, yet where private rights are involved, a statute is void that is in violation of the Constitutional limitations on the power of the legislature, and in such case it is the province of the courts to determine whether these limitations have been violated by the legislature.

Appeals from Carter Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

The last general assembly passed an act, which was approved by the governor on February, 9, 1904, entitled "An act creating the county of Beckham." The first section of the act is in these words:

"Section 1. That the county of Beckham be, and the same is hereby created, and the boundary lines thereof are established as follows: Beginning on three black oaks by the county, or old State road, the corner of John Reid's and Wilburn Hall's and Marion Oldfield's land, being ten and one half miles by survey from Grayson, the present county seat of Carter county, Kentucky; thence S. 12 degrees 6 minutes E. 36,740 feet to a small locust; thence S. 66 degrees W. 2,571 feet to a black oak near the open fork of Big Gimlet, thence N. 4 degrees 30 minutes W. 19,860 feet to a white oak on Mauck Branch, so as to exclude William Binion's house; thence with the act of 1869, approved January 26, 1869, making Elliott county; thence with Mauck Ridge to the corner of Rowan, Elliott and Beckham counties; thence N. 70 degrees 6 minutes W. 14,466 feet; thence N. 23 degrees 16 minutes W. 70,157 to the point near Briery creek; thence due N. 31,480 feet; thence N. 9 degrees 15 minutes E. 65,297 feet; thence due S. 12,238 feet to a small hickory and oak on top of Three Prong ridge; thence S. 5 degrees 19 minutes W. 52,528 to the point of beginning."

The second section makes Olive Hill the county seat. The third section divides the county into five magisterial districts and gives the boundary of each. The fourth, fifth, sixth and seventh sections provide for the organization of the county and makes the act take effect from its passage. Appellee Brooks was appointed by the governor county judge of Beckham county pursuant to the act, and appellant Zimmerman, on March 4, 1904, filed this suit to test its validity. He alleged that the county of Beckham was created out of parts of the counties of Carter, Elliott and Lewis; that the part taken from Carter county leaves it with only about 250 square miles; that the county line between Beckham county and Carter runs within less than ten miles of the county seat of Carter county; that Elliott county, before any territory was taken from it, had a less area than 400 square miles, and was, by the act, reduced to far less than that. He prayed judgment declaring the act void and restraining Brooks from acting as county judge of Beckham county. Brooks demurred to the petition. The county of Carter then appeared in the action, and moved to file its petition, in which it sought the same relief as Zimmerman. It alleged that the matters involved were of general interest to the inhabitants of Carter county, and of importance to it; that it was created in the year 1836; was authorized to sue and be sued, and had, since its creation, been in existence with regular county officers; that at the time the act creating Beckham county was enacted, the area of Carter county was 354 square miles, the area of Lewis county 454 square miles, and Elliott county 274; that the line of Beckham county runs within six miles of Grayson, the county seat of Carter county, and within seven miles of Vanceburg, the county seat of Lewis county; that the area of Beckham county does not exceed 286 square miles and that Lewis county is reduced by the act establishing the county of Beckham to 300 square miles, Elliott county to 234 square miles; that the population of Beckham county is less than 12,000; that the population of Carter and Elliott is reduced by the establishment of Beckham county to less than 12,000 people, Elliott having at the time only in all 10,387 inhabitants; that the act creating Beckham county was unwarranted by the Constitution, and that thereby confusion would be caused in the affairs of Carter county, and it would be prevented from collecting its taxes, and the county officers would be obstructed in the discharge of their duties, thus disturbing the affairs of the county and producing a multiplicity of suits. It prayed that the act be declared unconstitutional, and that the defendant, Brooks, who was a resident of Carter county, Olive Hill being in that county at the passage of the act referred to, be enjoined from acting as county judge. The court sustained a demurrer to Zimmerman's petition, refusing to allow the petition of Carter county to be filed, or to allow it to be made a party to the action. He thereupon dismissed the petition, and the two appeals before us were taken. In the brief filed by the counsel for appellee, it is said: "The appellee does not wish to discuss or raise any points of minor importance as to the sufficiency of appellant's petition, but to proceed at once to the consideration of the all important question to the people most interested, namely, the constitutionality of the act creating the county of Beckham."

We shall proceed, therefore, to settle the case on its merits, as it is of grave importance to all parties concerned to have the validity of the act settled, before liabilities are incurred for county buildings, taxes are levied, or other steps taken in the organization of the proposed county. It is insisted for appellants that the boundary of the county, as given in the first section of the act, will not close, and in fact, takes in part of the State of Ohio. But taking the act as a whole, there seems to be enough in it to show what was meant; for the third section gives minutely the boundary of each of the five magisterial districts by natural objects, and by putting these districts together the mistake in the call of one of the lines, if there is one, can be readily discovered and corrected. The act must be treated like a patent, and will not be rejected as void because of a mistake in one of the calls, if from the whole act what was meant can be reasonably determined. The rule is that the court will inspect the whole act, and if the actual intention of the legislature can thus be ascertained, the false description will be rejected or words substituted in the place of those used by mistake, so as to give effect to the law; thus south may be read for north, or east for west in a call where, from the act as a whole, the mistake is apparent; for it is a matter of common knowledge that mistakes of this character are sometimes made in transcribing. (Palms v. Shewano County, 61 Wis., 211; Rabun County v. Haversham County, 79 Ga., 248.) In the latter case the word "river" in the enrolled bill was read "ridge," it being manifestly a clerical error. It is not presumed that the legislature intended to include in the county part of the State of Ohio. The calls may be reversed as one line in the survey is of as much dignity as another, and if, on all the facts, a mistake in one of the calls is manifest, the actual intention of the legislature should not for this reason be disregarded. (Creech v. Johnson, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 657.)

The constitutional objection to the act is more serious. Section 63 of the Constitution, which is part of its provisions defining the powers of the legislative department, contains the following: "No new county shall be created by the general assembly which will reduce the county or counties, or either of them, from which it shall be taken, to less area than 400 square miles; nor shall any county be formed of less area; nor shall any boundary line thereof pass within less than ten miles of any county seat of the county or counties proposed to be divided."

Section 64 further provides: * * * "Nor shall any new county be established which will reduce any county to less than 12,000 inhabitants, nor shall any county be created containing a less population."

It is earnestly maintained for appellee that the constitutional restrictions as to area and population or location of the county line are for the guidance of the legislature, and that when the legislature has determined these questions by passing the act creating the county, it is incompetent for the courts to inquire into the correctness of the legislative findings. In support of this view we are referred to a number of authorities. Thus in DeCamp v. Eveland, 19 Ark., 81, the constitutional provision was that no new county should be thereafter erected unless its population should entitle it to a member in the legislature. It was held that the population of the county at the time the act was passed controlled, and not its population at the last census; that it would be presumed the legislature had enough before it to justify its conclusion on the facts; the defendant, who had been convicted of a misdemeanor in the new county, did not offer to show that the county did not in fact have, at the time of its creation, the requisite population. This case was approved in Rumsey v. People, 19 N. Y., 41, which was similar in its facts, and the act was there sustained; but in the subsequent case of Lanning v. Carpenter, 20 N. Y., 447, the act was held invalid because it violated a provision of the Constitution forbidding a change in the assembly districts until after the next enumeration. In Luscher v. Seltes, 4 W. Va., 11, the bill was by a taxpayer to restrain the collection of taxes levied by the county of Lincoln to pay debts it had created, on the ground that the act forming the county was in violation of a constitutional provision much the same as ours. The bill was dismissed, although the allegations were substantially the same as in the case before us, the court holding the legal presumption was that when the legislature passed the act all the necessary facts were shown to its satisfaction, and that the court could not go behind the legislative finding. Further on in the opinion the judgment is also rested on the ground that if the plaintiffs' action could be maintained, every other taxpayer had the same right of action, and there might be conflicting judgments, and the debts of the county created in the erection of the public building might be left unpaid. This case was followed in Farquharson v. Yeargin, 24 Wash., 549, where the allegation was that the new county had not the requisite population. In re Short, 47 Kan., 250, the defendant was convicted of manslaughter and then took out a writ of habeas corpus on the ground that the county in which he was convicted did not have the requisite area under the Constitution and, therefore, the act creating it was void, although the county had been in existence for years. The Constitution required the county should have not less than 432 square miles and it was alleged that the county had only 430 $\frac{1}{4}$ square miles. It was held that the county was at least a de facto public corporation; that its existence could not be collaterally questioned and that the validity of the act creating it could only be assailed in a direct proceeding. To the same effect is ex parte Renfro, 112 Mo., 591, and in that opinion other previous cases, holding the same rule, are referred to. On the other hand, in Tennessee, where they have a similar constitutional provision, in a number of cases it has been held that if the act creating a county is in violation of the Constitution, it may be declared void by the court. Thus in Bradley v. Powell County, 2 Humph., 425, the fact being disputed, the chancellor had a survey made to show what the truth was. Upholding its power to act in the premises, the court said: "The convention of the State which framed the Constitution, thought proper to place restrictions upon the power of the legislature to establish new counties; and, of consequence, any attempt to do so contrary to the restrictions, is a void exercise of power which can and must be stopped by the judicial department of the State. There is no other place to which an appeal can be made, and, if the court can not interfere, the Constitution, if violated, is a dead letter."

This case was followed in Gotcher v. Burrows, 9 Humph., 685; Maury County v. Lewis County, 1 Swann., 236; Bridgenor v. Rogers, 1 Cold., 259; Humphreys County v. Houston County, 4 Baxt., 598. In Bridgenor v. Rogers, the court's conclusions of law were as follows:

"1st. A citizen and taxpayer of a county from which a portion of its territory is taken to form a new county, may file a bill to inquire into the validity of the act creating the new county, if he does so before the new county becomes so organized as to become a political organization.

"2d. A county in its corporate character, whose territory has been reduced below 625 square miles, or her qualified voters below 1,000, may come into a court of equity even after a new county has been organized, and have her territory or voters restored to her by decree of the court; and this is so, whether the territory or voters have been reduced by the formation of a new county or by changing the line and attaching a portion of one county to another.

"3d. Before a portion of a new county will be restored to the county from which it was taken, it must clearly appear by an actual measurement of the territory of the old county and an enumeration of its voters, that her constitutional rights have been invaded."

In Wisconsin the same rule is followed under a similar constitutional provision. In Attorney General v. Merriman, 6 Wis., 22, the court, in answer to the argument that the legislative finding is conclusive, said: "As a general rule, courts undoubtedly always presume in favor of the constitutionality of an act of the legislature, and in a doubtful case, will sustain it. But how can that presumption be entertained in a clear case, when the act is expressly forbidden by the language of the Constitution? The reasoning, if it proves anything, proves too much. For it is manifest the same presumption would arise in favor of an act of the legislature dividing a county of an area of 400 or 600 square miles. Suppose the legislature should pass an act dividing Waukesha, Walworth or Green county, each of which counties contains sixteen townships, must not the same presumption arise? Must not the court presume that the legislature, in dividing the county, passed upon the question of fact, and hold that the law was valid? This applies a fair test to the soundness of the argument. It places it in a strong light to show more strikingly where it leads. Of course it would practically abrogate a provision of the Constitution."

In State v. Dorsey County, 28 Ark., 878, a writ of quo warranto was filed by the attorney general against the county, in answer to which the county pleaded that it was created by an act cutting off portions of Lincoln and other counties. To this the plaintiff replied that by taking off the portion of territory cut from Lincoln county by the act, it was reduced to less than 600 square miles, contrary to the Constitution. The defendants demurred to the replication. The demurrer was overruled and it was held that certain evidence may controvert a statute, but it must be of equal grade and character with the law itself, as for instance, some other official record or official surveys or map of which the court should take official notices.

In Woods v. Henry, 55 Mo., 560; State v. St. John, 21 Kan., 427; Garfield v. Brayton, 33 Iowa, 16, it was held that the court will take judicial notice of the boundaries of counties and their area, and if an act reduces a county below the constitutional limit or creates a county having a less area than allowed by the constitution, it is void, and will be so declared. (State v. Scott, 17 Mo. 521; Perry v. State, 9 Wis., 19.) In Board of Commissioners v. Spittler, 13 Ind., 235; Board of Commissioners v. State, 147 Ind., 497, and Wright v. Hawkins, 28 Tex., 459, it was also held that the courts will take judicial notice of the area of counties.

It will thus be seen that the conclusions reached by the courts are more harmonious than the reasons given for them. The two New York cases reported in 19 Barbour and 19 N. Y., were criminal prosecutions in which the invalidity of the act creating the county was relied on collaterally; and in the Missouri and Kansas cases it was held that this could not be done where the county was organized in fact and was an existing corporation. In the West Virginia and Washington cases the suits were by the taxpayer after the liabilities were created by the county as an existing corporation de facto, and it is conceded in Tennessee that in this state of case the taxpayer can not maintain an action assailing the validity of the act creating the county; but the weight of authority is to the effect that when assailed in the proper way and at the proper time, the court will enter upon the inquiry as to the constitutionality of the statute; while the Arkansas case seems to limit the evidence which may be received more narrowly than the other cases.

Lafferty v. Huffman, 99 Ky., 80, and Taylor v. Beckham, 118 Ky., 278, are relied on for appellee. It was held in the first of these cases that the enrolled bill, properly authenticated, is conclusive of the regularity of the steps taken in the passage of the statute; and in the other case it was held that the judgment of the legislature in a contest of the office of Governor pursuant to the constitution is conclusive, and that the record made by the legislature and approved by it can not be assailed in the courts. But neither of these cases apply here; for the question is not one of regularity of legislative proceedings, but of unauthorized legislation invading private rights under the Constitution. On the other hand, in Clerk v. Lester, 104 Ky., 191, it was held that section 115 of the Constitution allowing the legislature to redistrict the State in appellate districts every ten years, is mandatory, and that an act changing the districts within ten years was void. It is true the court had judicial knowledge that the attempted change was made within less than ten years, but the court must have judicial knowledge also of the counties of the State and their boundaries as fixed by the statutes—of the public surveys made by the State and published by its authority. These are matters of common knowledge within the State, contained in geographies, etc., and if the court does not remember the facts it will resort to the books to refresh its memory. In this way we know approximately the area of the counties of the State, and know that Carter county had, by the geological survey an area of 544 square miles, Elliott county 270, Lewis county 450, total 1,264, as given in the official report of the bureau of agriculture; so that Carter county can properly only contribute 144 square miles to the formation of a new county, Elliott, nothing, and Lewis only fifty square miles. We must, therefore, take judicial notice that only 194 square miles can, on this basis, be cut from these counties without infringing the mandate of the Constitution. We know also judicially that since the geological survey was made of Carter county, part of it has been cut off to other counties. The State Board of Equalization is created by statute and reports of its proceedings are published by the State giving the number of acres of land in each county assessed for taxation. From this we know that the land assessed for taxation in the three counties referred to is as follows:

Carter, 219,686 acres, Elliott, 141,982, and Lewis, 308,503. It thus appears that Carter county is now in fact not as large as Lewis and contains less than 400 square miles, unless, which can not be presumed, a large per cent. of the county is not assessed for taxation. As shown by these figures the actual area of both Carter and Elliott must be less than 400 square miles, and we must, therefore, presume that no part of the territory of either of these counties can be cut off to form a new county without, a violation of the Constitution; for, as 640 acres make a square mile, 400 square miles equal 256,000 acres.

But we do not rest our judgment here, for while the public surveys are presumptively correct, they may be shown to be incorrect. The Constitution recognizes the existing counties of the State. It confers upon them the right to remain in area not less than 400 square miles. They are quasi corporations, and may sue and be sued. They have certain public burdens to bear. When part of their territory is cut off these burdens fall more heavily upon the remaining territory. The rights of these corporations which are guaranteed them by the Constitution are as sacred as any other rights secured by that instrument to other corporations or private persons. The legislature in the creation of new counties is simply an agency with well-defined restrictions upon its powers. If it acts in a case where it has no power to act, its act, like that of any other agent beyond the scope of his power, is void. The county whose rights are affected may complain, and so may any taxpayer who is prejudiced; for the taxpayers have a right to insist upon their constitutional protection against the increased burdens which the formation of the new county will entail. It is the province of the courts to protect private rights under the Constitution. Constitutional guarantees would amount to nothing if there was no way to protect them. The court will not adjudge bad a legislative act on doubtful evidence, but where it is plain that the Constitution has been violated, it is the duty of the court to say what the law is, and protect private rights. Otherwise, the Constitution may be disregarded, and power may be exercised by the legislature in a case where, under the Constitution, it is without power to act at all, and those whose rights are thus destroyed will be left without remedy. This question was fully considered in Cheaney v. Hooser, 48 Ky., 330, decided in the year 1848, the court holding that the discretion of deciding on all legislative measures is in the legislature itself, except where the Constitution limits the power of the legislature, but that a statute is void if in violation of the constitutional limitation on the power of the legislature; and in that case parol evidence was received to show that private property was taken for public purposes under an act of the legislature without just compensation. This case was followed in Covington v. Southgate, 54 Ky., 492; Elkton v. Gill, 94 Ky., 138, and a number of other cases. There can be no sound reason why the same rule should not apply in the cases of violation of any other constitutional restriction on the power of the legislature to the prejudice of private rights. By the terms of the Constitution the following conditions must be complied with before a new county may be formed: First, no county from which any part of the territory is taken must be reduced to less area than 400 square miles; second, the new county must be of not less area than 400 square miles; third, the boundary line of the new county must not pass within less than ten miles of the county seat of any county from which a portion of its territory is taken; fourth, no county from which any part of the territory is taken shall be reduced to less than 12,000 inhabitants; fifth, the new county must contain not less than 12,000 inhabitants. If any of these conditions are wanting, the act is in violation of the Constitution, and void. The circuit court erred in refusing to allow the petition of Carter county to be filed. He also erred in sustaining the demurrer to the plaintiff's petition.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

COVINGTON AND CINCINNATI BRIDGE CO. v. SMITH.

(Filed April 29, 1904.)

1. Petit juries—Jury wheel—Monthly drawings—In courts of continuous sessions, the jury law requires the circuit judge, during the first week of every month that the court is in session, to draw from the jury wheel the names of thirty persons to act as petit jurors for that month. Where the panel of the petit jury had been drawn and served for a month, a motion by a party to an action to be tried by a jury to have the panel discharged and a new panel drawn from the jury wheel was proper, and should have been sustained by the court, and for such error the verdict of the jury should be set aside and a new trial awarded.

S. D. Rouse for appellant.

B. F. Graziani for appellee.

Appeal from Kenton Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

The appellee, Jennie Smith, on the 21st day of January, 1902, about 6 o'clock p. m., with a companion, was walking over appellant's bridge from Cincinnati to Covington, when near the abutment on the Kentucky side, she slipped in the snow or ice, and fell, breaking her arm, for which she instituted this action to recover damages, alleging that her injury was caused by the negligence of appellant.

The answer placed in issue the material allegations of the petition, with a plea of contributory negligence, which, being controverted, completed the issues. A trial resulted in a verdict in favor of appellee for the sum of $400, of which appellant now complains. The only error in the record is that of the formation of the jury. Upon calling the case for trial, May 28, 1903, appellant moved the court to discharge the whole panel of the jury, and to summon a new panel, as by law required. This motion was overruled, and, in his opinion refusing a new trial, the court thus states the facts relating to the panel to which appellant had objected: "The jurors drawn and summoned and in attendance in April, 1903, held over, and from them and others drawn and summoned in May to fill vacancies, and one bystander, the jury to try this case was selected. It may be material to state that there was no reason for the failure to draw jurors for May, except that there was set for trial late in that month, an indictment for murder, and it was known that for that trial many extra jurors would have to be drawn, and it appeared more convenient to draw the regular May panel at the same time of drawing the extra jurors; and further, that there were very few other trials set, or to be set, for that month. The April jurors were, in the opinion of the trial judge, exceptionally desirable in point of intelligence and character, and the trial judge was glad to have them remain. It is certain that the defendant was not, in any manner or degree, prejudiced by the failure to draw jurors for May."

Sections 2243 and 2247, Kentucky Statutes, are as follows:

"Section 2243. At each term of the circuit court, within one year after the commencement of that at which said commissioners were appointed, or in case of courts having continuous sessions during the first week of each month that the court is in session, within one year from the first of the month in which said commissioners were appointed, the judge of the court shall draw from said drum or wheel case, a sufficient number of names to procure the names of twenty persons qualified, as hereinafter prescribed, to act as grand jurors, and record the names of the twenty qualified upon paper, and certify and sign it, and shall also, after having locked and re-versed or shaken said drum or wheel case, re-open it and draw therefrom the names of thirty persons to act as petit jurors, record their names on paper, certify and sign it, and he shall place said lists in separate envelopes, of good paper, and seal and endorse them, so as to show that the envelopes contain jury lists, and the month or term and year said jurors are selected for, and date of selection, and sign his name across the seal of each and deliver them to the clerk of his court, at the same time administering to him and his deputies the oath above required of them; from the list of twenty names, the next grand jury shall be drawn, and from the list of thirty names the next petit jury shall be drawn as hereinafter directed. He shall destroy the slips on which are written the names placed on the lists as soon as said names are recorded on said lists, and if, in drawing the twenty grand jurors, the name of a person not having the qualifications of a grand juror be drawn, it shall be forthwith returned to the drum or wheel case, and if at any drawing the name of a person temporarily disqualified is drawn, it shall be replaced in said wheel case or drum; but if the name of any person permanently disqualified is drawn, the slip on which it is written shall be destroyed. Immediately after the judge has drawn said names from said drum or wheel case, he shall lock the same and deliver it and the aforesaid lists to the clerk, as above directed. The judge when he draws the jury, shall not permit any one to see any name, nor shall he divulge the name of any person drawn on any jury, except that the judge may require one of the commissioners to attend and assist him when he draws the jury and makes the list, if he deems it necessary.

"Section 2247. The judge may, at any time during the term, when it is necessary, after the regular panel is for any reason exhausted, draw and select from the drum or wheel other persons to act as grand or petit jurors, or he may, in his discretion, direct that such jurors be supplied from bystanders; and the court may, after the regular grand jury has been discharged during any term of court, impanel a grand jury composed of bystanders, and may, in his discretion, fill vacancies in the grand jury from bystanders or by drawing from the drum or wheel. And the court, after the petit juries for the term have been selected and impaneled, may, in any action, proceeding or prosecution after said panel has been exhausted, direct the sheriff to supply from bystanders the place of one or more who may be hereafter excused by the court for good cause, or removed by the challenge or either party, or the judge may supply such jurors by drawing names from the drum or wheel as herein provided; and, when the judge draws such names, he shall make a list thereof and deliver the list to the sheriff, who shall forthwith summon them: Provided, that should the court discharge, during the term, the whole of any panel, then their places shall be supplied by the judge drawing from the drum or wheel."

In the case of Curtis v. Commonwealth, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 267, the trial judge having drawn more jurors in the month of January, 1901, than were needed for that month, carried over a number of them as a part of the panel for the February term from which the jury in the case cited was selected; upon appeal to this court, it was thus said of this action: "These men so selected may have been, and doubtless were, of the very best citizenship of the county, but they were not drawn impartially from the body of legally qualified jurymen of the county. The mode provided by law for the selection of qualified and impartial jurymen was ignored, and the jury was selected by the judge of the circuit court, himself. This was clearly erroneous. It may have been done with the very best of motives, but it was not the method provided by law, and should not have been done. This action in selecting and impaneling the petit jury being error, the question presents itself, can this court take cognizance of this error?"

It was then held that, under the provisions of section 201 of the Criminal Code, this court had no jurisdiction to reverse the case for the error under consideration. There is no similar provision in the Civil Code.

The error of the circuit judge in the case at bar can not be distinguished from that in the case cited. The statutes quoted provide an elaborate system for the selection, monthly, in courts of continuous session, of impartial jurymen fresh from the body of the people. If these provisions are enforced, each litigant is guaranteed that the best effort possible has been made to secure for the trial of his case an impartial jury. It is not believed that the requirements of the statute in regard to the selection of juries would have been set forth with such minute particularity and detail, if it had been intended that the court might nullify the manifest intention of the legislature by ignoring them.

Wherefore, the judgment is reversed for proceedings consistent herewith.

WATHEN v. POOL, &c.

(Filed April 29, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Conflict of evidence—Question for jury—Where there is a conflict of evidence it is for the jury to determine its weight and effect, and in an action for damages for personal injury the verdict for plaintiff will not be disturbed where it is not palpably against the weight of evidence.

John S. Jackman for appellant.

Edwards & Ogden for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Common Pleas Branch, Second Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

While the appellee was an infant under four years of age he was crossing Griffith avenue near the intersection of Twenty-Second street in the city of Louisville, and was run over and injured by appellant's mule and wagon which was being driven by his servant. A recovery is sought in this action for the injury thus inflicted. It is claimed that the accident occurred in consequence of the negligence of the appellant's servant in driving the mule at a dangerous and reckless speed along the street. A reversal is urged upon the ground that the verdict is palpably against the weight of the evidence.

Two witnesses were introduced on each side who claim to have witnessed the accident. Prentice testified that he saw the mule coming down the street in a "hard run" and while the child was crossing the street it was struck by the mule and knocked down. His testimony was supported by the evidence of Freeman Vincent. Henry Hopewell testified that the driver stated that he had to drive fast because he was late. The driver and another witness testified to facts which tend to contradict the evidence offered by the plaintiff and to show that the injury was not the result of a negligent act. The conflict in the testimony made it a case for the jury. If the testimony introduced by the plaintiff is true, then it was a case of gross negligence. Owing to the conflict in the testimony we are unable to see how the case of Hoff v. Hahn, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 2267, should prevent the court from reaching the conclusion that it was a case for the jury and that if the verdict of the jury is against the weight of the evidence, it is not so palpable that the court should order a new trial.

The judgment is affirmed.

CHICAGO, ST. LOUIS & NEW ORLEANS R. R. CO. v SULLIVAN.

(Filed April 29, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Right of way—Damages—Instructions—Upon a trial of exceptions to report of commissioners fixing damages for right of way, an instruction which told the jury to find the actual value of the ground taken for the right of way, and in addition thereto damages sustained to remaining part of farm, and that no more than the difference in the actual value of the farm immediately before and after the taking of the right of way should be allowed, properly directed the jury as to how the total damages should be ascertained.

Robbins & Thomas, J. M. Dickinson, Pirtle & Trabue and Jacob Corbett for appellant.

J. B. Wickliffe for appellee.

Appeal from Ballard Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

This proceeding was instituted by appellant in the Ballard County Court to condemn a right of way four hundred feet wide over the land of the appellee.

The commissioners appointed by the county court fixed the amount of appellee's damage at $1,780. Upon the trial of the exceptions to the report, a jury fixed his damages at $3,000. An appeal to the circuit court resulted in a verdict and judgment for appellee for $2,500. On this appeal it is urged that the amount is excessive and the verdict of the jury is palpably against the weight of the evidence. It was the province of the jury under our system of law to pass upon the credibility of witnesses and give such weight to their testimony as it is entitled to receive. An earnest argument is made to show that the judgments of appellee's witnesses as to the value of his land taken and damages to the residue, were of little value and that their statements were untrue.

Two juries have passed upon this question and their verdict in effect deny the correction of appellant's claim. The court declines to hold that the verdict is so palpably against the weight of the evidence that it should interfere. It is urged that the court in its instructions erred in not directing the jury to find in their verdict the different items constituting appellee's damages. The court told the jury to find the actual value of the seventeen and seven-tenth acres taken for the right of way, and in addition thereto the damages which he sustained to the remaining part of his farm of 187 acres. The court also told the jury in fixing the damages, it should not allow more than the difference in the actual value of the farm of appellee immediately before and after taking of the right of way. In our opinion the court properly directed the jury as to how they should ascertain appellee's total damages, and it was not necessary to tell the jury to return a verdict fixing separately the value of the land and the damages.

A reversal is sought because the court gave the appellee the closing argument. It was admitted on the trial that it was necessary for the railroad company to have the land for its right of way and its right to condemn it was conceded. The only question remaining was to ascertain the amount of appellee's damages. Without entering into a discussion of the question as to who had the burden, it is sufficient to say that without objection the appellee assumed it and introduced his testimony. After this had been done it was too late for the appellant to make the question and have the closing argument. We do not think the appellant was prejudiced by any ruling of the court upon the admission or rejection of testimony.

The judgment is affirmed.

ROBERTS v. FARMERS BANK.

(Filed April 29, 1904.)

Bills and notes—Note executed to bank—Assignment of collateral—Delay in suing on collateral—Appellee brought suit on a note for $220 executed to it by appellant due in sixty days, and as a defense appellant alleged that at the time he executed the note sued on he assigned to appellee as collateral security a note on K. and G. for $1,000; that when the collateral fell due its makers were solvent and paying their debts, and appellee by the exercise of ordinary diligence could have collected the amount due thereon from the payors; that he demanded of appellee that it turn over to him the collateral, so that he might sue upon it and enforce its payment, but appellee refused to surrender the note or permit him to sue thereon; that more than a year had elapsed since the maturity of the note and that in the meantime its makers had become insolvent and moved out of the State, and by reason of appellee's negligence the note had become wholly worthless. Held—That the allegations, if true, show that the holder was guilty at least of ordinary negligence in refusing to institute proceedings to enforce the collection of the note, and the demurrer to the answer should have been overruled.

A. C. Moore for appellant.

Champion & Champion for appellee.

Appeal from Crittenden Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

This action was instituted by the Farmers Bank for the purpose of recovering judgment against D. C. Roberts on a note for the sum of $220, executed and delivered to it by him, and by which he agreed and promised to pay to it the principal, with interest, sixty days after its date. As a defense, appellant alleged, substantially, the following facts as a counterclaim against appellee: That at the time he executed and delivered the note sued on, he assigned to appellee, as collateral security, a note of S. C. Knight and D. C. Griffith for the sum of $1,000, with interest at 6 per cent. from the 30th day of April, 1902, until paid; that when the collateral fell due, its makers were solvent, and paying their debts, and appellee, by the exercise of ordinary diligence, could have collected the amount due thereon from the payors; that he demanded of appellee that it turn over to him the collateral, so that he might sue upon it, and enforce its payment, but appellee refused to surrender the note, or permit him to sue thereon; that more than a year had elapsed since the maturity of the note, and that, in the meantime, its makers had become insolvent, and moved out of the State; that by the reason of appellee's negligence in the premises, the note had become wholly worthless and uncollectible.

A general demurrer to this answer was sustained by the court, and appellant declining to amend, judgment was rendered against him in accordance with the prayer of the petition; of which he is now complaining. The question for adjudication is the liability of the pledgee of a note assigned as collateral security for failure to enforce its collection at maturity, where the maker has become insolvent, entailing a loss upon the pledgor.

Colebrooke, in his work on Collateral Securities, section 114, thus states the rule: "If upon a pledge of negotiable collateral securities, so as to convey the title thereto, the pledgee, because of his gross negligence, or by his tortious transfer of them or dealings therewith, fails to collect the same of the parties bound thereon, when it might have been done, and the pledgor is injured and the amount of the collateral paper lost, the pledgee is chargeable with the face of such collateral securities as in payment and discharge of the principal debt. Where the opportunity of collecting collateral bills or notes is lost by the insolvency of the parties thereto, by reason of the supine negligence of the pledgee, when with ordinary care the same might have been enforced, the latter is liable to account for the full loss and damage of the pledgor. Such responsibility of the pledgee is limited to the actual loss." Section 115: "The pledgee of negotiable collateral securities, however, is not held to strict responsibility in proceeding at once, upon default, in the enforcement thereof. Mere delay in so doing is not sufficient to create any liability upon his part to the pledgor. Where there is no suspicion that the maker is embarrassed, and no request on the part of the pledgor that collection should be promptly made, the pledgee is not answerable for a subsequent actual loss."

In the Am. & Eng. Encyl. of Law, 2d edition, volume 22, page 899, it is said: "It is well settled that when a chose in action, such as a bond, or accepted order on a third person, is transferred and delivered to the creditor as collateral security, it is the duty of the pledgee to use reasonable care and diligence to make such collateral available; that he is bound to use proper exertion to render its collection effectual for the purpose for which it was pledged; that if necessary he must bring an action against the maker of the collateral, and that if through his negligence or wrongful act or omission, the collateral is lost, he is accountable and liable to the pledgor, in the same manner as the pledgee of goods and merchandise is liable to the pledgor if they are lost or destroyed through the pledgee's failure to give them the necessary protection and care." On page 908 Id., it is said: "Whether or not the pledgee of collaterals has used due diligence to collect them is a mixed question of law and fact. It is not for the court to determine that due diligence has been used. It is the province of the court to instruct the jury what is due diligence, and for the jury to find whether due diligence has been used."

In the case of Nolan v. Clark, 10 B. Mon., 289, the rule is thus stated: "It is said that a person who receives bonds and notes as collateral security for a debt, is bound to use due diligence, and if they are afterwards lost, through his negligence, by the insolvency of the makers, he is charged with the amount."

In the case of Bonta v. Curry, 3 Bush, 678, a note had been assigned as collateral security; afterwards, the assignor, becoming insolvent, made a general assignment for the benefit of his creditors; after the maturity of the collateral, the assignee in bankruptcy demanded of the holder of the collateral that it be turned over to him for collection, and warned him that, if he would neither surrender the note, nor forthwith sue on it, he must take the risk, and would be held responsible for any loss which might result from his persistent inaction. The court said: "Now, although Vanarsdall's note did not pass to Harris by the deed of trust, and the appellant, therefore, was not bound to surrender it on the demand made, yet, as a trustee of ordinary faith and prudence, it was his duty, after that notice and warning by the appellee, to proceed without delay to collect the note by legal process; and it seems probable that, had he thus acted he would have made the whole amount." Thereupon the judgment, holding the assignee liable for laches in regard to the collateral, was affirmed.

In the case of Sanford v. Lowenthal, 1 Ky. Law Rep., 357, the rule was stated, that the assignee of a note held as collateral was required to use due diligence in its collection. In the case of Schindler v. Hayden's Adm'r, 8 Ky. Law Rep., 859, in a well-considered opinion of Judge Ward, wherein a great number of authorities are reviewed and commented upon, it is said: "Reason and the analogies of the law, therefore, concur in the rule as stated in Stevens v. Morrow, 4 Ind., 425, that the holder of collateral paper guilty of laches, whereby the assignor is damaged, makes the paper his own, and must account to his debtor on the principal debt for the sum which he could have made by pursuing the maker of the collateral paper with ordinary diligence."

We think the allegations of the answer, while not as direct and explicit as they might have been made, were sufficient to have aroused appellee, and put it upon inquiry as to the financial condition of the payors of the collateral it held, and, if true, show that the holder was guilty of, at least, ordinary negligence in refusing to institute proceedings to enforce the collection of the note; and, under the rule established by the authorities herein cited, the demurrer should have been overruled.

Wherefore, the judgment is reversed for proceedings consistent herewith.

FORKED DEER PANTS CO. v. SHIPLEY.

(Filed May 3, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Master and servant—In an action by appellee for services under contract with appellant's general manager, the evidence showing it had discharged her and that a written contract had been entered into with her by the general manager, the jury was authorized to find for her under the contract.

2. Same—The rule is that where the employe is discharged before the expiration of the contract, he may recover for the remainder of the term, less what he has earned or might earn, by reasonable diligence. He is not required to wait until the end of the term before bringing the suit on the contract for damages for his discharge.

Puryear & Ray, John W. Ray and J. B. Ray for appellant.

Robt. L. Greene and Thos. E. Moss for appellee.

Appeal from McCracken Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

In the year 1890 appellee, Bertha Shipley, was in the service of appellant at $10 a week. She asked an increase of wages in the spring of 1891, and this being refused, left its service and went to St. Louis, and was at work there when, on the 21st of May, appellant's general manager made a contract, in writing, with her, to pay her $12 a week within a very short time until May 21, 1902, and $18 a week after that for one year, she to have complete charge of the sewing room. A further advance was contemplated after that year, but no positive promise as to this was made. She returned to Paducah and went to work, remaining in appellant's service until April 12, 1902, when she was discharged. On August 18 she filed this suit to recover damages for the breach of the contract. The defendant denied the authority of the general manager to make the contract, and also denied that she had been discharged, pleading that she left voluntarily. The jury found for the plaintiff $300.

The evidence warranted the jury in finding that the plaintiff was discharged. There was no question that the written contract was made with her as claimed by her, but by way of showing that the general manager had no authority to make it, the defendant offered in evidence one of its by-laws, as follows: "The board of directors may elect a general manager who shall have general management of the business of this association, with power to buy and sell."

The court refused to allow the by-law to be read as it was not shown that the plaintiff had notice of it. Of this appellant complains. A principal is bound by the acts of his agent within the apparent scope of his authority, although his private instruction may limit his authority more narrowly. It was manifestly within the apparent authority of the general manager of the business to make contracts for labor. If the by-laws had been read it would not have affected the result, for it conferred on the general manager the authority in question, as it provided that he should have the "general management of the business of this association, with power to buy and sell." If there were limitations upon his authority which were known to the plaintiff or of which she had notice, the association would not be bound beyond his actual authority, and this question was substantially submitted to the jury by the instructions of the court. There was not enough, however, in the evidence to charge her with notice of any limitation upon the authority of the manager, and the instruction was more favorable to the appellant than it should have been. The rule is, where the employe is discharged before the expiration of his contract, he may recover the contract price for the remainder of the term, less what he has earned or might earn by reasonable diligence. He is not required to wait until the end of his term before bringing his suit.

He can recover but once, and in that action must be allowed to recover his entire damages. The trial here took place before the end of the year contracted for, and while it is necessarily somewhat of an approximation what she might earn by diligence during the year, this is permissible and is the most that can be required of her. (Lewis v. Scott, 95 Ky., 484.)

The court properly so instructed the jury. While there were some unnecessary allegations in the petition, the allegation as to the loss on the breach of the contract and her inability to get other work, are sufficiently stated to sustain the verdict. The court did not err in refusing to continue the case on account of the absence of one of the attorneys who was sick. A large discretion must necessarily be exercised by the circuit courts in matters of this sort, with which this court will not interfere, unless palpably abused. As one of the members of the firm was present, considering all the facts we do not see that there was an abuse of discretion in refusing to pass the case or continue it on account of the absence of counsel.

Judgment affirmed.

MILLER, &c. v. WIREMAN, &c.

(Filed May 8, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Land—Adverse possession—The appellees, John and Florence Wireman, having patented a tract of land, a part of which they subsequently conveyed to their daughter, Rebecca Bailey, in which Mrs. Wireman did not join, and it appearing from the proof that since said conveyance, Wireman and his wife had resided on said land claiming it as their own adversely for more than fifteen years, they were entitled to recover, their title being perfected by possession.

2. Estoppel—Erroneous judgment—No consideration—The appellant,

Rachel Miller, not having paid anything for the land she claims, can not rely upon an estoppel; and while the court erred in adjudging the lower half of the land to her, and not adjudging a lien thereon for $125 in favor of appellee Wireman, she was not prejudiced thereby, as Wireman was entitled to have the land instead of the lien on it. Had the court so adjudged, Mrs. Miller would have received nothing. She is not personally bound for the debt and may realize something out of the land, and this court should not reverse a judgment which is not prejudicial to the appellant, and as there is no cross appeal Mrs. Wireman is not entitled to a reversal.

D. D. Sublett and John W. Rodman for appellants.

Hazelrigg, Chenault & Hazelrigg and Aug. Arnett for appellees.

Appeal from Magoffin Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

The appellants, Rachel Miller and her husband, Boyd Miller, instituted this action against John Wireman and his wife, Florence Wireman, in which they alleged that they were the owners of and were in the possession of a certain tract of land in Magoffin county, and that the defendants were committing certain trespasses upon it. They sought to recover damages and to restrain the defendants from committing further alleged acts of trespass. The defendants denied that the plaintiffs were the owners of the land. They claim that they had acquired title to it as follows: First, that the land was patented to John Wireman and his wife, Florence; second, that appellee John Wireman made a deed to his daughter, Rebecca Bailey, in 1884, in which his wife, Florence, refused to join; third, that subsequently John Wireman gave to his daughter, Rebecca, a tract of land in Breathitt county in consideration of the lower half of the tract in controversy; fourth, that Rebecca Bailey conveyed the upper half of the tract by title bond to Morgan Wireman, who assigned it to Florence Wireman; fifth, that they had been in the actual adverse possession of the land for more than fifteen years before the appellants entered upon it.

The uncontradicted testimony shows that the land was originally owned by John and Florence Wireman, and which evidence was given without objection. John Wireman in 1884 made a deed to his daughter, Rebecca, for the land, the consideration being love and affection. Shortly after this was made the evidence tends to show that John Wireman conveyed to his daughter, Rebecca, land in Breathitt county for the lower half of the tract in controversy. This deed was destroyed, and at her instance John Wireman conveyed the Breathitt county land to Jack Wireman, the latter having paid Rebecca for it. She never made her father a deed reconveying the lower half. The evidence tends to show that Rebecca Bailey sold the other half to Morgan Wireman, and it shows clearly that Morgan Wireman paid her therefor. It also shows that Florence Wireman bought from Morgan Wireman his interest in the land. A paper is pleaded which purports to be a title bond for the land from her to Morgan Wireman, but her signature is by mark, without an attesting witness. Rebecca denied in her pleadings that she executed the bond, but did not deny in her testimony that she had done so, although she denied having made the exchange of land heretofore mentioned.

The court below adjudged that Florence Wireman's heirs (she having died pending the suit) were entitled to the upper half and the appellant, Rachel Miller, the lower half, subject to a lien for $125. It is claimed by the appellants that the court erred in adjudging the upper half of the land to Florence Wireman's heirs, because the evidence was not sufficient to show that Rebecca Bailey executed the title bond to Morgan Wireman, and in giving John Wireman a lien on the lower half of the land, because the exchange of lands, if at all, was in parol and not enforceable, and that no pleading had been filed authorizing such a judgment. If they were in error as to this, they claim John Wireman was present when the deed was made by Rebecca Bailey to her daughter, and is estopped to deny its validity. We will discuss the questions regardless of the order in which they are stated.

The evidence on behalf of appellees tend to show that John Wireman and his wife occupied and claimed the land in controversy for more than fifteen years after he made the deed to his daughter, and before the appellants got possession of any part of it. If the evidence fails to show that Rebecca did execute the title bond to Morgan Wireman for the land, it does show that he bought and paid her for it, and the transaction amounted to a parol sale of the upper half of the tract. The evidence shows a parol sale of the lower half to John Wireman. So John Wireman and his wife at least held the lands under parol contracts of purchase (though as a matter of fact the wife had never parted with her interest in it,) and having been in the adverse possession for more than fifteen years, claiming it as their own before appellants entered upon it, the statute of limitation made perfect their title to the land. While the Wiremans could not have enforced specific performance of the verbal contracts, that fact did not militate against their right to acquire title to it by an adverse holding. (Thomson v. Thomson, &c., 98 Ky., 435; Lynn v. Cannada, Guardian, 20 Ky. Law Rep., 1488; Hornsby, &c. v. Davidson, &c., 21 Ky. Law Rep., 1582.) The title to the land by adverse holding even if Florence Wireman had joined in the deed to Rebecca Bailey. If we are correct in this conclusion, then John Wireman and his wife, Florence Wireman were entitled to hold the land, unless John Wireman lost his interest in it by reason of the deed which his daughter, Rebecca, made to her daughter, Rachel Miller. John Wireman was a very old man at the time of this transaction. Rachel Miller never paid a cent for the land. It was conveyed to her in consideration of love and affection. If John Wireman did, at the time of the execution of the deed, that which the appellants claim he did, and Rachel had given a valuable consideration for the land, then he would be estopped to assert title to his interest in it. Rachel Miller not having parted with anything as consideration for the land, she is not entitled to rely upon an estoppel; hence the court should have adjudged the lower half of the land to John Wireman, instead of Rachel Miller. While the court erred in adjudging the lower half of the land to appellant, Mrs. Miller, and not adjudging a lien thereon for $125 in favor of appellee, John Wireman, the question remains, is she prejudiced by such a judgment? Wireman was entitled to have the land adjudged to him, instead of the lien on it. Had the court so adjudged, Mrs. Miller would not have received anything by the judgment. Having been erroneously adjudged the land, can she complain on the appeal that she was adjudged it with a lien debt on it? She is not personally bound for the debt. The land may be worth much more than the lien debt, hence, as she is not personally bound for it, she may realize something out of it when she was not entitled to any of it. Certainly she can not be prejudiced by the judgment, and the court should not reverse a judgment which is not prejudicial to the appellant. As there is no cross appeal, appellee Wireman is not entitled to have the judgment reversed.

The judgment is affirmed.

BARIES v. LOUISVILLE ELECTRIC LIGHT CO.

(Filed May 8, 1904.)

1. Verdict—Insufficient damages—Failure to plead special damages—Appellant is a painter, and at the time he was injured he was in the employ of one McKelvey, who had the contract for painting a house on which there was one of appellee's wires, not properly insulated, with which he came in contact, by which his arm has withered and become useless. A verdict of one cent damages can not be reversed for the smallness of the damages, for the reason that special damages can not be recovered unless pleaded, which was not done in this case.

2. Incompetent evidence—General custom—On the trial the court admitted evidence to show that it was a general custom for contractors to notify appellee that they were working on a house to which the wires were attached, and when this notice was given it always cut the wires. This evidence was incompetent and prejudicial to appellant. If appellee was negligent in not having its wires insulated, which was the proximate cause of appellant's injury, it can not be excused because some other person might have performed a duty that would have prevented the injury.

Bennett H. Young for appellant.

O'Neal & O'Neal for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Common Pleas Branch, Second Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

The arm of appellant has withered and become useless by coming in contact with a live wire of appellee; it occurred while painting on a house to which the wire was attached. Appellant claims that he received the injury by reason of appellee's negligence in not having the wire properly insulated. This was the question of fact at issue on the trial of the case. The jury returned a verdict for the appellant, and fixed his damages at one cent.

He asks a reversal on the grounds: First, that the verdict fixing damages is flagrantly against the weight of the evidence; second, that the court erred to his prejudice in the admission of evidence. It is the contention of appellee that, under section 341 of Civil Code of Practice, the judgment can not be reversed because of the smallness of damages in an action for an injury to the person. The evidence shows that he was earning and could earn at his trade as a painter $15 a week, and that the time lost in consequence of his injury would equal a sum greater than $800. The loss of time resulting from a personal injury is a pecuniary loss in contemplation of section 341, and it is a ground for reversal if the verdict is for the plaintiff, and it does not award damages to cover such pecuniary loss. (Taylor v. Howser, 12

Bush, 468; Ray v. Jeffries, 86 Ky., 367; Stroh v. South Covington and Cincinnati Street Ry. Co., ante, 1868.) This court has repeatedly held that special damages must be pleaded. It was not sufficiently done in this case. It is averred in the petition that since the plaintiff received the injury he "has been and is unable to do any kind of work." The averment is not sufficient, hence the appellant is not entitled to a reversal because of the smallness of damages. (Ray v. Jeffries, supra; Stroh v. South Covington & Cincinnati Street Ry. Co., supra; Jesse v. Shuck, 11 Ky. Law Rep., 463.)

While it is stated by the jury that the verdict is for the plaintiff, it was in effect for the defendant. It can not be believed that any jury would so lack in judgment and proper appreciation of the serious loss resulting from a withered arm, as to believe that one cent would compensate the injured party. In determining whether or not appellant was prejudiced by the admission of improper evidence, we will consider its effect the same as if the verdict had been for the appellee. At the time of the injury appellant was in the employ of McKelvey, who had the contract for painting the house. It is contended that the court erred in admitting evidence that McKelvey and some of his employes had notice that appellee desired to cut the wire, when the painting should progress far enough for the men to work on that portion of the building where the wires were situated. Such evidence would be incompetent, as it would be allowing appellee to show the negligence of appellant's employer, to exonerate it from a liability for negligence which was the proximate cause of the injury. The neglect of McKelvey was not a contributory act imputable to the appellant. If appellee was negligent in failing to properly insulate its wire at the place where appellant had the right to be in the discharge of his duties, it certainly could not be relieved of the consequence of its negligence, because some one other than the appellant might have, by performing a duty, prevented the injury. While there is no evidence that such notice was given to McKelvey, evidence was admitted to show that a general custom prevailed which required contractors to notify appellee they were working on a house to which its wires were attached, and when this was done it always cut the wires. This evidence was intended to show that there was a duty upon appellant's employer or himself to give the appellee notice that work was being done on the house. If that custom required the employer or his foreman to give such notice, their failure to do so could not release the appellee from the consequences of its negligence in failing to properly insulate the wires. If such evidence is admissible under any circumstances, it was not in this case; because the appellee introduced evidence showing it had notice the day before the accident that the painters were at work on the house where the accident happened, and Mr. Kinkead, one of its electricians, testified that appellee cut the wires on houses when it had such information. It is the purpose of the notice that men are at work where appellee has its wires to give it an opportunity to cut them. If it had the notice, then the evidence of the general custom (if evidence of it is admissible in any case) was not admissible in this case, for if it had been followed the appellee would have been told a fact of which it was already apprised. Besides, the evidence taken in its entirety did not show that there was any general custom which could impose a duty upon an ordinary employe of a contractor to give such notice. The admission of the evidence as to the general custom was prejudicial to the rights of the appellant. In giving instructions to the jury the court seems to have followed Laughlin v. Louisville Electric Light Co., 100 Ky., 173, and other cases to the same effect.

The judgment is reversed, with directions for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

HORN v. CARROLL.

(Filed May 3, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. New trial—Where a judgment was rendered against H. & Co.; instead of H., no motion having been made in the circuit court to correct the judgment on that ground as required by section 763, Civil Code, the Court of Appeals is without power to reverse on that ground.

2. Damages—Instructions—In an action for damages for failure to carry out contract with reference to cutting cross ties, an instruction which authorized the jury to award the full contract price for ties cut by other parties was erroneous, the damages being the real profit that would have been realized over and above the cost in cutting the ties.

3. Burden of proof—In an action upon a contract for cutting timber, where the defendant produced a contract which plaintiff denied was the true contract, the burden was upon the latter that, by reason of fraud or mistake this was not the true contract, and an instruction that placed the burden of proving the contract upon defendant was erroneous.

M. M. Logan and R. L. Greene for appellant.

Wm. Cromwell for appellee.

Appeal from Edmonson Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

This action was instituted by appellee against the appellant for an alleged violation of a written contract of sale of oak timber to be manufactured into cross ties. The petition alleges in substance that in November, 1899, he sold, by written contract to the appellant, all of the oak timber upon a tract of 200 acres of land owned by him, suitable for cross ties, in consideration of $200 in cash, and the further consideration that the defendant was to employ him to cut the cross ties and to pay him therefor 10 cents per tie. He also alleges that all of the timber was to be taken off the premises within two years from the date of the contract. He charges that after he had gotten out about one-half of the cross ties that the defendant, Horn, stopped him, and had the work performed by other parties; and that in consequence of this violation of the contract he was damaged $50. He further alleges that the defendant cut and removed certain board trees, which were reserved from the contract, to his damage; that all of the timber was to be removed in two years; but that the defendant held the forcible possession of the land and removed therefrom a large amount of timber after the expiration of the contract time, to his damage in $100. The defendant, Horn, for answer, denied that the timber was to be removed in two years from the date of the contract, or that the plaintiff was to have the exclusive privilege of cutting out cross ties; and further filed what purports to be the written contract between the parties, which provides that he was to have until December 9, 1903, or three years from the date thereof, to work the timber; and that the plaintiff was to have the right to manufacture the timber, on a part of the land only, at the same price paid other workmen, and charges that before the expiration of the contract the plaintiff cut and removed a large amount of the timber covered by the contract, to his damage in at least $325. Plaintiff, in his reply, denied that the written contract produced by the defendant was the true contract between the parties, and claimed that he had been deceived and overreached in its execution. The issues were made up, and a jury trial resulted in a verdict and judgment for $75 in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendant has appealed.

Several grounds are relied on for reversal; first, because the judgment is against R. W. Horn & Co., instead of R. W. Horn, the real defendant. As no motion to correct the judgment on this ground was made in the circuit court as required by section 763 of the Civil Code, this court is without power to reverse on this ground, even if the alleged error affected the substantial rights of the defendant, which, however, does not appear from the record to be true in this case. Appellant, however, justly complains that the instructions as to the measure of plaintiff's damage growing out of the failure of the appellant to allow him to cut the cross ties, as they authorize the jury to award him the full contract price for the ties cut by other parties. This was erroneous. His damages on this score was the reasonable profit which he would have realized over and above the cost to him, in cutting these ties. The instructions are also erroneous and prejudicial to the appellant in placing upon him the burden of establishing the contract. The plaintiff, both in his pleadings and testimony, admitted that the contract was in writing. The only contract produced upon the trial was that introduced by the defendant, and which was identified as the true contract between the parties by the attesting witness, and the burden was, therefore, properly upon the plaintiff, to show that by reason of fraud and mistake this was not the true contract between them.

For reasons indicated the judgment is reversed and cause remanded for proceedings consistent herewith.

LONDON v. CITY OF FRANKLIN, &c.

(Filed May 8, 1904.)

Office and officers—Town marshal—Removal from office—Under Kentucky Statutes, section 8619, providing that "the marshal shall be appointed for a term of two years by the city council, but may be removed at the pleasure of the city council," a marshal of a city of the fifth class may be removed from his office by the city council at any time, without notice or hearing.

Roark & Finn for appellant.

L. B. Finn and G. W. Whitesides for appellees.

Appeal from Simpson Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

Appellant was appointed marshal of the city of Franklin to fill out an unexpired term. After this, in June, 1903, the grand jury returned an indictment against him for fornication; on the first Monday in July he tendered to the council his resignation as marshal, to take effect upon his conviction of the offense of fornication. The council refused to accept the conditional resignation, and without notice to him or hearing, entered an order removing him as marshal and appointing appellee Williams to his place. He afterwards filed this suit against Williams and the city to recover the emoluments of the office for the remainder of the term, on the ground that the order of the council was void. Section 3619, Kentucky Statutes, provides: "The marshal, assessor, treasurer, clerk and city attorney shall be appointed for a term of two years by the city council, but may be removed at the pleasure of the city council."

Section 3622 also provides: "Any vacancies occurring in any of the offices provided for in this chapter shall be filled by appointment of the city council."

These sections are part of the act regulating cities of the fifth class, to which Franklin belongs. Section 160 of the Constitution contains this clause: "The general assembly shall prescribe the qualifications of all officers of towns and cities, the manner in and causes for which they may be removed from office, and how vacancies in such offices shall be filled."

It is insisted for appellant that under the constitutional provision officers of cities and towns may be only removed for cause, and that section 3619 of the statute above quoted must be construed to refer only to removals for cause, or, if not so construed, is unconstitutional. The language of the statute is that the officers named may be removed at the pleasure of the city council. These words have a well-defined legal meaning. The right to remove at pleasure is an entirely different thing from the right to remove for cause. To hold that the statute only authorizes the council to remove for cause would be to deny the words used by the legislature their ordinary meaning. This can not be done. (Kentucky Statutes, section 460.)

It was held in Todd v. Dunlap, 99 Ky., 449, that the constitutional provision quoted, applies to all officers of cities and towns, whether created by the Constitution or by statute; and in that case it was held that the power to remove arbitrarily was not vested in the mayor under sections 2781, 2794, Kentucky Statutes, governing cities of the first class. But the case turned on the construction of the statute, and no opinion was expressed as to the power of the legislature to provide for removals at the pleasure of the city council. In Lexington v. Rennick, 105 Ky., 779, it was held that section 161 of the Constitution forbidding a change in the compensation of a municipal officer after his election or appointment and during his term of office, does not apply to officers who hold at the pleasure of the council. By section 160, other officers of towns and cities than those therein named, may be elected by the qualified voters or appointed by the local authorities as the general assembly may, by general law, provide; but when elected by the voters their terms of office shall be four years and until their successors are qualified. The length of the term of officers who are not elected by the people is not fixed by the Constitution. This may be regulated by the general assembly. In creating the office of marshal of cities of the fifth class, the general assembly might, without violating any constitutional provision, enact that the office should be filled by appointment of the council and held subject to its pleasure; for as to these subordinate officers the whole matter is left to the legislative judgment. If the statute in question had contained nothing about a term of two years there would have been no question of its constitutionality. But what is said on this subject does not conflict with the other words used. Taken as a whole, the sense of the section is plain. Its meaning is that the officers named shall hold at the pleasure of the city council, but not longer than for a term of two years. The council is elected itself for two years, and for this reason their power of appointment is also limited to two years. But their appointees during the term, hold at their pleasure. In other words, their appointments are subject to the pleasure of the council, but expire in any event after two years. The limitation of their appointment to two years does not make them any less at the pleasure of the council than they would have been if this limitation had been omitted. The purpose of the two years' limitation is to make the appointees of one council go out with it, or substantially so, and leave the new council entirely free to make its own appointments for its term. It was not designed to interfere in any way with the appointees holding at the pleasure of the council. To hold that the council can not, under the statute, remove the marshal at pleasure because of the constitutional provision, would be in effect to say that the legislature can not, under the Constitution, create inferior municipal officers to be appointed by the council and to hold their offices at the pleasure of the council.

Judgment affirmed.

GAULT v. GAULT, &c.

(Filed May 4, 1904—Not to be reported.)

1. Life insurance—Policy payable to wife and children of insured—In this State where a life policy is made payable to the wife and children of the insured, as to the beneficiaries it should be regarded in the light of a testamentary provision rather than a contract, and, therefore, the policy in question being made for the benefit of the wife and children of the insured, should be construed as far as possible under the statutes applicable to devises by will; and as a will speaks from the date of the death of the insured, and not from the date of the will, the language in the policy "that the company agrees with the assured well and truly to pay the sum insured to the assured, their executors, administrators, or assigns, within ninety days after proof of death," has reference only to how and when the money should be paid to those who at the death of the insured constitute the assured under the policy, as it could not be known definitely who the assured were until the death of the insured.

2. Devises to a class—Survivors—It must be presumed that when the policy was procured, the contract was made with reference to the law of Kentucky as it then stood, and, therefore, section 2064, Kentucky Statutes, must be read into the contract, which provides "that when a devise is made to several as a class, or as tenants in common, or as joint tenants, and one or more of the devisees shall die before the testator, the share of such as die shall go to his or her descendants, if any; if none, then to the surviving devisees, unless a different disposition is made by the deviser, and under this statute the policy being payable to the wife and children of the insured jointly upon the death of George W. Gault childless before the insured, the said

George being one of the children of the insured, his interest in the policy passed to the survivors.

Forebt & Field for appellant.

Grubbs & Grubbs and Lane & Harrison for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery Branch, First Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

The appellant, Susan Gault, is the daughter-in-law of Joseph Gault, now deceased, and is the widow of his son, George W. Gault, also deceased. The appellees are the children of Joseph Gault. This controversy grows out of the claim of appellant to an interest in the sum of $9,448 of life insurance payable on three insurance policies on the life of Joseph Gault. These three policies are identical in language, except as to the amounts. The following agreed facts will, therefore, illustrate the whole case:

On November 1, 1869, the Ætna Life Insurance Co. issued and delivered to Joseph Gault its policy No. 67,459, the material parts of which are as follows:

"This policy of insurance witnesseth: That the Ætna Life Insurance Co., in consideration of an annual premium of $275.70, to be paid or secured to said company by Joseph Gault, for the benefit of Mary A. Gault and his children, the first premium in advance, and each succeeding premium on or before the 1st day of November of each year during the continuance of this policy, do assure the life of Joseph Gault, of Louisville, in the county of Jefferson, State of Kentucky, in the amount of $5,000, for the term of his life.

"And the said company do hereby promise and agree, to and with the said assured, their executors, administrators, and assigns, well and truly to pay or cause to be paid, the said sum insured to the said assured, their executors, administrators, or assigns, within ninety days after due notice and proof of the death of the said Joseph Gault, and all indebtedness of the party to the company shall be deducted from the sum insured."

That at the dates of all of the policies, Joseph Gault had a wife named Mary A. Gault, and four children, namely, two sons, George W. Gault and Joseph K. Gault, who were his children by his former wife, who had died many years before any of said policies were issued, and two daughters, Margaret D. Dickens and Mary E. Gault, who were his daughters by his wife, the said Mary A. Gault, named in the said policies. That at the time said policies were issued Joseph Gault resided in Louisville, Ky., where he continued thereafter to reside until his death; that all said policies were delivered to Joseph Gault in Louisville, Ky., and that he paid all the annual premiums promptly in advance as they matured, and paid same to the insurance company at its office in Louisville, Ky.; that his son, George W. Gault, died intestate on the — day of October, 1892, a resident of Jefferson county, Kentucky, and left surviving him his wife, the said Susan Gault, but never had any child or children; that Joseph Gault, the father of said George W. Gault, was his sole and only heir at law; that Mary A. Gault, wife of Joseph Gault, and named as one of the beneficiaries in his will, died intestate on the 27th day of July, 1902, and left surviving her, her husband, the said Joseph Gault, and only two children, and they were Margaret D. Dickens and Mary E. Gault; that Joseph Gault died testate on March 10, 1908, being a widower at the date of his death, and left surviving him only three children, who are the appellees herein; that by his will, which was duly admitted to probate, Joseph Gault devised all of his estate to his three children, the appellees herein, and nominated his daughter, Mary E. Gault, as executrix thereof.

The question which arises for adjudication on this appeal is the interest, if any, which appellant has in the insurance money in question. Section 2064, Kentucky Statutes, is as follows: "When a devise is made to several as a class or as tenants in common, or as joint tenants, and one or more of the devisees shall die before the testator, and another or others shall survive the testator, the share or shares of all such as die shall go to his or their descendants, if any; if none, to the surviving devisees, unless a different disposition is made by the deviser. A devise to children embraces grandchildren when there are no children."

Section 4841: "If a devisee or legatee dies before the testator, or is dead at the making of the will, thus leaving issue who survive the testator, such issue shall take the estate devised or bequeathed, as the devisee or legatee would have done if he had survived the testator, unless a different disposition thereof is made or required by the will."

In this State, where a life policy is made payable to the wife and children of the insured, as to the beneficiaries, it should be regarded in the light of testamentary provisions, rather than a contract. (Robinson v. Duvall, 79 Ky., 83; Duvall v. Goodson, Id., 224; Supreme Council Catholic Knights of America v. Densford, &c., 21 Ky. Law Rep., 1574.) It follows, therefore, that, so far as possible, the policy in question should be construed in the light of the statutes above quoted with reference to devises and devisees. It is frankly admitted by counsel for appellant that, if the policy contained only the language enumerating the beneficiaries, the judgment of the chancellor, denying appellant any right to participate in the fund, would be a correct exposition of the law; but they urgently insist that the agreement of the insurance company to pay over the insurance upon the death of the insured to the beneficiaries, "their executors, administrators and assigns," conferred upon the assured vested interests which, upon their death, passed under the statutes of descent and distribution. To this we can not agree. As said in the case of Robinson v. Duvall, supra: "A life policy, as between the assured and the insurer, is strictly and only a contract for the payment of money upon the happening of a contingency, uncertain only as to the time when it will occur, and is subject to the general rules which govern in the interpretation of other contracts. But when considered with respect to the rights of those who claim to be beneficiaries, especially when they are the natural objects of the affection and bounty of the person procuring and paying for the insurance, should be regarded in the light of a testamentary provision rather than of a contract. The object of all interpretation of acts or words is to arrive at the intentions of the person whose acts or words are to be interpreted; and the nature of the transaction and the relation of the parties are frequently important, and sometimes controlling factors in the problem. In taking the policy the insured was not providing for himself, but for his wife and children after his death; and it would be unreasonable to suppose that he intended, in case one of these objects of his affection should die during his life, that the interest of the one so dying should pass to himself, and at his death to his personal representative. It would be more consistent with his evident design in insuring his life for the benefit of all his family, wife and children alike, to suppose that his intention was, that in case one or more should die before himself, without leaving children, the share to which those dying would have been entitled had they survived him, should go to the survivors."

The construction for which appellant contends would produce the very effect which, as said in the opinion above quoted, is presumed not to have been the intention of him who procured the insurance, that he was providing in part, at least, for himself; for if, upon the death of one of the beneficiaries, childless, the share of the decedent was vested and became a part of his estate, then the father who procured the insurance, would, necessarily, be entitled under the statute of descent and distribution to the share of the deceased child. It must be presumed that, when the policy was procured, the contract was made with reference to the law of Kentucky as it then stood, and, therefore, section 2064 must be read into the contract under consideration. As this policy, under the decision of this court, must be construed as a will, it speaks from the time of the death of Joseph Gault, and not from its date. The language that the company agrees with the "assured, their executors, administrators and assigns, well and truly to pay or cause to be paid, the said sum insured to the said assured, their executors, administrators, or assigns, within ninety days after due notice and proof of the death of the said Joseph Gault," has reference only as to how and when the money should be paid to those who, at the death of Joseph Gault, constitute the assured under the policy. Under section 2064, it could not be known, definitely, who the assured were, until the death of Joseph Gault, and when, by the happening of that event, it was determined who were the beneficiaries, the company agreed to pay the insurance money to them, or, if any of them should die after the death of Joseph Gault, and before the time of payment as fixed by the contract, in that event the company would pay their executors, administrators and assigns. If the language, with reference to the payment by the company, can be construed to have the effect contended for by appellant, then any of the named beneficiaries, prior to the death of Joseph Gault, might have assigned and sold his vested interest; and, if he afterward died, childless and unmarried, his assignee, although a stranger, would take his share to the exclusion of the surviving beneficiaries, who were the natural objects of the affection and bounty of the father.

We do not think the language in the policy, with reference as to how and when the money should be paid by the company, manifests an intention that it should be distributed differently from the provisions of the statute. Taking the instrument as a whole, which includes section 2064, we think it is clear that Joseph Gault intended to make a provision for the benefit of his own family, and that in case of the death of any of the named beneficiaries, without children, before his own demise, the share of the decedent should go to the survivors. As said by Judge Burnam, in the case of the Supreme Council of Catholic Knights of America v. Densford, supra: "If the mother of appellees had died childless, then the fund would have gone to the surviving beneficiaries, but, as she left children surviving her, they stand in her shoes, and are entitled to one-third of the fund provided for by the certificate." That case, in principle, was in all respects similar to the case at bar. In this case, the son died childless; therefore, under the language of the opinion cited, his share would go to the surviving beneficiaries.

As the judgment of the chancellor is consonant with the conclusion herein reached it is affirmed.

LOUISVILLE, ANCHORAGE AND PEWEE VALLEY ELECTRIC RY.
CO. v. WHIPPS, &c.

(Filed May 4, 1904.)

1. Breach of contract—Failure to erect and maintain depot—Measure of damages—Mrs. Minnie C. Whipps and her husband conveyed the right of way to the appellant through a 45-acre tract of land owned by her in Jefferson county, near to and opposite the Lakeland depot on the L. & N. R. R., in consideration that appellant would erect and maintain a depot or stopping place on her land at a point opposite the L. & N. depot at Lakeland, which the appellant's road parallels. The appellant failed to erect said depot as agreed, but placed it about a quarter of a mile east of the point agreed on, and this suit is to recover damages for the breach of said contract. Held—That the measure of damages which she is entitled to recover is such sum as would represent the difference, if any, as shown by the evidence, in what would have been the fair market value of the residue of her land after the conveyance of the right of way, if the depot or stopping place had been established at the point on her land agreed on by the parties, and the fair market value of such residue of her land without the depot, not to exceed $3,000, the sum claimed in her petition. And in so estimating the damage the jury should not consider the profits, if any, which she might have made in any business she might have established at or near such depot, but may consider the adaptation, if any, which the location of the depot at the point mentioned, would have given her land for business or other useful purposes and thereby enhanced its market value.

2. Evidence—Price of adjacent land—Evidence as to what price other lands contiguous to that of appellees and situated like it on appellant's roadway, sold for, and as to the advantages of appellee's land for business and suburban purposes, and also as to what value the location of a depot on her land at the point agreed on would give the land, was competent.

3. Conflict of opinion—To the extent that the opinion in this case conflicts with the cases of L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Neafus, 98 Ky., 53, and L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Taylor, 96 Ky., 241, they are overruled.

D. W. Saunders, O'Neal & O'Neal and W. B. Thomas for appellant.

Kohn, Baird & Spindle and R. K. Greene for appellees.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Common Pleas Branch, First Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle.

This is an action in damages for a breach of contract. The appellant owns and operates an electric railroad from the city of Louisville to Pewee Valley, a distance of about fifteen miles. It appears from the petition that the appellee, Minnie C. Whipps, owns 45 acres of land in Jefferson county opposite the Lakeland depot of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co., from which she and her husband, the appellee, George L. Whipps, conveyed to appellant in fee simple, something near half a mile of right of way twenty-five feet in width for its roadbed, in consideration, as alleged, that the appellant would erect and maintain at Lakeland a depot or stopping point on the right of way conveyed, at a point opposite the depot of the Louisville & Nashville R. R., which the appellant's road parallels.

By the terms of the conveyance appellant's road was to make a curve at the proposed depot location or stopping place, leaving a strip of ground between its road and the Louisville & Nashville R. R., on which the appellees were to have the right to erect a storehouse and business place, as it was thought such a location between two roads carrying suburban traffic would possess unusual advantages for business purposes. After the execution of this deed it was ascertained by appellant that it would be of detriment to it in the operation of its road to make this curve, and of decided advantage to have its road straightened, as at a point not far distant it had to climb an ascent so as to make an overhead crossing to the north side of the L. & N. R. R. going into Anchorage. So at the request of appellant, appellees consented that the road might be straightened, as by so doing appellant avoided some very heavy cutting through a hill on the appellees' property. It was, however, understood between the parties that this concession did not relieve the appellant of its undertaking to locate the depot or stopping place at a point just opposite the Lakeland depot of the Louisville & Nashville R. R., and about the center of the appellees' land, and its location there was expected to add a value to the property both for business sites and for suburban residences.

Upon the completion of appellant's road and for some days after its cars were in operation, it seems to have regularly stopped them at the point where the station was to be located according to agreement, and lumber and materials were placed there by appellant, apparently with a view of erecting the depot at that point. But it was then concluded by appellant that it would be unable to carry out its contract with the appellees, because the Louisville & Nashville R. R., whose property adjoins, would not grant it the right of a public crossing; for which reason appellant carried away its building material, and erected its depot a quarter of a mile east of the point agreed on, putting it at the corner of adjacent property owned by Shallcross, where it is entered by the county road.

After concluding to thus change the location of the depot, appellant would not suffer its trains to be stopped at the point on appellees' land where it had agreed to locate it, and the agreement as to the depot and stopping place was never performed. Therefore, this action was instituted against appellant by appellees for the breach of the contract resulting from its nonperformance. The answer of appellant denied the material averments of the petition, and in addition, among other matters of defense, alleged that appellees not only donated the land for its right of way through their property, but also agreed to donate further land to it for a depot, and to erect thereon a depot for the use and benefit of appellant, and that appellant only agreed on its part to use the depot thus furnished by the appellees. An amended answer was tendered, but not allowed to be filed, which contained an offer upon the part of appellant to establish a stopping place at the point agreed, if appellees would erect there a depot for its use, and make the same accessible to the public. We do not think it was an abuse of discretion for the lower court to refuse to permit the amendment to be filed. The matter relied on therein was known to appellant when its original answer was filed, and no reason was shown why the amendment was not offered earlier. The principal issues presented by the pleadings were, as to whether the appellant had agreed to erect the depot at the point claimed by appellees, in consideration of the right of way conveyed, or whether its erection was conditioned upon the appellees donating further land for the location of the depot and themselves building it. These, and other material issues seem to have been submitted to the jury under the proof heard, and under instructions given by the court; and they found in favor of appellees, assessing the damages for the breach of the contract at the sum of $300.

Conceding that appellant was sincere in its tardy offer to yet make a stopping place at the point contended for by the appellees if the latter would there erect for it a depot and make it accessible to the public, no reason is perceived why such an offer should have authorized the lower court to take the case from the jury as contended by appellant. The court could properly have done no more than to instruct the jury on that point as it did, that if such was the consideration for the conveyance of the right of way, they should find for the appellant. But upon the other hand, if the agreement was that appellant, in consideration of the conveyance of the right of way by appellees, was to erect the depot or establish a stopping place at the point claimed by appellees, they should find for them. But we find that there are two other contentions relied upon by appellant for a reversal that are much more serious than the one indicated, viz.: First, that the trial court erred as to the measure of damages in instructing the jury; second, that the court also erred in the admission of evidence.

The following is the instruction given by the court on the measure of damages: "If the jury find their verdict for the plaintiff, they shall find for the plaintiff in such sum of money as they may believe from the evidence represents the fair and reasonable value of the land conveyed by the plaintiff to the defendant for the right of way at the time said conveyance was made, and in addition thereto such a further sum as they may believe from the evidence would represent the difference, if any, between what would have been the market value of the residue of the plaintiff's land, out of which said right of way was conveyed, if such stopping place had been established at the location mentioned in instruction No. 1, and the market value of said residue of land without said stopping place; the whole award not to exceed the sum of $3,000, the amount claimed in the petition. In determining the difference in value referred to herein, if there be such difference, the jury will not consider the profits, if any, which might have been made by the plaintiff in any business the plaintiff might have established at or near said stopping place; but the jury may consider the adaptation, if any, which the location of said stopping place, as in instruction No. 1, would have given plaintiff's land for business or other useful purposes, and thereby have enhanced its market value. If the jury find their verdict for the defendant, they shall so state, and no more."

This instruction was evidently patterned after that approved by this court in the case of L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Neafus, 98 Ky., 53. But after a careful examination of the authorities bearing upon the question, we have come to the conclusion that the measure of damages in that case, as well as in the one at bar, was not correctly announced.

In Sutherland on Damages, volume 2, section 576, we find what we regard as the correct rule on this subject thus stated: "A covenant by a railroad company, in consideration of the grant of the right of way through land, to erect a flag station convenient to the grantor's house, and to permit him to cultivate all the land granted which was not needed by the grantee, runs with the land, and binds the grantee's assignee, who has notice. The measure of damages for its breach is the difference between the value of the lands when suit is brought, and what their value would have been had all the stipulations in the contract been substantially performed; or, in other words, the additional value which would have accrued to the lands but for the breach. The covenant inured to the benefit of the grantor's adjoining land, and if performed would have increased its market value. This appreciation was within the legal if not the actual contemplation of the parties. Its loss was the natural and proximate result of the breach of the contract."

Continuing the discussion, the learned author refers to a Pennsylvania case in which there was a breach of the contract to erect a depot, the erection of which was the principal consideration for the release of the right of way through the plaintiffs' land. The trial court announced the damages to be the same as would have been awarded the owner if the land had been condemned. When the case reached the Supreme Court of the State, that court, in an opinion by Agnew, J., which is approved by Sutherland, said: "Instead then of the question being the difference in value of the land before and after the building of the road, considering all advantages and disadvantages to the owner, the question would be upon the additional value which would accrue to the plaintiff's land in the event of erecting such a depot as the contract called for. Under the contract, whatever specific advantages would accrue to the land from the adjacent depot and station, would have to be added to the plaintiff's claim, for this would be his loss in case of a breach of the contract. While the profits of his business can not be added to his damages, for these are speculative and uncertain, the business advantages which constitute the characteristics of the land and give it value are not to be thrown out of consideration in determining the value of the land. Clearly, if the depot and station would make the plaintiff's land more valuable as a place of business, by bringing to it business it would not possess without them, they give greater value to the land to the extent of the increase by reason of their being placed there, and, therefore, fall within the scope of the contract."

In Sedgwick on Damages, volume 2, section 680, it is said: "Where a railroad company breaks an agreement to build a station at any given place, the measure of damages is the enhanced value of the land, had the depot been erected."

The rule announced in these two admirable works on damages is in conflict with that stated in L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Neafus, supra, yet we think it both just and reasonable.

We think it would be neither reasonable nor just to allow appellees the value of the land conveyed by them to appellant for its roadbed, in addition to the value which would have accrued to the residue of their land by the building of the depot. The action is not one to recover the value of land which appellant has wrongfully appropriated to its use. In such case the damages recoverable would necessarily include the value of the land taken as well as the injury that resulted to the residue of appellees' lands from such taking, without regard to any advantage that might have accrued thereto by the construction of the railroad. But here it is conceded that the land was conveyed to appellant by the appellee, and the complaint of the latter is, that there has been a failure of consideration. In other words, appellant has failed to erect a depot or establish a stopping place at an agreed point in front of appellees' property, as it undertook to do, as compensation to them for the right of way; which failure constitutes a breach of the contract.

What induced appellees to convey the right of way to appellant? It was because the erection of a depot, and the stopping of its cars in front of their property, would enhance its vendible value. The depot was not built, or the stopping place established as agreed, consequently the expected increase in the value of appellees' land did not result, and by this means they have been damaged. What then is the true criterion of damages? It is such a sum as would represent the difference, if any, as shown by the evidence, in what would have been the fair market value of the residue of Minnie C. Whipp's land after the conveyance of the right of way, if the depot or stopping place had been established at the point on appellees' land agreed upon by the parties, and the fair market value of such residue of land without the depot or stopping place, the whole award not to exceed $8,000, the sum claimed in the petition. And in so estimating the damages the jury should not consider the profits, if any, which might have been made by the appellee, Minnie C. Whipps, in any business she might have established at or near such depot or stopping place, but may consider the adaptation, if any, which the location of the depot or stopping place at the point mentioned, would have given her land for business or other useful purposes, and thereby have enhanced its market value.

Certain evidence as to what prices other lands contiguous to that of appellees' and situated like it on the appellant's roadway sold for, and as to the advantages of appellees' land for business and suburban purposes, and also as to what value the location of a depot on her land at the point agreed on would give the land, was objected to by appellant, and it now complains of its admission. But such evidence has been declared by this court competent.

In City of Paducah v. Allen, 28 Ky. Law Rep., 701, it was said on this subject: "On the trial, appellant offered to prove by various witnesses what adjoining properties of the same class and character had been sold for just before and since the location of the pesthouse, it being thus attempted to prove that the market value of this property had not been impaired to the extent indicated by the opinion of appellees' witnesses. Of course market value is the price at which an article sells in the market. This price is fixed by sales actually consummated. Such sales, when made under normal and fair conditions, are necessarily a better test of the market value than speculative opinions of witnesses, for truly here is where money talks. * * *

are of opinion that it was error in the trial court to reject the testimony so mentioned."

Railway v. Clark, 121 Mo., 169, the same character of evidence was held by the Supreme Court of Missouri to be competent. We are of opinion, therefore, that the evidence complained of by appellant was properly admitted by the trial court. We are further of opinion that the only reversible error appearing in the record is that committed by the lower court in the instruction as to the measure of damages. And to the extent that they concur with the views herein expressed, the cases of L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Nease, 93 Ky., 53, and L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Taylor, 96 Ky., 211, are hereby overruled.

For the error indicated the judgment of the lower court is reversed and the case remanded, with directions to that court to grant appellant a new trial, and for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

LOUISVILLE & NASHVILLE R. R. CO. v. LOWE.

(Filed May 18, 1904.)

Master and servant—Engine signals—The servants in charge of an engine in a railroad yard owed to a car inspector the duty of giving signals of the approach of the engine and of keeping a lookout for persons on the track.

2. Contributory negligence—Question for jury—Whether the car inspector is guilty of contributory negligence was a question for the jury; and the question was also properly submitted to the jury whether, notwithstanding a negligence, those in charge of the engine after they perceived his danger should have perceived it by the exercise of ordinary care, might have avoided the injury to him.

3. Fellow servants—The car inspector and the men in charge of the engine were not fellow servants, and being in different departments of work, the master is liable for an injury to the car inspector resulting from the ordinary negligence of the men in charge of the engine.

4. Excessive verdict—A verdict of $13,000 for the loss of an arm by plaintiff, who was thirty-four years of age and earning $1 a day, is excessive.

W. C. McChord, H. W. Bruce, W. D. Hines, Benjamin D. Warfield and E. J. Hines for appellant.

J. W. S. Clements and J. H. Thurman for appellee.

Appeal from Washington Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

Appellee, William S. Lowe, was in the service of appellant, the Louisville & Nashville R. R. Co., as assistant inspector of trains at Lebanon Junction, which is a town of about twelve hundred inhabitants at the junction of the Knoxville branch with the main line of appellant's road. There is maintained at this place a railroad yard, containing an extensive system of sidetracks, used in making up freight trains, going out of the yards. The regular trains too pass over the main tracks and are sometimes switched on the sidetrack, so that cars are moving about the yard pretty much all the time. A switch engine is kept in the yard for the purpose of switching cars and making up trains. Large coal bins are maintained there by the appellant at which all engines are supplied with coal. Perhaps as many as one hundred and fifty engines, including the different passages of the switch engine, pass across the yard every day. The coal bins are north of the station and in a curve of the track, so that an engine beyond a certain point can not be seen south of the bins. Appellee had been the watchman in the shops for about six weeks before he was made assistant car inspector. On the 12th of September, 1899, which was the first day that he served as car inspector, he went on duty at 6 p. m. and inspected a freight train then ready to go out southward on the Knoxville branch. The train was standing on a sidetrack east of the main track, fronting south. He began at the engine on the west side of the train and inspected the cars going back from one to another until the inspection was finished, when the train pulled out. The tool house to which he was then to go, was on the east side of the tracks and south of the point where he then was. So he walked southward along by the side of the departing train, and when the sidetrack merged in the track next west of it, he got over on that track and then on the main track. While he was walking southward on the main track, an engine and tender backing down on that track ran upon him in the rear, knocking him down, cutting off his right arm, and inflicting severe bruises, for which injuries he recovered damages in the sum of $18,000.

The evidence introduced by him on the trial tended to show these facts: The track was straight for some distance and appellee walking along with his back to the engine could have been seen by the persons on it for some distance if a proper lookout had been kept. The tender had been loaded with coal at the coal bin; the coal was piled up higher than the engineer's head, so that his line of vision did not reach the track, but rose above the track the further it was prolonged, and he was, therefore, unable to see anything on the track in front of him. A passenger train from the south was just about due on the main track, and appellee supposed that no other train would be on that track, so he kept a lookout in front of him for it, but did not look behind him after he started south. When he turned and started south he looked back and seeing nothing, supposed the way was clear. The engine by which he was hurt was then standing at the coal bin around the curve. After taking coal it came rather rapidly southward in order to get off the main track before the arrival of the passenger train from the south. Appellee's proof tended to show that no signal was given of the movements of this engine and that it was run substantially without any lookout in front of it. The proof is conflicting as to whether signals were given by the ringing of the bell, and as to the speed of the train; but the evidence for appellee shows that the engine was running at something like twelve or fifteen miles an hour. When it stopped, after running over appellee, it was just even with the engine of the outgoing freight train by the side of which he had been walking and had, therefore, run something like a quarter of a mile more than that engine after it started and appellee turned and began to walk south. When it stopped it had only one minute to get in on the sidetrack in time, according to appellant's proof. Appellee could not go directly to the toolhouse because the outgoing freight train was between him and it. He perhaps got on the main track, thinking no other train, except the passenger train from the south could properly be on that track at that time and this would be in front of him. There is some evidence from which it is argued that the time had already expired when any other train under the rules might properly use the main track. The men in charge of the engine did not see appellee at all, and did not know he was hurt until informed by others.

Appellant complains that the court refused to instruct the jury peremptorily to find for it. It also complains of the instructions given by the court. The court in substance instructed the jury that if they believed from the evidence that appellee, at the time he received the injuries, was upon appellants' track in the usual course of his employment, and that its agents in charge of the engine and tender that injured him negligently failed to ring the bell or give other signal of its approach, or negligently failed to stop it after they saw his peril or after they might have seen it by the use of reasonable care, then they should find for the plaintiff, unless they believed from the evidence that he, by his own negligence, contributed to such an extent to the injury that, but for his negligence, it would not have happened; and that in this event he could not recover, unless appellant's agents in charge of the engine and tender knew or could have known by ordinary attention of the peril in which his negligence had placed him and thereafter failed to observe reasonable care to avoid the injury which followed.

It is earnestly maintained for appellant that the evidence shows no negligence on its part; that as to appellee it was not required to give notice of the movement of its trains or keep a lookout for him in moving them. In support of this view we are referred to a number of decisions in other jurisdictions; but without discussing them we conclude that the rule has been so often held otherwise in this State, it is no longer an open question. Appellant has, at Lebanon Junction, something like two hundred employees. The place at which appellee was injured is used by them and by other persons to a great extent in coming and going. The proof presents a case where the presence of persons on the track should reasonably be anticipated by those in charge of the train. The point was not far from the station, between it and the coal bins and where a great many people passed back and forth, especially during the day. In Shelby's Adm'r v. Cincinnati & C., R. R., 85 Ky., 324, the intestate was in the yard of the railroad at Junction City for the purpose of soliciting employment in watering stock and was run over by a train backed without signal or outlook. The place was not so much traveled as in the case before us, and the intestate was barely a licensee, and yet the court held the company liable. After showing that increased vigilance and precaution are required, the court said: "But it is obvious that neither the duty of giving the warning of the approach of trains, nor of resorting to the proper and necessary means to prevent collision with persons, can be performed unless there be some one in a position to see ahead of the train and to control it."

In Conley's Adm'r v. Cincinnati, & C., R. R., 89 Ky., 402, the intestate was killed in like manner by a backing train as he was crossing the track, and the case is discussed on the idea that he was technically a trespasser. The court held the company liable, and said: "A train of running cars—these were running according to the appellant's proof, at the rate of about fifteen miles per hour—is more dangerous to the life of persons with whom it comes in contact than that of the most ferocious and powerful wild animal. And certainly it can not be lawfully turned loose to run by itself and expose persons that may be on the track either by accident, mistake or design to its destructiveness. Humanity positively forbids the owner of property that is dangerous to human life and safety, to knowingly turn such property loose even upon his own ground where it will do mischief even to a technical trespasser."

In L. & N. R. R. v. Potts, 99 Ky., 80, the deceased was in the employ of the railroad company at Junction City, a town of about four hundred people. It was his duty to enter in a book the numbers of the cars standing on the side tracks and point out to the engineer those he was to take up. While standing on one of the tracks he was run over and killed by some cars detached from the engine moving up behind him without any lookout or signal of their approach. The court said: "The Shelby case, 85 Ky., 224, which occurred in the same town and the Conley case, 89 Ky., 402, seem conclusive of the question. It was held in those cases that neither a train nor a single car should be permitted to move on a sidetrack in a city or town without some servant in position to give warning of its approach, and to control its movements. * * * It was as essential that the servant should be in a position thus to see and give warning as it was to be in a position to control the cars."

In Barber v. Cincinnati, &c., R. R., 14 Ky. Law Rep., 869, the intestate was in the service of the railroad company getting out ballast near High Bridge, Ky. The quarry was on the west side of the track, and to obtain a suitable place for piling the rock he had to wheel it across the track and along by the side of it a short distance to a point on the east side, and for that purpose was required to place plank across the track on which to run his wheelbarrow. Warning signals by the train to laborers working on the road were required by the rules of the company. But no signal was given of the approach of the train, and when it was very close to the intestate, he ran to the track and tried to move the plank to avoid danger of the train's being derailed. In doing this, he was killed. The men in charge of the train knew of the labor done at this point and the mode of doing it. The trial court gave a peremptory instruction to the jury to find for the defendant, but on appeal this was reversed. In the subsequent case of Illinois Central R. R. Co. v. Mahan, 17 Ky. Law Rep., 1200, Mahan was the telegraph operator at Arlington and received orders to stop an extra train. It disregarded his signal to stop, and he, seeing that a collision was inevitable with a passenger train coming in the opposite direction, unless the order to stop was obeyed, seized a lantern and followed the train some thirty yards, waving his light. It stopped, and the conductor came back to him. The extra then backed in off the main track to get out of the way of the approaching passenger train and they also got off the main track to let that train pass. In doing this they got on the sidetrack and while standing there the train, which he had stopped, continued backing down on the sidetrack without any lookout or signal of its approach, and ran over him. Judgment in his favor was affirmed. The court said: "If in the emergency which seemed to confront him, the appellee got on the sidetrack or too close to it when there was space elsewhere within which to stand or walk and give his signals to the approaching passenger train, he was perhaps guilty of negligence, but for which the injury would not have occurred; yet it is manifest that by the exercise of ordinary care on the part of those controlling the backing train, the danger could have been discovered and the injury averted. By witnesses in the service of the appellant it is shown to have been the duty of those operating the extra, to have had a brakeman on the rear of the backing train, who might give warning of its comparatively noiseless approach; and it is no excuse for the failure to make such provision in this instance to say that the company was using instead of the usual caboose, a box car which did not conveniently admit of this customary precaution. The necessary care was not exercised on this occasion, and the failure to exercise it was gross negligence."

These cases control the one before us, for the danger from the want of signals of the approach of the train or outlook in front of it was greater in this case than in any of them under the evidence. The same rule has been announced elsewhere. Thus in 2 Thompson on Negligence, section 1839, it is said: "Persons lawfully at work in repairing a railway track or in repairing a highway where it crosses a railway track can not be expected to pursue their labors and at the same time maintain a constant lookout for an approaching train. They are passive and are not a source of danger to the train; those who are driving the train are active, and are handling and are in control of the instrument of danger and mischief. The obligation of reasonable care which the law puts upon the railway company under these circumstances, therefore, demands nothing less than an active vigilance in favor of persons thus lawfully at work upon the track, and the giving of seasonable danger signals to arouse their attention and enable them to get out of the way before it is too late."

In sections 1840-41-43 it is shown that the same rule applies in favor of the servants of a contractor, or persons engaged in loading or unloading cars or receiving mail or express matter. In section 1846 the care required in moving trains through cities and towns is pointed out, and it is laid down to be negligence when a train is moved backwards not to have a person keeping a lookout. (2 Shearman and Redfield on Negligence, section 457-458.) The case of Illinois Central R. R. v. Dick, 91 Ky., 434, is not inconsistent with the above. In that case Dick was only a licensee to cross the track. For his own convenience he left the usual way of crossing and was walking along the track. He had no right to be where he was, at least, there is nothing in the case to show that his presence there should have been anticipated, or that it was a placet which the servants of the company should have been on the outlook for persons. The appellee was in the discharge of his duties in going from the inspection of the train to the toolhouse, and was at a place at which the presence of persons on the track might be anticipated. While he was not at work on the track he was at work for the defendant and was lawfully on the track in the course of his employment and is as much within the principle of the rule as if laboring on the track. Whether he was guilty of contributory negligence was a question for the jury.

It is earnestly insisted also that the court erred in instructing the jury that appellee could not recover if but for his negligence the injury would not have happened, unless appellant's agents in charge of the engine and tender knew, or could by ordinary care have known, of the peril in which his negligence had placed him and thereafter failed to observe reasonable care to avoid the injury which ensued. The instruction of the court followed the rule announced in an opinion by Judge Crenshaw in the year 1856 in L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Yandell, 17 B. Monroe, 598. It was re affirmed in an opinion by Judge Robertson in L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Collins, 2 Duvall, 114, and L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Robinson, 4 Bush, 507. These cases have since been followed by the court so often that the question is no longer open. (L. & N. R. R. Co. v. McCoy, 81 Ky., 411; L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Earl, 94 Ky., 874; Cahill v. R. R. Co., 94 Ky., 845; L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Schuster, 10 Ky. Law Rep., 65; L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Grey, 16 Ky. Law Rep., 797; L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Hackman, 17 Ky. Law Rep., 81; R. R. Co. v. Lewis, 18 Ky. Law Rep., 967; Crawley v. R. R. Co., 21 Ky. Law Rep., 1435; Flynn v. Ry. Co., 110 Ky., 662; Gunn v. Felton, Recelver, 108 Ky., 665; 1 Thompson on Negligence, sections 230-232; Inland, &c., Co. v. Tolson, 139 U. S., 551; Grand Trunk Railway v. Ives, 144 U. S., 485.)

In towns and cities where the presence of persons on the track of the rail road may be rightfully anticipated, a due regard for human life requires that a lookout should be maintained in the operation of engines and trains. This has been often declared. The place where the injury sued for occurred was in a town and at a place which was used, not only by the numerous employes of appellant, but by other persons in passing from the station to the coal yards and from one portion of the town to another. The presence of persons on or about the track at the point where the injury occurred, should reasonably have been anticipated, and it was incumbent on those operating the engine in question to keep a lookout. Otherwise all the care would be required of those on the track and none would be required of those operating the train. Instructions embodying the view of the law insisted on for appellant, have been held erroneous by this court as to persons rightfully on the track at such places, on the ground that they placed all the care on the person injured. (L. C. & L. R. R. v. Goetz's Adm'r, 79 Ky., 442; L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Clark's Adm'r, 105 Ky., 571.) In view of the character of the place where the accident occurred and the fact that the deceased was not a trespasser, the court properly qualified the instruction on contributory negligence as indicated.

It is further urged that appellee and the men in charge of the engine were fellow servants, being all engaged in the operations of the yard; and that at any rate appellant is not liable, except for the gross negligence of its man in charge of the engine. The engine was run from the coal bin to the sidetrack by a man employed for that purpose to take charge of the engines in the yard and known as the hostler. There is much conflict in the authorities as to who are fellow servants, but the rule in this State has been steadily maintained from the beginning. In L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Collins, 63 Ky., 114, the first case on the subject, where a laborer on an engine in the yard was injured by the negligence of the man in charge of the engine, this court said: "The only consistent or maintainable principle of the corporation's responsibility is that of agency. 'Qui facit per alium facit per se.' It is, therefore, responsible for the negligence or unskillfulness of its engineer, as its controlling agent in the management of its locomotives and running cars, and that responsibility is graduated by the classes of persons injured by the engineer's neglect or want of skill. As to strangers, ordinary negligence is sufficient; as to subordinate employes associated with the engineer in conducting the cars, the negligence must be gross, but as to employes in a different department of service, unconnected with the running operations, ordinary negligence may be sufficient. Among common laborers, constituting a distinct class, all standing on the same platform or equality and power, and engaged in a merely incidental, but independent service, no one of them, as between himself and his co-equals, is the corporation's agent; and, therefore, it is not on the principle of agency or otherwise, responsible for damage to one of them resulting from the act or omission of another of them, although each of the company's employes would be its agent as to entire strangers to it."

This case and a number of others following it were reviewed and approved in L. C. & R. R. Co. v. Cavens, 72 Ky., 559, and still later in Greer v. L & N. R. R. Co., 94 Ky., 169, and Illinois Central R. R. Co. v. Hilliard, 99 Ky., 684. In the last case the conductor of a train was injured by the negligence of a car inspector and it was insisted that the jury should have been instructed that they were fellow servants, or that the company was at least liable only for the gross negligence of the car inspector. The court held otherwise, and said: "In the first place the person employed at Mound Station to inspect each car of a train and ascertain if it is in a safe condition was not a fellow servant of plaintiff in the sense of being upon a common footing and agents of each other. They acted in different spheres, and neither could or was required to know whether the other was properly doing his duty. In the second place it would have been improper to require the jury to believe the inspector was guilty of gross negligence. The simple inquiry was, as they had been instructed, whether the company, through its inspector, used ordinary care in examining the cars so as to ascertain whether the ladders attached to each were in a safe condition; for it was the legal duty of the company to guard against every source of danger they could, by the exercise of that kind and degree of care, foresee and prevent; and while a railroad company can not be required to insure the safety of a train, it is bound to make a reasonable, proper and careful examination of each car."

In L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Davis, 14 Ky. Law Rep., 716, a switch engine in a railroad yard was held not to be a fellow servant of a switchman and coupler in the yard. In L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Moore, 83 Ky., 675, a fireman while acting as engineer, was held to be engineer for the time, and not to be a fellow servant of the brakeman. The same rule has been applied as between the crews of different trains, and it seems to us to be a very unsubstantial distinction between the engineer who runs an engine in the yard and one who runs it at other stations along the road, as the fireman usually does in switching. Appellee had no control of the engineer in charge of this engine. He had nothing to do with the running of the trains or the running operations of the road. He was engaged in a distinct department, his only duty being to inspect cars.

Lastly, it is insisted that the verdict is excessive. Appellee is thirty-four years of age, was earning a dollar a day. He has lost one arm and does not appear to have received other permanent injury. In no case before this court has it ever sustained so large a verdict for such an injury, and we are all of opinion that the verdict is excessive and that for this reason a new trial should be granted. We see no other error in the record.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

REED, &c. v. REED, &c.

(Filed April 28, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Coparceners—Partition—Final order—Wife's inchoate right of dower—Sale and distribution of proceeds—In an action by appellees, W. D., S. S. and J. D. Reed against appellant, P. B. Reed, owners in coparcenary of certain lots, for a sale thereof and distribution of proceeds in which the wife of defendant was not a party, a sale was ordered and made and the lots bought by plaintiffs, the sale confirmed, the money paid into court and a deed ordered to be made to the plaintiffs. Before all of the money was distributed, plaintiffs filed a supplemental petition, making defendant's wife a party to the suit, asking that she be compelled to relinquish her inchoate right of dower in the lots, and take the value thereof out of her husband's fourth interest in the price they sold for. P. B. Reed objected and asked to withdraw his fourth interest from the hands of the receiver, which was overruled, and he appealed, but his appeal was dismissed because the order made was not a final judgment. Pending this appeal one of the original plaintiffs, S. S. Reed, a bachelor, filed a petition against all the then married brothers and their wives, under the act of the legislature of March 17, 1902, for a sale of the same land, the real purpose being to divest the married women of their inchoate dower right in the lots. This petition was consolidated with the original action. Ida C., wife of P. B. Reed, filed answer, claiming dower, which was conceded, and a resale ordered, in which order it was recited that "Ida C. has an inchoate right of dower in an undivided one-fourth interest in said lots formerly owned by her husband, P. B. Reed, and that he, P. B. Reed, has no pecuniary interest whatever in said lots." The land was again sold and bought by appellees and judgment rendered distributing the proceeds, adjudging to Ida C. her interest at $967.52 "as compensation for her contingent right of dower in said lots," and a deed was made to appellees for said lots; the wives of the other brothers having relinquished their inchoate right of dower, and assenting to the proceedings. P. B. Reed was then permitted to withdraw the proceeds of the sale of his one-fourth interest, less the value of his wife's inchoate right of dower above fixed, and she was allowed to withdraw that. On appeal by P. B. Reed and his wife, Ida C., from this judgment, Held—That the proceedings and judgment of the lower court are without error and are affirmed.

Bodley, Baskin & Flexner for appellants.

W. W. Thum for appellees.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery Branch, First Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

Appellant P. B. Reed and his brothers, appellees Wm. D. Reed, S. S. Reed and J. B. Reed, were owners in coparcenary of two certain indivisible lots in Louisville. On December 9, 1899, appellees brought a suit under section 490, Civil Code, against appellant P. B. Reed, for a sale of the lots because they could not be divided without materially impairing their value. The only parties to the suit were the appellees and appellant just named. A decree of sale was entered March 6, 1900, and enforced by a sale of the lots April 9, 1900. One of the lots was sold to appellee S. S. Reed, and the other to appellee Wm. D. Reed. On April 21, 1900, the report of sale was confirmed on motion of the purchasers. By a subsequent order, it was recited that the purchase had been made for the benefit of and it was assigned to the three plaintiffs, appellees, and a deed was ordered to be made to them. The part of the purchase money representing P. B. Reed's one-fourth interest in the lots was not disposed of by the order, but it was recited therein: "The amount left due is for the benefit of P. B. Reed, subject to the question of 1900 State taxes and his proper share of any further cost herein now incurred."

Later, the balance of the purchase money was paid into court. Before all of it had been distributed under order of the court, and on August 7, 1901, appellees filed a supplemental petition in the case. By it for the first time, appellant, Ida C. Reed, wife of P. B. Reed, was made a party to the suit. It was alleged therein that she had an inchoate right of dower in the share of her husband in the lots, and it was asked that she be compelled to relinquish her inchoate dower and take its value in the remainder of that part of the purchase money in court which represented her husband's one-fourth share in the lots. P. B. Reed moved the court to allow him to withdraw the whole of the balance of the purchase money, his one-fourth, from the court's receiver, which was overruled. From that order P. B. Reed appealed to this court, but his appeal was dismissed May 18, 1903, on the ground that the order was not such a final order or judgment as that an appeal would lie from it.

Pending that appeal, and on June 21, 1902, S. S. Reed, one of the plaintiffs in the former suit, filed in the Jefferson Circuit Court, a petition against J. D. Reed and Wm. D. Reed (appellees here), and P. B. Reed (appellant) and their wives, under the act of assembly, approved March 17, 1902 (Acts 1902, chapter 18, page 48), for a sale of the same land which had theretofore been sold under the previous judgment, because of its indivisibility. The real purpose was doubtless to divest the married women of their inchoate rights of dower. Appellant Ida C. Reed filed her answer, setting out the foregoing proceedings, and claiming that as she had not been made a party to the former suit, the sale of her husband's interest in the lots did not affect her inchoate right of dower therein, which indeed was necessarily admitted. Judgment was entered selling the land, in which it was recited: "It is further adjudged that the defendant, Ida C. Reed, wife of the defendant, P. B. Reed, has an inchoate right of dower in an undivided one-fourth interest formerly owned by her husband, the defendant, P. B. Reed and that the defendant, P. B. Reed, has no pecuniary interest whatsoever in either of said two pieces of real estate."

The judgment further proceeded to fix the value of appellant, Ida C.

Reed's inchoate dower interest. The land was again sold, but free from the claims of the wives of the parties, when the same persons (appellees) bought it. On January 8, 1908, judgment was rendered distributing the proceeds of this sale, adjudging to appellant, Mrs. Ida C. Reed, $967.52, being, "the amount ascertained under the judgment to be the interest, as compensation for her right, of the defendant, Ida C. Reed, in the proceeds of sale of each and both of said tracts of land fully described in, and sold under the judgment herein, and being the amount allowed the said defendant, Ida C. Reed, as compensation for her contingent right of dower in said tracts of land as the wife of said defendant, P. B. Reed."

The commissioner was then directed to make, and made, a deed conveying the whole of the lots to the purchasers, free from the claims of the married women for dower. The wives of J. D. Reed and Wm. D. Reed assented to the proceedings. S. S. Reed was a bachelor.

The two actions, the first to sell the lots for division of the proceeds among the four coparceners, and the second to sell the same lots bought by three of them for partition of its proceeds among the three, and the wife of P. B. Reed, were then consolidated.

P. B. Reed was permitted to then withdraw the proceeds of the sale of his one-fourth interest, less the value of his wife's inchoate right to dower as above fixed, and she was permitted to withdraw that. P. B. Reed appeals because he was not adjudged the whole of one-fourth of the proceeds of the sale; and Mistress Ida C. Reed appeals because she was divested of her inchoate right to dower in the manner stated. We will first dispose of the questions arising on the appeal of P. B. Reed. His first proposition is, that his rights were fixed and finally determined in the first judgment of sale, entered March 8, 1900. Or, if not then, that by the recital in the order of April 24, 1900, directing the deed, it was determined, by the following language: "That plaintiffs W. D. Reed, J. D. Reed and S. S. Reed, purchasers of the property sold herein, be allowed credit on the bonds heretofore executed, to the extent of three-fourths of the principal of each of said bonds, the said W. D., J. D. and S. S. Reed being, with the defendant, P. B. Reed, jointly and equally entitled to one-fourth of the proceeds of the sale had herein."

Courts may, and not infrequently do, indicate their views as to the ultimate rights of a litigant in interlocutory decrees or orders passing upon motions, and taking steps toward the final decree. However manifest the court's opinion may be in such orders, and, however erroneous or correct for that matter, it really decides nothing irrevocably. (Bondurant v. Apperson, 4 Met., 80; Worthington v. Brooks-Waterfield & Co., 20 Ky. Law Rep., 1483; Harris v. Tuttle, 28 Ky. Law Rep., 220.) The test whether a decree is final is to be found by applying this rule, laid down with care in Bondurant v. Apperson, supra: "A judgment, to be final, must not only decide that one of the parties is entitled to relief of a final character, but must give that relief by its own force, or be enforceable for that purpose without further action by the court or by process for contempt."

Applying that test to this case, the court had not entered a decree disposing of the fund in court, which, by its own operation and without further order of the court, save process of contempt, could be executed. So far as the judgment decreed a sale of the land, that was final, because its effect was, when executed by the court's commissioner, as if by sale under an execution on final judgment, to divest the parties of the title, and to admit, possibly, irrevocable rights of others thereto; that the orders regarding the fund in court were not final, was necessarily held by this court when it dismissed the appeal in May, 1903.

His next proposition is, that the suit contemplated selling only the undivided interest of the coparceners, that their wives' interests were not mentioned, and, therefore, could not have been involved in the suit; that the judgment of sale dealt alone with the interest of the four brothers, and their interests only were sold; that the doctrine of caveat emptor applies, and as the purchasers, appellees, got all that was proposed to be sold, and all that was sold, and as that sale was confirmed upon their own motion, they should be compelled to pay for that which they bought. The position is more specious than sound. The proceeding was in the nature of partition of land among coparceners. Owing to the indivisibility of the land without material impairment of its value, and, therefore, to save to all the owners such loss while giving to each of them his full right to have his share segregated from that of the others, the statute allows a sale of the land, and a partition of the money as if it were the land. The partition of the money is to be made under the same principles, and governed by the same rights, as if it were the land it represents. This is made clear enough by reference to the provision of section 494, Civil Code. Besides, it ought to be so. Under our statutes, the wives had inchoate right of dower in the shares of their husbands in these lots. These dower rights could not, in any contingency, enhance the husband's shares, though. They were rather an incumbrance against them. For example, S. S. Reed was the only one of the four brothers not married. Upon a sale of the lots subject to the potential dower rights of the wives of the three others, purchasers advised of the situation would make a deduction in their bids from the real value of the lots proportioned to the value of the wives' unrelinquished contingent interest. Then if the proceeds of such sale be divided equally among the four joint owners, S. S. Reed would be made to contribute to the other three co-owners one-fourth the value of their wives' potential interests, while the wives would continue to hold them. This is so manifestly unjust as to condemn it. If the wife of a joint tenant of an estate in possession (before the amendment of 1902) refused to join in the proceedings under section 490 of the Civil Code, or to join in the conveyance of her husband in such property, her inchoate right to dower therein was a charge against his interest alone. To the extent of the value of her interest, his title conveyed without her consent in one of the manners pointed out by the statute, failed. When P. B. Reed's wife was, by supplemental petition, made a defendant and called upon to assert her claim as contingent doweress against the purchase money representing the lots, the just effect is the same as if she had been made a party originally; and although she could not have been compelled to relinquish her contingent right to dower in the land, nor at that time as the law then was to take her dower in the money or the property in which it might be invested, yet it brought into the case the question of the value of her right, and asserted it as an equity in behalf of appellees against P. B. Reed's share of the proceeds of the sale, in the first partition proceedings. Pending the adjudication of that question the statute was amended as hereinafter particularly noticed. By that amendment it was permitted to the holders of the vested estate in possession, to bring into an action brought pursuant to section 490, any woman having a claim to dower in the land, whether her interest was vested or contingent, and to have the land sold free of her interest, it being transferred to the proceeds. Thus by the second suit appellant Ida C. Reed's interest was ascertained and divested while the pending equity and partition of the proceeds of the first sale was yet under the control of the court. By the judgment of the second suit her contingent dower in the land was converted into money, and that money paid into court, and became a part of the fund for partition among all the parties according to their interests. As among coparceners, joint tenants, and tenants in common, when they voluntarily partition their joint possession, the law implies a warranty by each of the title to the parts in severalty taken by the others. This is equally so, where the partition is involuntary, as by proceedings in court. (Freeman Cotenancy and Partition, section 533.) This implied warranty will cover the joint tenant's share of outstanding taxes, his own encumbrances, and, we hold, his wife's inchoate right to dower where she fails to join or be joined in a sufficient manner to convey same. So, that when the parties come in the first action to divide or partition among themselves, the money arising from a sale of the land, in lieu of partitioning the land, equity will attach to these proceeds the same liabilities and rights as the parties had in the real property. Therefore, as P. B. Reed's wife had an un conveyed contingent interest in his part of the land by reason of her inchoate right of dower therein, his part of the purchase money should be abated correspondingly to the other coparceners who had bought the land at the sale. While ordinarily that might not be true, yet in this case the parties thought they were selling, and when appellees bought they believed they were buying, the complete title. They were all laboring under a mutual mistake which ought to be corrected by the chancellor having the parties and the substituted subject matter of the original suit before him. It was not deemed at that time that the wives of such joint tenants had an interest in the land so sold. Such is not generally the case, and until the decision by this court in Woman's Club v. Reed, 28 Ky. Law Rep., 1846, based upon the peculiar phraseology of our statute, it was not thought they had in this State. With the same parties before the court, the original coparceners, with no intervening equities of others, and with the fund arising from the sale, undistributed, and not adjudged, it was not improper to have allowed the supplemental petition alleging this new matter, as a reason for a different distribution of the proceeds from that originally contemplated, an equal one.

Appellant Ida C. Reed contends that under the construction placed on section 495, Civil Code, by this court in Womans' Club v. Reed, supra, as she was not originally a party to the record, when the sale was adjudged, made and confirmed, and of course did not consent to be divested of her dower in the manner pointed out in section 495, that her contingent right to dower remained unaffected by the proceedings in that case. In this, in view of the decision in the Woman's Club case, we must concur. The amendment to section 495, approved March 17, 1902, provides:

"1st. If a woman have a vested or contingent right to dower in land ordered to be sold pursuant to the provisions of this chapter, the court with her consent, to be taken upon privy examination if she be married, and of sound mind, or without her consent, if she be of unsound mind, may order a sale of the land free from her right; and shall provide for reasonable compensation to her out of the proceeds of sale, or that she shall have the same right in the property purchased with the proceeds as she had in the property sold.

"2d. If a woman have a vested or contingent right to dower in land sought to be sold, under section 490, she shall be made a party to the action brought to sell such land, and the court may, with or without her consent, order a sale of the land free from her right; and shall provide for a reasonable compensation to her out of the proceeds of sale, or that she shall have the same right in property purchased with the proceeds, as she had in the property sold."

When the second suit to sell these lots was instituted, P. B. Reed had no interest whatever in the lots. He was not then a necessary party to the last suit. Treating his presence in the latter suit as unnecessary, this proceeding amounted to an action by S. S. Reed against W. D. Reed and J. D. Reed, the three having bought the land at the sale in April, 1900, and against their wives for a sale of the indivisible lots. Appellant Ida C. Reed was made a party defendant, too, because she answered the description "a woman with a * * * contingent right to dower in the land sought to be sold under section 490." This language includes all women who have a dower right, vested or contingent, in such land, and without regard to the presence of their husbands in the suit. The purpose of the statute was to enable lands so held to be conveyed free from the claims of all the owners of the class described in the act. Any other construction would leave it in the power of a woman who owned only a dower interest, vested or contingent, to defeat a sale for purposes deemed by the legislature to be, and that are, necessary for the just protection of joint owners. In this manner was appellant Ida C. Reed's contingent dower interest in the lots both ascertained actually, and transferred from the lots and converted into money. Then in the first named action, with which the last had been consolidated, the value of Mrs. Reed's contingent dower was deducted from P. B. Reed's undivided one-fourth interest in the proceeds of the lots under the original sale, and his proportion of that sale was disposed of between him and his wife according to their interest thus found.

The proceedings and judgment of the circuit court are without error, and the judgment is affirmed.

CINCINNATI, NEW ORLEANS & TEXAS PACIFIC R. R. CO. v.
GREGG.

Carriers—Interstate commerce—Connecting lines—Liability for damage to live stock—Failing to rest, feed and water—In an action for damages against the appellant, Cincinnati, New Orleans & Texas Pacific R. R. Co, in failing to properly care for rest, feed and water a car load of mules shipped from Imperial, Pa., to Danville, Ky., by which seven of them died of neglect and starvation by being confined in cars for sixty-eight consecutive hours, without rest, food, or water, the defendant can not be excused as a connecting carrier on the ground that it did not have the stock in its possession for twenty-eight hours, nor can it say it did not know that the preceding and connecting carriers had failed to perform their statutory duty, as, under the provisions of United States Revised Statutes, section 4886, no railroad company within the United States whose road forms any part of a line of road over which live stock is conveyed from one State to another, shall confine the same in cars for a longer period than twenty-eight consecutive hours without unloading them for rest, water and feeding; and the statute further provides that in estimating such confinement, the time during which the animals have been confined without rest on connecting roads from which they are recovered, must be included.

Chas. H. Rodas and John Galvin for appellants.

Chas. C. Fox and Robt. Harding for appellee.

Appeal from Boyle Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

On the 14th of May, 1908, the appellee delivered to the Pittsburg & Lake Erie R. R. Co., at Imperial, Pa., one car load of mules to be transported over that road and connecting carriers to Danville, Ky. The mules did not arrive in Danville until about 9 o'clock, a. m., May 18, and were not unloaded until about 11 o'clock, a. m., being in the possession of the various railroad companies ninety-six hours. The mules were loaded at Imperial, Pa., about 11 o'clock, a. m., May 14, arriving in Cincinnati May 17th, and at Danville about the hour above stated. On their arrival, one of the mules was found to be dead on the car, and six others died within less than twenty-four hours; some of them died within a few hours after their arrival. This suit was brought by the appellee against the appellant company for the value of the mules alleged to be worth $800. A trial was had and the jury found for the plaintiff and fixed the value of the mules at $580. This appeal is taken from that judgment by the railroad company.

The mules when received by the consignees, Bright & Fox, about 11 o'clock, a. m., May 18, were in an exceedingly weak and bad condition. Dr. T. M. Doran, a veterinary surgeon, was called to examine them, and found their stomachs and intestines entirely empty, no evidence of food of any kind, and gave it as his opinion that they were starved to death. He was corroborated in this by Bright & Cox, and others. In fact, it is conceded by appellant's counsel in his brief that they were starved to death.

Appellee contends that appellant is responsible to him for the value of the mules because it failed to exercise proper care of them in their transportation and in suffering them to starve to death, and that it violated section 4886 of the U. S. Statutes, which provides: "No railroad company within the United States whose road forms any part of a line of road over which cattle, sheep, swine or other animals are conveyed from one State to another, or the owners or masters of steam, sailing, or other vessels carrying or transporting cattle, sheep, swine or other animals from one State to another, shall confine the same in cars, boats or vessels of any description, for a longer period than twenty-eight consecutive hours, without unloading the same for rest, water and feeding for a period of at least five consecutive hours, unless prevented from so unloading by storm or other accidental causes. In estimating such confinement the time during which the animals have been confined without such rest on connecting roads from which they are received, shall be included, it being the intent of this section to prohibit their continuous confinement beyond the period of twenty-eight hours, except upon the contingencies hereinbefore stated."

Appellant says that it only had the mules in its possession for about eighteen hours; that there was no delay in their transportation when in its possession, and they were properly handled and cared for by its employees; that the section of the U. S. Statutes referred to has no application to it, as the violation of that section, if violated, was committed by some preceding carrier, and it had no knowledge that the mules had not been watered, rested and fed as required by this statute.

The "bill of lading" shows that the Pittsburg & Lake Erie Railroad Co. received from appellee, May 14, 1902, twenty-four head of mules consigned to Bright & Fox, of Danville, Ky., via. Baltimore & Ohio S. W. R. R. on one of appellant's cars, No. 9060, with this statement in the face of the bill: "To be unloaded, watered and fed at Cincinnati." Endorsed on the bill is the following: "No carrier shall be liable for loss or damage not occurring on its own road or its portion of the through route."

It appears that from some cause, not explained, that this car of mules was delayed in the transportation for more than twenty-four hours between Imperial and Cincinnati, and the mules were without food, water and rest for the space of sixty-eight hours, and that when they arrived at Cincinnati it is only claimed they were fed 200 pounds of hay. A ticket for the price of the hay was attached to the way bill or bill of lading. Appellant's proof shows that this car load of mules was transferred from the stock yards to appellant's road on McLane avenue about 4 o'clock, p. m., on the 17th, and at 12 o'clock at night it was attached to one of appellant's freight trains and reached Danville at 8:30, a. m., on the 18th. The consignees were notified by telephone, and they arrived from the country and unloaded them at the hour of 11 o'clock, a. m.; that in the transportation of these mules after they reached them, due care was exercised for their safety and protection, and they were not injured or damaged by it.

The conductor stated that the mules appeared to be in good condition when he received them in Cincinnati, and again when he passed by this car at Erlanger, nine miles out from Cincinnati, he found them all on their feet. At Lexington, on the next morning, about 5 o'clock, he discovered that one of them was dead.

Appellee claims that appellant's servants did not exercise due or any care for the safety and protection of these mules; that it left them standing on its road in Cincinnati for eight hours before starting, and found one dead early in the morning at Lexington, and did not feed or give them any attention there or elsewhere on its line, and left them in the car at Danville for three or four hours after their arrival there.

It appears that the lower court was of the opinion that the U. S. Statutes above copied did not apply to appellant in the shipment of these mules, because it did not have them in its possession for the full twenty-eight hours, and that it was in no sense responsible for the dereliction of the preceding carriers for their failure to feed, water and rest the stock. The court gave only one instruction, as follows: "If you believe from the evidence that the mules, alleged to be dead, were in reasonably good condition as to health and strength at the time the defendant received them at Cincinnati, and that when they arrived at Danville, one of them was dead, and six of them in such bad condition that they died, then you will find for the plaintiff the reasonable value of the mules, not exceeding $800, the amount claimed in the petition; unless you believe from the evidence that the employees of defendant in charge of the train which carried the mules, exercised that degree of care for the safe transportation of the mules which, under all the circumstances, was necessary and proper, and if the employees did exercise that degree of care, then you will find for the defendant."

In our opinion the lower court erred to the prejudice of appellee. It is evident that this stock was not watered, fed and rested, as required by the statute referred to, and that this shipment was interstate, and that there was a violation of this statute in this shipment. Under the language of this statute, and under the construction given it by the courts of other States and the Federal court, the appellant can not excuse itself from the performance of this statutory duty by showing that it did not have the stock in its possession and transportation for the period of twenty-eight hours, nor can it say that it did not know that the preceding and connecting carriers had failed to perform their statutory duties. The statute makes no exception, for it says that in estimating such confinement, the time during which the animals have been confined without such rest on connecting roads from which they are received shall be included.

In the case of the United States v. Louisville & Nashville R. R. Co., 18 Fed. Rep., 481, the court, in discussing and construing this statute, said: "To my mind it is clear enough, without resorting to any artificial rules of construction."

This was said in answer to appellant's contention that the statute should be construed as implying that before a conviction thereunder, a person must knowingly and willfully violate the provisions of the statute. The court therein continuing said: "The law declares that no railroad company transporting animals, etc., shall confine them in cars longer than twenty-eight hours; that is, the company having possession of them when the twenty-eight hours expires. * * * This would be so, no matter what the particular contract may have been in this case between the shipper and carrier. It could not add to or take from the act of congress." (Chesapeake & Ohio R. R. Co. v. The American Exchange Bank, 44 L. R. A., 451; Nashville, Chattanooga & St. Louis R. R. Co. v. Heggie Bros., 36 Ga., 210; I. C. R. R. Co. v. Eblen, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 1609.)

It is claimed that this statute only fixes a penalty against persons who violate its provisions, and does not authorize an individual to recover damages sustained by reason of the violation of it. Section 66, Kentucky Statutes, says, a person injured by a violation of any statute may recover from the offender such damages as he may sustain by reason of the violation, although a penalty of forfeiture for such violation be thereby imposed. In the case of Hale v. Missouri P. R. Co., 36 Neb., 206, and Chesapeake & Ohio R. R. Co. v. The American Exchange Bank, supra, the court, in discussing section 4386, U. S. Statutes, held the carriers liable in damages to the owner of the stock, as well as for the penalties. In view of these authorities we are of the opinion that the lower court did not commit any error prejudicial to the substantial rights of the appellant.

Wherefore, the judgment is affirmed.

Whole court sitting.

CINCINNATI, NEW ORLEANS & TEXAS PACIFIC RY. CO. v. SANDERS & RUSSELL.

(Filed May 4, 1904.)

1. Carriers—Delay in shipping hogs—Contract with shipper to attend to stock—The fact that the shipper of hogs agrees with the carrier to send a man along with the train to feed and water the hogs, and fails to do so, does not relieve the carrier from its duty to look after them while in its custody, and such carrier is liable for the damage which it could, by ordinary care, have prevented.

2. Unusual delay—The fact that the train was delayed three hours in making a run usually requiring six or seven hours, whilst it increased the risk in carrying the hogs through with safety in hot weather, also increased the carriers' obligation to that extent to give them every attention to avoid loss.

3. Common law liability—Negligence—Under section 196, Constitution, carriers are prohibited from contracting for relief from any liability imposed by the common law, and while at common law carriers could limit their liability for loss to goods for many causes, they were never permitted to contract for exemption from liability attributable to their own negligence.

E. G. Gaither and John Galvin for appellant.

J. B. Wilson and W. C. Bell for appellees.

Appeal from Mercer Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

The appellees, Sanders & Russell, shipped two hundred and sixty-five hogs in four live stock cars over defendant's road from Burgin, Ky., to the Cincinnati Stock Yards. The train of which these cars formed a part left Burgin on the morning of July 2 at 2:45 a. m., and reached the Cincinnati Stock Yards, the point of destination, in the afternoon of that day at 4:14 p. m., having been on the road about thirteen and one-half hours. The hogs were in good condition when they left Burgin. When they arrived at their destination fifteen of them were dead, and the remaining two hundred and fifty had lost in shrinkage, over and above the usual loss of flesh incident to the journey, about 750 pounds whilst in route. On the 18th of September, 1902, Sanders & Russell brought this suit against the railroad company, seeking to recover $318.95, the pecuniary loss resulting from the shipment to them, which they allege was chargeable to the defendant's negligence in failing to give proper care and attention to the hogs whilst in their custody, and to the unnecessary and usual delay in delivering them at their point of destination. The answer of the defendant is in two paragraphs. In the first

It denied that the plaintiff's loss was attributable to any lack of care or attention on their part to the hogs while in transit, or that the delay in their transportation from Burgin to Cincinnati was unusual or unnecessary. In the second, it alleges that the bill of lading under which the hogs were shipped provided that the plaintiffs should unload, feed, water and attend to the hogs at their own expense and risk whilst in transit; and that the company should not be liable for any injury to them arising from heat, suffocation, or other ill effects of being crowded in the cars; and that the plaintiffs should send a man along on the freight train to look after them; that the company should not be liable for any injury or loss by reason of delay in transportation not resulting from the negligence of the company or from any cause whatever beyond its control, and allege that any loss or damage to the hogs was attributable to the negligence of the plaintiffs in failing to look after them, as required by the bill of lading, and to suffocation on account of the excessive heat of the weather. There is no allegation that the cars were overloaded, or that the suffocation or injury arose from this fact. A general demurrer was sustained to the second paragraph of the answer, and a jury trial upon the issues raised by the first paragraph, resulted in a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff for the amount sued for, and the railway company has appealed.

There is little conflict in the testimony. It was shown that the train reached Lexington at 4:30 a. m., and was delayed at that point one hour and twenty minutes; that it was delayed forty minutes at Williamstown, and one hour at Shearman, reaching Ludlow at 1.39 p. m., and that it took until 4:15 p. m. for it to arrive at the Union Stock Yards, the point of destination. The testimony of the plaintiffs is uncontradicted that the usual time required is only about six or seven hours to make the run on this train from Burgin to the stock yards; and that it generally arrives there somewhere between 8 and 10 o'clock in the morning. There is no denial, either in the pleading or proof, as to the extent of the alleged losses. Nor was there any claim by the railway company that they gave any special attention to the hogs whilst in their possession. It was also shown that neither of the plaintiffs or any representative of theirs was on the train, the hogs being consigned to a firm of brokers at the Union Stock Yards.

Considerations of public policy have imposed extraordinary liabilities upon carriers. They are generally held liable as insurers of the safety of goods committed to their care, with the exception of, first, those arising from what is known as the act of God; second, those caused by the public enemy; third, those arising from the act of the shipper; fourth, those arising from the inherent nature of the goods shipped. Appellant insists that the losses to appellee resulting from the death and loss of weight in his hogs, was attributable to their inherent inability to successfully withstand the hot weather which prevailed during the time of their shipment, and not from any negligence or lack of attention on their part. If this is admitted, yet appellant knew the nature of the stock which they assumed to transport; and that the delays in their trains, however excusable in themselves, increased the risk of carrying the hogs through with safety, and to that extent increased their obligation to give them every attention necessary to avoid loss, and to carry them to their destination without unnecessary or unavoidable delay.

While at common law carriers could limit their liability for loss or injury to goods committed to their care resulting from many causes, they were never permitted to contract for exemptions from liability attributable to their own negligence. In 6 Cyc., 892, the rule is laid down as follows: "Where the express language or evident purpose of the stipulation relieving the carrier from common law liability is to exempt him from liability for his own negligence, or that of his servants, or agent, the stipulation is against public policy, and is, therefore, void and of no effect."

And by section 196 of the Constitution of Kentucky, they are prohibited from contracting for relief from any liability imposed upon them by common law. The provisions of the bill of lading, relied on in the second paragraph of appellant's answer, that appellee should water and attend the stock at their own risk while in transit, and that they should send a man along to look after them, does not relieve the carrier from the duties imposed upon it by law to look after the stock. Their only effect is to shift the burden of proving negligence from the railroad company to the shipper. (Ray's Negligence of Imposed Duties, page 241; L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Hawley, 10 Ky. Law Rep., 117; C., N. O. & T. P. Ry. Co. v. Grover, 11 Ky. Law Rep., 236.)

"And the rule as now established by the great weight of modern authority is, that railroad companies are common carriers of live stock with substantially the same duties and responsibilities that existed at common law with respect to the carriage of goods, except that they are not liable as insurers against loss and injury resulting from the inherent nature, propensities or proper vices of the animals themselves." (4 Elliott on Railroads, 1545; Ray on Negligence of Imposed Duties, 253.)

We, therefore, conclude that the demurrer to the second paragraph of appellant's answer was properly sustained. The extraordinary delay in transporting the hogs is not satisfactorily accounted for, and the court in this case made the liability of the appellant depend upon the question of their negligence, and the jury have found a verdict for the appellee. We perceive no grounds for disturbing it.

Judgment affirmed.

NIPP'S ADM'X v. CHESAPEAKE & OHIO RY. CO.

(Filed May 10, 1904—Not to be reported.)

Removal of actions to Federal court—In this action against appellee for damages it was error to dismiss the action on the ground that a former suit for damages was dismissed upon its removal to the Federal court; this court has held that an action for personal injuries brought in a State court which was removed to the Federal court, within twelve months and dismissed, could be renewed in the State court within twelve months of the accrual of the cause of action.

Armstrong & Woods for appellant.

John T. Shelby for appellee.

Appeal from Carter Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

In October, 1901, the appellant, as administratrix of George Nipp, sued the Chesapeake & Ohio Ry. Co., Newt Armstrong and John L. Ebberly, who were the engineer and fireman of a train, which killed her husband, to recover $20,000 in damages. This suit was removed to the United States Circuit Court upon application of the railway company on the ground of diverse citizenship. At the first term of the Federal court, the appellant dismissed her action without prejudice, and on the 28th of May thereafter she brought this suit seeking to recover $2,000 in damages.

The railway company, in their answer, pleaded the removal to the Federal court, and its subsequent dismissal by the plaintiff as a bar to the prosecution of this action. The plaintiff filed a general demurrer to this plea, which was overruled by the trial court and the action dismissed, and she has appealed. It is the contention of the appellee that the Federal court having acquired jurisdiction of the cause of action upon the former removal, it was exclusive and continuous; and that a suit could not be renewed upon the same cause of action in the State court, and in support of its contention refer to the opinion in C. & O. Ry. v. Riddle's Adm'r, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 1687.

The opinion in that case overlooked the decision in Adams Express Co. v. Scofield, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 1120, and in the subsequent case of Stevenson's Adm'r v. Ill. Cen. Ry. Co., ante, 2011, this fact was pointed out, and so much of the opinion in the Riddle case as conflicted with the conclusion in Adams Express Co. v. Scofield, withdrawn. In both the Scofield and Stevenson cases it was decided that the plaintiff in an action for personal injuries brought in a State court which was removed by petition to the Federal court, could dismiss in the Federal court and within twelve months from the accrual of his cause of action, renew his suit in the State court.

We deem it unnecessary to again discuss that question in this proceeding as it is fully considered in the above cases

For reasons indicated judgment is reversed and cause remanded for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

APPEALS—	Page.
1. appeal will not lie where amount is less than the jurisdictional amount	1475
2. upon an appeal to the circuit court from the judgment of the county court refusing a liquor license, it was the duty of the circuit court to have affirmed the judgment, or remand the case with instructions to grant the license; but where the cause was remanded for a new trial, the applicant had no ground of complaint because a judgment remanding the cause was more favorable to appellant than the facts warranted	1558
3. in action to recover books valued at $150 and $50 damages, where there was no proof as to damages, and as the claim for damages was waived, and the disclaimer of it was as binding as if entered on the order book, such appeal can not be maintained for want of jurisdiction	1577
4. appeal will not lie to Court of Appeals from judgment of $75 where judgment was personal	1768
5. an order refusing to enter judgment non obstante veredicto, not such final order as may be appealed from	1777
6. where no part of the record of the suit in which judgment is sought to be opened is copied in the transcript, impossible to determine whether any error was committed by the trial court or not	2017
7. upon the return of a case to the lower court, where a judgment was entered in accordance with the directions of the Court of Appeals, it will be upheld	2069
8. the failure to file a schedule within ninety days is not a ground for the dismissal of an appeal, where appellant files a transcript of the entire record	2116
9. where the transcript fails to show that the bill of exceptions was approved or filed by an order of court or signed by the judge, and there is no certificate of the clerk that it is a transcript of the record upon which appellant was convicted, the appeal will be dismissed	2152
10. an erroneous judgment of the lower court for $175, can not be reversed by this court, for the want of jurisdiction	2182
ARGUMENT OF COUNSEL—
where complaint of argument of counsel was not made at time, nor court asked to rule upon it, verdict can not be taken advantage of upon appeal	1567
ASSIGNEES—
where assignee elected to continue unprofitable business and lost, he should be charged with the value of the estate at the time it came into his hands	1578
ASSIGNMENT—
1. warrant for street construction can not be assigned so as to vest right of action against third parties, under a mortgage in which it was agreed they should have warrant assigned them	1538
2. where one assigned warrants under street construction to one having previously executed mortgage on lots to another, agreeing to assign warrants to him, the former has no lien by reason of the assignment of apportionment warrant	1538
3. where goods were sold upon the faith of statements made to a mercantile agency, and assignment of the purchaser followed, the fact that he was adjudged a bankrupt did not prevent the creditor from proceeding in the circuit court under an order of attachment, and retaking the goods sold by him	1615
4. assignment of bonds of corporation which had been issued upon faith of mortgage, assignment will be treated as that of proceeds sufficient to satisfy debts	1739
5. the assignment of a bond of a corporation, which had been issued upon the faith of a mortgage, the person making the assignment having no title to the bond, such assignment will be treated in an action to enforce the lien, as an assignment of the proceeds belonging to him as will be sufficient to satisfy the debt	1739
ATTACHMENTS—
judgment discharging attachment under section 228, Civil Code, entitled return of property or its proceeds	1454

in an action to recover on attachment bond after attachment had been discharged, while there was some conflict of evidence, the verdict being supported by it, will not be disturbed	1858
ATTORNEYS—
where city attorney was present when ordinance was enacted fixing his salary, and made no objection but continued to serve as city attorney, there can be no recovery thereafter for extraordinary services, the ordinance fixing his salary for all services to be rendered the city by him.....	1881
ATTORNEY AND CLIENT—
1. subsection 5 of section 806, Civil Code, providing that "no attorney shall testify concerning a communication made to him in his professional character by his client or his advice thereon, without the client's consent," does not prevent the attorney who drew will from testifying, after client's death, to statements made by him during the course of employment.....	1904
2. it is a well settled rule that client may discharge an attorney at any time and without cause, but where attorney has performed services he may recover for them.....	1875
ATTORNEY'S FEE—
1. one successfully asserting claim to attached property, can not recover in an action for attorneys' fees expended in defense of his property.....	1416
2. an action to enforce mortgage lien to secure attorney's fee will not be maintained, where the makers of mortgage were ignorant people and it appears the instrument was procured by fraud, and where it appears that a reasonable fee had already been paid for services for which mortgage was sought to be upheld.....	1987
3. action of chancellor in allowing attorney's fees will not be disturbed where the fee appeared to be reasonable, he being on the ground and knowing the usual fees charged in his court	1990
while automobiles are a lawful means of conveyance, and have equal rights upon the public roads with horses and carriages, their use should be accompanied with that degree of care and prudence in management and consideration for the rights of others, as is consistent with their safety.....	1148
BANKS—
upon a second appeal, from a judgment dishonoring a check, the last trial conforming to the former opinion of the Court of Appeals and to the evidence, will not be disturbed, it appearing that it is not excessive.....	9151
BANKRUPTCY—
1. question as to exemption of bankrupt property to be considered by Federal court in the bankruptcy proceeding.....	1684
2. property of debtor, though attached, properly delivered to trustee in bankruptcy, bankruptcy proceeding being filed within four months after attachment proceeding began.....	1684
BAR—
former judgment not a bar to subsequent action for an obstruction, where city council authorized building of a wall, as section 242, Kentucky Statutes, radically changed the rule in such cases	1830
BASTARDS—
in absence of strong proof to the contrary, the presumption must prevail, after the lapse of many years, one was of legitimate birth; and conveyance from him can not be attacked on the ground that he was a bastard	1854
BAWDY HOUSE—
in a prosecution for bawdy house, argument of Commonwealth's attorney based on evidence admitted by court, except upon immaterial question, not subject of objection.....	1739
BILLS AND NOTES—
1. where conveyance was made to defraud creditors, it was a voluntary conveyance, and the assignee of the purchase-money notes assumed the place of the payee; and by sections 474-483, Kentucky Statutes, such notes are subject to every defense in the hands of an assignee that they would have been in the hands of the original holder	1867

2. defense that bank did not prosecute maker to insolvency, will not avail where it was shown assignor repeatedly promised bank to see makers and have note paid or secured.....1435
8. where a note, executed to a bank and payable twelve months after date, where there was no interest reserved, the note being in lieu of an old one, it was not placed upon the footing of bill of exchange pursuant to section 483, Kentucky Statutes, and the five year limitation does not apply.....1850
4. where the evidence shows that an ignorant negro man was dominated by a shrewd white man, a note given by the negro is adjudged fraudulent and without consideration.....2143
5. where an insolvent building and loan corporation is in the hands of a receiver, the rule is to compute the interest on a note sued on by the receiver, at 6 per cent. on the money actually received by the borrower, crediting from time to time under the system of partial payments, all interest and premiums paid, and the balance thus received is the amount due.....2143
6. in an action to recover on a note, the defense being a discharge in bankruptcy, in avoidance of which plaintiff pleads fraud in obtaining the money for which the note was given, the action not being bottomed on fraud, the plea of limitation of ten years does not apply to the cause of action but to the defense, and can not be relied on to defeat a recovery.....2167
7. the ruling of the court upon a former trial of the action, does not prevent the pleading of the statute of limitation upon a separate and distinct matter subsequently raised, affecting the question of fraud in obtaining the money on the note, as applying to appellee's release by his discharge in bankruptcy.....2167
8. in action on note, where the defense was, at the time of the execution of the note he assigned to the payee as collateral, another note, that when the collateral fell due its makers were solvent and the payee could have collected the note sued on, but neglected to do so, the holder was guilty of ordinary negligence and a demurrer to the answer setting up these defenses should have been overruled.....3297

BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—

1. paper purporting to be a bill of exceptions not signed by circuit judge and not filed in court, being merely tendered, is not part of the record and should be stricken out.....1235
2. alleged misconduct of Commonwealth's attorney can not be considered on appeal when no exception was taken at the time, and notice was first taken on motion for a new trial.....1236
8. where particular questions or answers are objected to, they must be specifically excepted to, and it must so appear in bill of evidence.....1324
4. where bill of evidence was not filed in time, but no objection made by adverse party, but examined it when tendered, any error in filing it waived.....1563
5. where bill of exceptions does not show that Commonwealth's attorney made statement to which defense objected, or that there was exception to the court's ruling as to such question, verdict will not be disturbed.....1766
6. alleged misconduct of the Commonwealth's attorney in the final argument to the jury, can not be considered on appeal where no exception was taken at the time, and notice was first taken of it on the motion for a new trial.....1765

BOARD OF EQUALIZATION—

the Marion County Board of Equalization, after being fully advised of the number of shares of the stockholders of a bank and the actual value thereof, for certain years, and having listed same at 60 per cent. of its cash value, the fact that the board fixed the value too low can not be remedied in a judicial proceeding; both the State and county are bound by the action of their fiscal officers.....2254

BOARDS OF HEALTH—

1. expenses of boards of health when regularly appointed must be borne by fiscal court of county.....1478
2. under section 2059, Kentucky Statutes, cities of fifth class are not required to have separate boards of health.....1478

BOARDS OF HEALTH—Continued.	Page.
8. the fact that deceased was removed to the pesthouse by the order of the mayor or other officers, there being no board of health, though there was an ordinance authorizing the appointment of such board, the failure to appoint such board can not affect the question, it being but an agency or instrumentality in the hands of the municipality in protecting the public health, and the means employed being just as effective	1690
BONDED WAREHOUSE—See Taxation.
BOND ISSUE—
in action to test validity of bond issue, where it was charged election returns had not been canvassed and that returns, if counted, would show proposition had been defeated, after expiration of six months court will not disturb the count as returned by board of canvassers	1809
BOUNDARY OF LANDS—
1. oral agreement by father and sons with owner of overlapping patent as to division binding upon children and vendees	1648
2. in the great number of conveyances and divisions of land certain lines which had always been recognized, were properly held by the circuit court to be the established lines	2246
BUILDING AND LOAN ASSOCIATIONS—
1. where one would not get indefeasible title to land held by building and loan association, he will not be compelled to surrender surplus in value of lot over his pro rata of corporation assets ..	1840
2. where secretary and treasurer of building and loan association had defaulted, in an action upon different bonds of the association, error to adjudge secret deposits in bank to the credit of corporation were payments within meaning of law	1725
3. in a defense to an action by a building and loan association on the idea that it was not a "going concern," plea of defendant in setting up this defense being insufficiently pleaded, demurrer should have been sustained to it	1858
BURDEN OF PROOF—
1. in an action to recover for an assault, in which allegations of petition were not denied, but matter in avoidance was pleaded, the burden was on the defendant	1157
2. to every written obligation the statute imports a consideration, and where a note is supported by material circumstances judgment that the note was not act and deed of maker, erroneous	1984
3. the allegations of the petition being denied, and an affirmative defense interposed, upon which issue was joined, the plaintiff had the burden of proof and closing argument	2085
4. in action on contract for cutting timber, where contract was produced, which plaintiff denied was true contract, burden was upon the latter to show it was not true contract	2805
CANCELLATION OF POLICY—
where the provision as to the cancellation of a policy of insurance was ambiguous, it will be most strongly construed against the company	1501
CANCELLATION OF STOCK—
cancellation of stock legal where it was done at its chief office in this State, although company was organized in another State, where different mode of cancellation was provided	1722
CARRIER—
1. in action against carrier for damage to live stock which it was transporting, the damage arising from neglect, it can not be excused on the ground that it did not know the preceding connecting carrier had not performed its statutory duty, as under section 4388, United States Revised Statutes, no railroad company within the United States, whose road forms any part of line of road over which stock is transported from one State to another, shall confine the same for longer period than twenty eight hours, without unloading them for rest and food	2380
2. delay in running train increases carrier's liability to care for stock which it transports	2333
3. under section 196, Constitution, carriers are prohibited from contracting for relief from any liability imposed by the common law	2333
4. the fact that shipper agrees with carrier to send a man along to feed and water stock, does not relieve carrier of duty to look after them where the person agreed upon fails to do so	2333

	Page.
CITY ORDINANCES—
city ordinance violative of fourteenth amendment of Federal Constitution, where it confers upon common council arbitrary power in determining whether or not a building may be erected without fixing any standard by which it may be controlled	1812
CLERK COURT OF APPEALS—
incoming clerk of Court of Appeals takes up work where former officer left off, and he may collect any fees due and apply them to conduct of office	1818
CODES OF PRACTICE, CONSTRUED—
section 26	1554
CLERICAL MISPRISION—
where judgment claims relief not sought in petition, it is clerical misprision which may be corrected on motion	1808
COMMON SCHOOLS—
1. where school superintendent notified trustee of his intention to remove him, the fact that the trustee continued rendered employment of teacher by him and the other trustees valid, and entitles teacher to payment for services	1268
2. failure of county superintendent to give notice of intention to divide school district, as required by section 4427, Kentucky Statutes, renders action in dividing the same void and of no effect	1388
CONDITIONAL SALES—
1. where article is sold on trial, sale not complete until approval given, either expressly or by implication	1848
2. where cash register was sold upon condition that if, after thirty days, it was not satisfactory, purchaser should be permitted to return it, and it was not returned within reasonable length of time, jury must find for company in action against it	1848
CONFLICT OF EVIDENCE—where there is a conflict of evidence it is for the jury to determine its weight and effect	2294
CONFLICT OF LAWS—
where all the parties reside in a State where preference among creditors is valid, creditors who have not been included can not come to Kentucky and set in force the act of 1855 as against their debtor	1324
CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—
1. section 1774, Kentucky Statutes, which makes it an offense to sell milk from animals fed upon still slop, not violative of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States	1165
2. failure of trial court to adopt construction of New York courts, not a refusal to give full faith and credit to judicial proceedings within the meaning of Constitution, the statute referred to not purporting to have extra-territorial force	1337
3. section 83, subdivision 3, article 10, chapter 128 of Acts of 1902, providing for payment of license tax for conversion by corporations of natural tobacco leaf into manufactured product, not in violation of section 171 of the Constitution	1717
4. where an amended act contains nothing that is not germane to subject embraced in the body thereof and in the title, it is not violative of section 51 of the Constitution	2087
CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTES—
1. penal statutes should be construed liberally with a view to carrying out the legislative intent	1181
2. sections 8910 and 8912, Kentucky Statutes, are not restricted in their construction to the wasting of natural gas at the well, but apply to the acts of persons in possession, who conveyed the same from the well in pipes and burnt it under a pretense of using it for some lawful purpose	1181
3. the fact that certain sections of "An act to prevent the wasting of petroleum, natural gas, salt water, and to provide for the plugging of all abandoned wells" related solely to the plugging of abandoned wells, the fact that an emergency clause existed and the act took effect from and after its passage, does not justify the construction that this act applied only to abandoned wells	1181
4. section 801, Kentucky Statutes, does not require freight train carrying caboose to provide separate coaches for white and colored passengers	1443

5. section 1794, Kentucky Statutes, does not limit cattle guards to public and private crossings	1524
6. statute complied with in spirit where labels were attached to fertilizer having been furnished by dealer before fertilizer used	1566
7. while section 318, Civil Code, authorizes the trial court to permit the jury to view the place of an accident, it is in the discretion of the court to grant or refuse the view	1622
8. section 2342, Kentucky Statutes, providing that, unless different purpose is expressed, every estate in land by deed or will, without words of inheritance, shall be deemed fee-simple estate, in devise where it was provided where child had issue, such issue should receive parents' portion, a defeasible fee was created, contingent upon the devisee dying without issue	1719
9. by provisions of section 679, Kentucky Statutes, where application for insurance is not attached to policy, it shall not be received in evidence in controversy between company and insured	1748
10. under section 433, Kentucky Statutes, failure of consideration or fraud in execution of note is not available as a defense where bank purchased note before maturity and without notice of its infirmity	1796
11. section 8101, Kentucky Statutes, making provision for street improvement, is merely cumulative, enabling city to realize earlier than by suit	1817
12. section 8101, Kentucky Statutes, making provision for street improvement and as to offering the tax bill for sale, is merely cumulative, enabling the city to realize the money earlier than by suit	1817
13. section 2106, Kentucky Statutes, providing that certificate of parent addressed to county clerk, consenting that license to marry shall issue, shall be attested by two witnesses and proved by oath of one of them; where such statute was not complied with it was not certificate within meaning of law, and one who signed name of another to such paper, was not guilty of uttering forged writing	1866
14. by the provisions of section 2825, Kentucky Statutes, the board of public works of the city of Louisville has control over the construction of its streets, and it has the power to prescribe a plan for a railroad crossing, and it is the duty of a railway company to conform to such requirement	1888
15. by the provision of section 2825, Kentucky Statutes, board of public works of city has control over construction of streets	1888
16. section 236, Constitution, and sections 8759 and 8755, Kentucky Statutes, refer to offices to be filled for full constitutional terms	1967

INJUNCTIONS—
1. an injunction will not lie to restrain the punishment of crime....	1894
2. mandatory injunction will not lie to compel railroad to make crossing where there was an agreement that outlet should be made at another place which would afford the entrance sought....	1459
3. where the benefit to the party applying for injunction would be small and oppressive to the other party and the public, an injunction will not be granted....	1459
4. a rule of a water company requiring rents to be paid either upon the meter plan or assessment plan is reasonable, and a mandamus will not lie to compel a violation of such rule, although a different rate had been theretofore paid	1506
INJUNCTION—
injunction will lie to prevent obstruction to strip of land dedicated as highway by an adjacent lot owner.....	1645
2. injunction authorized to restrain trespass to lands where the plaintiff holds the legal title, and the petition sets out such facts as to show the peaceable possession is interfered with.....	1707
3. contractor entitled to relief by injunction against members of labor union who enter into conspiracy to break up his business....	1781
4. rule that injunction will not be granted where there is adequate remedy at law, refers to legal remedies and not to criminal proceedings.....	1781
5. where appellant entered into contract for the sale of timber, in an action by him to enjoin the further cutting of timber where it is apparent that timber beyond the size stipulated in the contract was being cut in violation of contract, court erred in not perpetuating injunction	2009
INSANITY—
insanity is a good defense in action for slander	1416
INSTRUCTIONS—
1. in an action to recover damages for personal injury resulting from coming in contact with automobile, an instruction that the jury should find for plaintiff if they believed that the act of defendant in running his automobile at a high rate of speed was negligence, and because of such rate of speed, the horse became frightened and caused the injury, was not erroneous....	1148
2. an instruction which told the jury to draw no presumption from failure of defendant to testify, was erroneous	1238
3. an instruction which groups certain facts and accentuates them, and tells the jury what presumption arises from them, is objectionable under the accepted rule of practice in this State.	1238
4. an instruction on the law of self-defense which did not permit the accused to strike in defense of his life or body unless there was "no reasonably safe means of averting the danger," was erroneous in the use of the word reasonably	1255
5. use of word credible in instruction in defining qualification of witness, not prejudicial error.....	1269
6. where a shipment of freight was received July 8d, but did not reach consignee for a month, ruling of trial court in refusing peremptory instruction asked by carrier in action by it for damages, was proper	1324
7. failure of trial court to instruct jury as to plea that appellee failed to take invoice of his stock, can not be complained of where no proof was offered in support of this allegation.....	1351
8. in an action for damages for personal injuries where the accident resulted from the plaintiff's own carelessness, a peremptory instruction was authorized	1393
9. in an action for damages for personal injuries, the words "including any loss of time on account thereof, and expenses incurred in obtaining medical attention," did not contravene rule that special damages must be specially pleaded.....	1499

INSTRUCTIONS—Continued.

	Page.
10. in action against bank for fraud in sale of its stock, instruction erroneous which charged plaintiff with any knowledge agent had, when he alleged he relied on representations of bank's agent	1449
11. instruction upon voluntary manslaughter not erroneous in prosecution for murder where evidence was circumstantial, because the jury should be instructed on every phase of the law	1504
12. an instruction in an action to recover for legal services, which told the jury to "find a verdict for plaintiff in a sum of the reasonable value of his services" was prejudicial where it was alleged that the action was not prosecuted to a successful termination	1506
18. where defense is made that in cutting at one he cut another accidentally, instruction should be given that if he so struck in self-defense can not be held for maliciously stabbing another	1537
14. an instruction erroneous in action for injuries sustained by defective platform, which denies right of recovery if servant had equal means with master of knowing that platform had been constructed in safe manner.	1605
15. in action by seller to recover goods sold upon faith of statement of purchaser as to his insolvency, the purchaser soon thereafter becoming a bankrupt, in action by seller to retake the goods by attachment, peremptory instruction to find for purchasers, erroneous	1615
16. error in trial for damages for court to instruct jury that fee paid in recovering property could be allowed in estimating damages.	1666
17. the use of the word "skillful" did not add new meaning in defining character of care, but only required such care as is exercised by ordinary men in the business in which they are engaged.	1686
18. instruction authorizing punitive damages proper, where one driving delivery wagon after dark was struck by street car in narrow street without warning from motorman.	1698
19. the use of the word "skillful" in defining the character of care which should be exercised by those in charge of persons engaged in occupations such as the operation of trains, did not add a new and distinct meaning, but only required such care as is exercised by ordinary men in the business in which they are engaged, and an instruction containing it can not be said to be erroneous, although it would have been better to have conformed to the ordinary definition.	1690
20. in action against railroad for damages by passenger who left seat and went to car door before train stopped, jury should have been instructed that if that fact appeared, they should find for defendant.	1735
21. in action for damages, where contributory negligence was affirmatively pleaded and there was evidence supporting such plea, an instruction based on such defense should have been given.	1766
22. in action against railroad company for injuries, by being struck by door of refrigerator car, there should have been an instruction as to exercise of reasonable care by the company, and that if agents failed to warn person injured, company was guilty of negligence.	1766
23. an instruction using the word skillful in defining ordinary care and negligence, was not objectionable in action to recover for injuries by a falling telephone pole, the business of operating franchise on public highway requiring certain skill and prudence.	1843
24. instruction misleading where the elements of affray, sudden heat and passion and provocation were omitted.	1928
25. the omission of the words "either real or apparent" in a prosecution, prejudicial.	1928
26. instruction erroneous which told the jury they should find for defendant except they believed it knew of peril of appellee, in action against railroad for damages.	1933
27. in civil cases circuit court not required to give the whole law of the case, it being incumbent upon litigants to ask such instructions as they deem proper.	2003
28. in an action to recover damages resulting from going into a warehouse, instructions were erroneous which permitted a recovery without regard to plaintiff's right to be in the warehouse.	2046

| 29. in action for damages sustained by a falling wall, the evidence showing the place not to be safe, which fact was or could have been known by the master and was unknown to the plaintiff, an instruction should have been given embodying this view of the law..... | 2070 |
| 30. where one was indicted under section 1166, Kentucky Statutes, for willful and malicious cutting and wounding, an instruction to the jury that they should find him guilty of malicious cutting if the same was done "feloniously and with malice aforethought," was erroneous, and an instruction that they should find the defendant guilty of cutting in sudden heat and passion and without previous malice, has been condemned by the Court of Appeals because it does not follow the language of the statute, the words "sudden affray" not being synonymous with the words "in sudden heat and passion"..... | 2076 |
| 31. an appellant can not complain of the failure of the court to give an instruction of its theory of the case, where it did not offer one..... | 2087 |
| 32. where appellant was injured while working in a hole where dynamite had been left by other workman, of which he was ignorant, it was error to instruct the jury that he could not recover unless the appellee or its agent knew or could have known, by the use of ordinary care, that the dynamite was there..... | 2133 |
| 33. the fact that the court gave the jury an additional instruction after defendant's counsel had closed the argument, while to be condemned is not a reversible error, when the instruction was a proper one and favorable to defendant, and especially when the court offered to allow counsel for defendant to reargue the instructions, which was declined..... | 2161 |
| 34. in an action by a servant for injury caused by alleged negligence of the master in failing to keep pathway clear of loose stones, over one of which the servant stumbled and fell, an instruction to the jury that if defendant permitted the pathway to be obstructed, and that such obstruction was dangerous and because of such danger he was injured in the discharge of his duty, and that it was liable to him for its injury, provided he did not know of the obstruction, such instruction was erroneous because it imposed on the master the duty to furnish the servant a safe place to work..... | 2211 |
| 35. applying the principles which obtain in an action by a servant against the master for injury, the court should have submitted to the jury, in addition to the question of the servant's knowledge of an obstruction which resulted in his injury, the inquiry whether it was such an obvious danger as that he, in the discharge of his service with ordinary care, must have seen it and known of it..... | 2211 |
| 36. in an action by one for damages against a railroad company for failing to stop a train long enough to enable passenger to get on it, the jury was authorized to award such damages as would compensate the person for lost time, expenses incurred and discomfort suffered, in failing to reach destination..... | 2230 |
| 37. in an action against a street railway company for damages, where it was averred in the answer that the injury resulted from the mismanagement of a horse which plaintiff was driving, there should have been an instruction upon contributory negligence..... | 2243 |
| 38. an instruction authorizing punitive damages was improper, where the record fails to show any elements of conduct on the part of those operating the street car which justify an inflotion of punishment in the form of exemplary damages..... | 2243 |
| 39. where one, while driving a wagon which was struck by a street car, was injured, a peremptory instruction for the defendant was not authorized where the evidence tended to establish negligence on the part of those in charge of the car..... | 2243 |
| 40. where the bill of exceptions shows no objection by plaintiff to instructions offered by defendant, and no exceptions to the action of the court in giving them, there is no ground for complaint against the action of the court in giving them, especially where the plaintiff's action was not prejudiced by the instructions..... | 2260 |

41. upon the trial of exceptions to commissioners fixing damages for right of way, an instruction which told the jury to find the actual value of the ground taken, and in addition thereto damages to remaining part of farm, properly direct the jury as to how total damages should be ascertained 2395
42. where a section hand with a white lantern, which appears to be a signal that a train may proceed, lay on the track and went to sleep and was injured by a passing train, a peremptory instruction should be given to find for the railroad company in an action against it for the injury 2250
43. in action for damages for failure to carry out contract for cutting of cross ties, instruction authorizing full payment of contract price of ties cut by other parties erroneous 2305

INSURANCE—

1. demand by agent for payment of note, accompanied by certificate of health to be signed by insured, was sufficient notice to insured that company considered policy forfeited 1148
2. there was not a waiver of right of forfeiture by company by accepting note, but merely postponement of exercise of that right during period covered by note, which did not prejudice right of company to consider policy void for nonpayment of note at maturity 1148
3. insured can not complain of delay of company in rejecting application for restoration of policy 1149
4. note executed for premium on policy which provides for forfeiture of policy if note is not paid at maturity, is not a contract within meaning of statute which requires contract or agreement to be expressed in the policy, and such notes need not be attached to policy to be valid 1149
5. in action to recover on policy of life insurance, the verdict not being against the weight of evidence and no exception taken to the instructions, judgment in favor of plaintiff will not be disturbed 1306
6. where insurance company paid amount of policy with full knowledge of the alleged fraud and deceit in the procurement of the policy, its action was a ratification of the original contract of insurance 1219
7. where, by the terms of an insurance policy, it should lapse upon default of any payment, but after three annual payments, upon demand within six months with the surrender of the policy, a nonparticipating paid-up policy for a certain part of the policy will be issued, time is not of the essence of a contract; and if the insured surrenders the policy within a reasonable time and makes demand, he will be entitled to receive a paid-up policy 1327
8. where policy provided it should not lapse upon default of any payment, but after three annual payments a nonparticipating paid-up policy would be issued, time is not of the essence of the contract; and if insured surrenders policy within reasonable time he is entitled to paid-up policy 1327
9. in action on policy of insurance, not error to set aside judgment during term and after the expiration of three days, there being no question of fact nor verdict of jury, question being governed by common law rule giving courts control over their judgments during the term at which they are rendered 1351
10. where policy was voluntarily taken by husband for benefit of wife who was dependent upon him for support, and who had insurable interest in his life, contract can not be regarded as within the rule prohibiting the wagering of policies 1356
11. officials of a fire insurance company in absence of power conferred upon them by charter to fix salaries, have no power to fix compensation of officer of company 1379
12. in an action to recover upon a policy of insurance, the fact that the insured took his own life while insane is not a defense, where there was no provision in the policy that it should not be paid in the event the insured took his own life while insane 1510

INSURANCE—Continued.

13. where, subsequent to the taking out of a policy of insurance, a by-law was adopted by the company providing that in case of suicide, voluntary or involuntary, whether such member should be sane or insane, the amount to be paid should be a sum in proportion to the whole amount as the matured life expectancy might be to the entire expectancy at the date of admission, such by law can not affect the policy where it was never attached to the certificate of membership in a fraternal order, as provided by section 679 of Kentucky Statutes.....1510
14. upon an averment in a pleading that the insured was insane at the time he took his own life, it was error to sustain a demurrer to such pleading, because the question as to whether the insured was sane or insane at the time he took his life was one of fact, and should have gone to the jury under proper instructions.....1510
15. where insurance policy was without consideration, one paying premiums entitled to recover them.....1550
16. where applicant for insurance stated that his occupation was that of retail proprietor, and policy was contested because he was also lumberman, that fact did not affect policy in the absence of averment that disease was brought on by reason of occupation of lumberman, or that company would not have taken the risk had it known that applicant was engaged in such other business.....1456
17. where there was no proof in an action upon an oral agreement of insurance as to which company the risk should be placed in, the contract fails for lack of identity.....1497
18. in action to recover upon policy of insurance there was no necessity of proofs of loss where the company by pleading and proof, denied liability from date of fire to time of trial.....1501
19. a by-law adopted subsequent to the issue of a policy of insurance changing the form of contract can not affect the policy where it was not attached to the certificate of membership in a fraternal order, as provided by section 679, Kentucky Statutes.....1509
20. in an action upon a policy of insurance it was error to sustain a demurrer to a pleading interposing a defense of insanity, such a question being one of fact that should go to the jury.....1509
21. the fact that insured took his own life while insane, no defense in action on the policy where there was no provision in policy that it should not be paid if holder took his life while insane.....1509
22. where insurance policy provided that it should not cover loss by suicide, whether sane or insane, and the petition alleged that at the time of his death insured had not sufficient mind to understand that he was taking his own life, a verdict upholding the policy will not be disturbed, it being the province of the jury to determine the questions involved.....1604
23. insurance company can not be said to be insolvent where it was an assessment company and its only assets were the agreements to pay losses of fellow members, and when upon going into liquidation it possessed all that it ever possessed.....1680
24. where assessment insurance company failed to list its property for taxation, action for enforcement of payment of taxes proper under sections 171, 172 and 174 of the Constitution.....1697
25. where it was not shown upon trial that unsoundness of health occurred between application and medical examination and delivery of policy, the provision that "unless upon the date of delivery the insured is alive and in sound health," is not available and the company must rely upon statements in application.....1748
26. by section 1403, Kentucky Statutes, proceeds of policy of insurance became chargeable with the debts of the insured and the heirs at law took no title to it except subject to the provisions of the statute.....1875
27. assignment of policy of insurance will not be upheld where proof showed one not in condition of mind to know what he was doing.....1945
28. where insurance policy providing for a surrender was assigned to infants, the fact that they were infants did not change rule lapsing the policy, and they were not entitled to wait five years after becoming of age to sue for the amount due on the policy.....1993
29. where by terms of policy application for extended insurance must be made and policy surrendered in order to obtain paid-up policy, application and surrender of policy is conditioned precedent to issue of paid-up insurance.....1998

INSURANCE—Continued.

30. where an application for insurance contained provision that policy should not take effect until first premium shall be paid during the continuance of the good health of the applicant, applicant was killed before the delivery of the policy, in an action by the personal representative, it appearing that the agent without authority of the company agreed that if applicant would take the insurance he would hold the policy until a certain date when premium would be paid, such agreement was not sufficient to waive prepayment 2059
31. contract of insurance not being Kentucky contract not affected by the provision of our statute 2064
32. by section 639, Kentucky Statutes, it is provided that all statements in an application for insurance shall be deemed and held representations and not warranties, and that no representation, unless material or fraudulent, shall prevent recovery on the policy; and where an agent knew all of the facts as to the condition of property, it can not be said an applicant was guilty of fraud in making statements with reference to it 2240
33. in an action upon an insurance policy where it appears that such representations as the applicant made were not fraudulent, but were made on the advice of the soliciting agent, a judgment against the company will not be disturbed 2240
34. an insurance company has no right to change from one mortality table to another so as to affect contracts made prior to the change. 2251
35. it must be presumed that policy of insurance issued in this state, was procured with reference to the law as it then stood. 2308
36. where life insurance is made payable to wife and children of insured, as to them it should be regarded in the light of a testamentary provision rather than a contract, and such policy should be construed as far as possible under the statutes applicable to devises by will. 2308

JOINT TORT FEASORS—

- the fact that an action was dismissed without prejudice against one defendant, in consideration of $1,000 as part compensation for the damages sought to be recovered, does not bar recovery against another defendant for a sum sufficient to make full recovery. . . . 2036

JUDICIAL OFFICER—

- while the rule is well settled that a judicial officer will be protected from damages for erroneous exercise of judgment, yet where he acts corruptly or maliciously his office is no protection to him . . . 1798

JUDICIAL SALES—

1. purchaser at judicial sale bound by the rule of caveat emptor . . . 1418
2. where lands sold at judicial sale under order requiring proceeds to be re-invested, it was error to order proceeds belonging to infant to be paid to trustee 1418
3. sale should be set aside where there was no service of process. . . . 1546

JUDGMENTS—

1. judgment of circuit court in an action by holder of claim for the construction of a public school building against the trustees in their corporate capacity, upholding the claim and placing building in hands of receiver is not void, the court having jurisdiction of both the parties and the subject-matter, and the judgment never having been vacated, modified or reversed, is binding though it may have been erroneous. 1227
2. judgment in action for trespass may be pleaded as res adjudicata in equitable action to enjoin defendant from removing fencing and interfering with use of land in controversy. 1905
3. Court of Appeals where judgment excessive, can not grant remittitur or reduce amount; it must either reverse or affirm. 1418
4. judgment awarding damages for seizure of property for school taxation will not be disturbed where it appears that person whose property was seized was not a resident of the district. 1531
5. where, upon return of case to lower court it was tried in conformity to rule laid down by Court of Appeals, its finding will not be disturbed 1747
6. judgment will not be disturbed where the bill of exceptions as to the admission of certain evidence was silent, and where the instructions fairly submitted the question. 1749

JUDGMENTS—Continued.

7. judgment ordering sale of land to pay lien debts will not be disturbed where it does not appear that it can not be advantageously divided 1869
8. where the jury had not the required number, no objection being made during the trial, nor made the subject of ground for new trial, judgment will not be disturbed 1916

JURISDICTION—

1. the Court of Appeals has jurisdiction of an appeal from a judgment enforcing a lien on real estate regardless of the amount in controversy 1251
2. in questions involving taxation, the Court of Appeals has jurisdiction, no matter how small may be the amount involved. 1521
3. under section 950, Kentucky Statutes, amount in controversy must be $200, exclusive of interest and costs, to give Court of Appeals jurisdiction 1689
4. in action to enforce lien upon real estate, Court of Appeals will take jurisdiction without regard to amount in controversy. 1777
5. error to overrule demurrer to answer of foreign railroad company setting up plea as to jurisdiction, where the action was against the company and two of its employees, on the ground that in a former action against the company alone, after the case was transferred to the Federal court, the action was dismissed. 2019
6. by section 950, Kentucky Statutes, an appeal will not lie to the Court of Appeals where the amount of the controversy is less than $200 exclusive of interest and costs 2042

JURISDICTION OF COUNTY COURTS—

1. by section 87, Kentucky Statutes, county courts have jurisdiction to direct assignee to sell land assigned to him for payment of debts 1878
2. in an action by the auditor's agent seeking to collect taxes on personalty, a judgment of the lower court dismissing the petition, where it appears that the county court found there was no omission to assessed property, was proper. By statute the appeal from the judgment of the county court is limited to cases where the county court determined whether or not the property is liable. The circuit court has no original jurisdiction to assess property. 1927
